I saw myself lying in a coffin with a dead person. I saw myself performing sexual acts, naked and covered in blood. I guess I was about seven years old. When I had this memory, I couldn't believe it at first. I was really shocked. I wanted to know if it was really true. That's when I started looking for details in my memory. I then noticed that I had noticed a small wall to the left of the grave. And there was also a church tower in the distance, but seen very dimly because it was in twilight, but that is what I saw in my mind's eye. When the name of the location of this cemetery came up in my memory, I searched for it on Google Earth and was surprised to discover a remote cemetery there. However, I could recognize neither graves nor a wall on the internet. I drove there, and there is indeed a grave from 1978 (when I was about seven years old). To the left of it is this little wall. When I saw the gravestone without a name, erected by my neighbor with the gravestone company, with a saying about love, I found this very strange, and it confirmed my impression of having experienced the cruel deed here in this grave. Such sayings and poems about love are still written today by the cult leader René and can be found on the internet. In addition, a tower - not belonging to a church, but the tower of an estate that looks much like a church tower can be seen in the distance. From these details, which I encountered in the same way on site, I knew that my memories were correct.

Some memories of the premises of the Amerois Castle are very vague. But I pursued one detail in my memories. I remember how we children were brought into the castle through a side door. There was a pillar to the right of this door. We children were lied to at that time and were told that this pillar was a real guard, and no one could get past it. I searched for this door and column. I found it. I did not go there, but I examined all the pictures and videos that could be found of this castle on the internet. For days and nights, I looked at everything carefully, but at first, I could not find this door. I had even told friends who supported me in the search. And then suddenly I saw it in a video. The castle is usually only shown from other angles, and so one does not get to see the side door. But on this one video it can be seen for one or two seconds. That was my confirmation. I could only know that because I was taken to the castle through that door. And this door exists.

Memories are also stored in the body's cells.

These are then called bodily memories. These memories can manifest themselves, for example, in the form of trembling, nausea, vomiting, fainting, pain, panic attacks, shortness of breath, sudden dissociation or the like. These bodily memories show up involuntarily. Thus, it is not uncommon that at the scene of the event or at the mere memory of a traumatic event, the body rebels. This is an additional sign that a memory is true. At such a moment it is difficult to endure all this, but this gives confirmation.

I was standing in the room where the three men had attacked me. Suddenly I began to tremble inside. That evening I went to bed, and when I got up in the morning, I felt severe muscle soreness. The pain was so intense that I had trouble moving. I had not exercised at all - no, I had continued to shake all night and that's why I got this soreness. My body had signaled to me that my memories were real.

Other small touchstones can be that known details confirm a memory. Perhaps a former classmate remembers that one was sometimes picked up after school by a certain driver in a certain car. Or a teacher can confirm the many absences from school each Monday. Or one can find an old photo of oneself wearing the exact sweater that was in a memory. Or a former neighbor's child suddenly talks about certain rituals. It can also happen that a perpetrator blabs and reveals information. My ex-father-in-law blabbed to me at an old age when he unexpectedly addressed me in public by my cult name. That was clear evidence for me.

Yes, they are like little pieces of a mosaic that are put together. This takes a lot of strength, time and patience. But I would encourage you: It is possible!

Still another touchstone can be when you come across certain public information.

For me, it was a confirmation when I found out through research that certain people I could remember seeing in Barcelona, had actually been in Spain during that time. A few of these celebrities I encountered were reported by other victims of abuse over the years. Others were seen in such circles by other victims who reported it. This confirmed what I had experienced, even though I cannot yet prove everything.

A few more lines about the iatrogenic (therapist-induced) memories that are talked about again and again (so-called false memory syndrome): It is indeed the case that therapists (or any other person) can be influential. This can happen, for example, through misguided imagination, abusive hypnosis or other trance states, false dream interpretation, as well as suggestive questions. This can lead a person finally to believe in something that did not take place in such a way. These are not memories! But unfortunately, the word 'memory' is used for them, which is problematic. Yes, it is bad when an innocent person is accused as an abuser. And it is also bad when a person is led by suggestion to believe in abuse that never occurred. However, memories in the context of ritual abuse resulting in dissociative states or disorders are about more than just "falsely generated memories". And it is not just about memories of sexual abuse! It is also about memories of physical torture, neglect, false beliefs, psychological abuse. The theory of the false memory advocates, according to which DID as a result of severe trauma does not exist at all, is simply completely wrong. It has been refuted, and this can be found in numerous reference books. Dissociation is a survival strategy of victims. However, persons who have only been asserted to have "iatrogenic memories" usually do not have a dissociative identity disorder as a result of severe trauma. Thus, it is obvious that a fabricated false memory syndrome cannot explain at all why dissociative disorders are regularly found in victims of ritual abuse.

As already said, the vast majority of victims of ritual abuse are not deliberately searching for memories! And if the soul and the trauma-memory let them come up in the form of flashbacks or in other ways, the survivors are initially shocked! Counterevidence is sought, because they would rather not admit it. I myself hardly knew anything about the subject of Satanically organized ritual abuse in my life in the outside world. The term or the phenomenon Mind Control was unknown to me until such inconceivable memories came up. I have not tried hypnosis, nor have I sought out dream interpreters or participated in group therapy. I sought trauma therapy when many of these intangible, overwhelming memories were already there. I needed professionals to help me deal with it. There are survivors who see professionals because they realize that something is not right. And then it may be that in the course of therapy the soul is ready to release the memories. As long as the therapists provide support, do not suggest anything (not even to victims of ritual abuse!) and do not claim to know the inner world of the victims better than they do themselves; this is a very good and often necessary way to work through the traumata.

Finally, I should like to say: People who want to help should not be skeptical about the unknown. The unknown triggers many emotions in us humans. And it happens very often that we then withdraw out of ignorance and fear, or even start to judge. I should like to see people who stand up, go out and look for information themselves before judging those affected. For my part, I can promise: Those who are willing to look into the unknown area of ritual, organized, Satanic abuse and mind control will see it. And that is how those affected can be helped.

25. What Now? I WILL SPEAK OUT!

I used to be silent about the color purple. I was incapable of speaking. Today I am happy every time I see this color. I remember: "I’M SPEAKING OUT!" (Unfortunately, only a black and white print is possible, but feel free to imagine these two words in purple!). I consider it a great gift that I, as a victim of ritual abuse and mind control, not only survived, but also found the strength and courage within me to report it.

I want to share this gift; I want to make a difference with it. It is not just about me. It is about all those who are affected. About people who are suffering and who need to be helped.

By starting to talk about it, I have lit my match.

When even one match is lit in a large dark room, the darkness is no longer so dark. I have lit such a match. And my match is called: "I'M SPEAKING OUT!". I am not the only one. There are others who have lit their matches. Maybe not all matches are called: "I'M SPEAKING OUT!". There are many different ways to light matches! Internet fora, editorials, reports to the police or authorities, radio interviews, TV reports, organizing information, inaugurating events, YouTube channels, writing poems, painting pictures. All of them are wonderful! Each one serves to light a fire together, so that a great light can emerge. A light that exposes the darkness. I have joined this match community... and I shall CONTINUE TO SPEAK OUT.

PART I

Chapter One: Annuit Coeptis

It is commonly known now, more so than ever before, that the United States of America was founded largely by men with a philosophy grounded in the occult: namely the members of Freemasonry, and other secret societies, who saw in the US a potential "New Atlantis" or "New Jerusalem." They foresaw the future of the United States as a beacon to the rest of the world, guiding the nations towards the formation of a New World Order of peace, democracy, and enlightenment. Many people today would agree that the US is indeed, in several ways, fulfilling this role already. If nothing else, most people would certainly agree that the America has come to dominate the world financially, and that among world currencies, the American dollar is king.

What few people understand, however, is the correlation between the esoteric doctrines of Freemasonry upon which the United States was founded, and the economic principles that underpin the American economy. Few understand that the dollar is a unit of magical energy, and the dollar bill itself a magical talisman. Although many words have been written by conspiracy theorists analyzing the Masonic symbols on the one dollar bill, no one has yet been able to sufficiently explain why these symbols are there, or what they really mean. Certainly no researcher yet has successfully connected the markings on American money to the hidden secrets of the American monetary system.

The symbolism of the American dollar bill has been the subject of Masonic conspiracy theories since the modern version was first rolled out during the Roosevelt administration in 1935. Masonic and mystical symbolism has been used on American currency since the very beginning, and was employed as a means of distinguishing our money from that of Old World Europe, which invariably featured the bust of the reigning monarch. In contrast, America's founding fathers agreed that American money should be decorated with the symbols of the anti-monarchist, pro-democratic Enlightenment philosophy upon which the Republic was founded, and many of these ideals were Masonic in origin. The Great Pyramid, the All-Seeing Eye, and quirky phrases like "Mind Your Business" appeared on early American currency. In fact, the heads of "dead Presidents" and other state figures were not shown on US money until the twentieth century, when it was seen as less taboo. But all researchers of the subject agree that nothing tops the modern American one dollar bill for the sheer exactness and complexity of its mystical symbolism. The meaning of the symbolism is so deep, the metaphors so multi-layered, and each element so precisely placed, that although several of the other American bills have changed their appearance to prevent counterfeiting (with the heads moved off-center, and the addition of funky rainbow colors) the perfection of the one dollar bill has remained intact.

When analyzing the symbolism of the one dollar bill, most researchers tend to focus on the repeated use of the number 13, which they always insist is "an important number sacred to Freemasons", without demonstrating any proof of the supposed Masonic affinity for this particular number. This is, of course, the number of colonies that originally constituted the United States of America, and thus thirteen stars have been used in American heraldry since the start of the union, appearing not only on our first national flag, but upon many of our early coins as well. Since Freemasons were responsible for both the foundation of many of America's institutions and the design of our national symbols, it is tempting to ascribe a Masonic significance to the use of this number, and indeed there may be one. But there is no specific mention of the number 13 in any known

Masonic ritual, except perhaps in the rites of the Noble Order of the Shrine, where this number comes up more than once, but with no particular meaning given to it. In any case, the Shriners did not exist at the time of the founding of the American republic. None of the quintessential Masonic tomes, such as Albert Pike's Morals and Dogma, make any special note of the number. Although Pike examines the meaning of many numbers in terms of cabalism and sacred geometry, mention of 13 is conspicuously absent, almost like an office building from the early twentieth century in which the thirteenth floor has been superstitiously omitted. Even Freemason Manly P. Hall, in his 1944 book The Secret Destiny of America (where he interpreted the history of the United States as the unfolding of an ancient Masonic plan) could only offer lamely that 13 symbolizes Jesus and the twelve apostles, or the Sun and the twelve zodiac signs. One would expect him to say something more interesting, but perhaps he was just being coy. Indeed, if there are any Masonic teachings regarding this number, then they are among the few Masonic teachings that have actually remained secret throughout the centuries. My research tends to indicate that there is in fact a proto-Masonic significance to this number, and one which would have been of special importance to the founders of the United States, had they known about it. I shall discuss this possibility in due course.

At any rate, Masonic or not, the number 13 is undeniably the most omnipresent, most repeated symbol on the one dollar bill, although its use is not always explicit. Most of these examples are found on the back of the bill. The pyramid on the left has thirteen layers, not including the eye at the top. Above the head of the eagle on the right, there is a constellation of thirteen pentagonal stars, arranged in the shape of a six-pointed star. There are thirteen leaves on the olive branch in his right talon, and thirteen "Jonathan arrows", as they are called, in his right. There are thirteen horizontal divisions on the eagle's shield, and thirteen vertical ones. The motto "E Pluribus Unum", written on the banner in his beak, contains thirteen letters. So too does the motto "Annuit Coeptis", written above the pyramid on the left. Furthermore, if you add the number of letters in "Novus Ordo Seclorum" and "MDCCLXXVI" ("1776" in Roman numerals) written below the pyramid, you get 26, or two sets of thirteen. On the front of the bill, at the base of the portrait of George Washington, on each side there are eight leaves and five berries, indicating another two sets of thirteen. There are also thirteen stars on the chevron on the seal of the Treasury Department that is featured to the right of George Washington, overlaying the word "ONE."

Clearly these allusions to the number thirteen are no accident. This truth is compounded by the letters in permanently featured words on the front of the dollar bill (that is, words not contingent upon any changing circumstance, such as the name of the US Treasurer). These words include: "FEDERAL RESERVE NOTE"; "THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA"; THIS NOTE IS LEGAL TENDER FOR ALL DEBTS PUBLIC AND PRIVATE"; "WASHINGTON, D.C."; "ONE"; "TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES"; "SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY"; "ONE DOLLAR; and "WASHINGTON." The total number of letters in these words is 169, or 13 squared.

Returning to the back of the bill, there would appear to be exactly thirteen examples of the use of the number 13 there. But in order for this to be correct, you have to count "IN GOD WE TRUST." Of course, there are only twelve letters in this phrase, but occupying the same space in the center on the back of the bill is the word "ONE", implying that we should add 1 to this sum and make 13. In addition, there are, on the front of the bill, four 1s at the corners of an inner rectangle on the front of the bill that is exactly thirteen centimeters long.

These 1s are part of a larger pattern, for in addition to the repeated use of the number 13, the number 1, or the word “one”, is used profusely, much more than necessary to identify the denomination of the bill. The concept of “unity” could in fact be said to be the real underlying theme of the one-dollar-bill. And rightly so: it represents, after all, the original unit of currency upon which the American economic system is founded. It is the blueprint upon which all other dollar bills are based, and when we think of the American dollar, the first image that pops into our minds is the one dollar bill. As the official representation of the original unit underpinning the economy, its unity is expressed with the plenteous use of “1”, the central placement of “ONE” on the back of the bill, and the use of the motto “E Pluribus, Unum” (“Out of Many, One”) underneath a constellation of thirteen stars, representing the original colonies that were “unified” at the creation of the United States. The theme of “one” is continued with the use of the first American President, George Washington, on the front of the bill, and with the word “ONE” written next to him. As well, I would include the symbol of the pyramid on the back, which according to the designers of this emblem, was meant to represent the ideal state, made up of individuals (the stones) unified into one structure (the pyramid), under the divine unifying principle (the All-Seeing Eye of Providence).

Other strange features include the words “Annuit Coeptis” (“He [meaning God] favors our undertaking”) and “Novus Ordo Seclorum” (“The New Order of the Ages”). These are both based on quotes from the Roman poet Virgil, although they have been slightly altered, and both quotes referred in their original context to “Juppiter Omnipotes” ("Omnipotent Jupiter"), essentially the Roman equivalent of the Judeo-Christian Almighty God. (Interestingly, "E Pluribus Unum" is also a quote from Virgil slightly altered, and some see in these alterations a numerological significance.) In the original Virgil poem, the words "Juppiter Omnipotes, Audacibus Annue Coeptis" were a plea for the deity to "favor my daring undertakings." The words on the back of the dollar bill not only plea for, but confidently declare God's favor upon the "daring undertaking" there represented: the creation of a "New Order of the Ages", or a new global power structure, headed by the newly-created republic of the United States. For these symbols and words belong not just to the dollar bill: they are part of the Great Seal of the United States, created in 1776, at the same time the nation was founded. It is the front and back side of the Great Seal which is represented on the back of the dollar bill.

The design of the Great Seal has never been ascribed to any one individual, and it has evolved a bit over the years. But the essentials of the design were sketched out right at the beginning, in 1776, the year of the Revolution, emblazoned in Roman numerals beneath the pyramid on the back of the seal. That's right: the roundel featuring the eye above the pyramid is actually the reverse side of the Great Seal, and the roundel featuring the eagle is really the front. It is the front of the Seal which is used to seal official US documents, not the back.

Several people are known to have contributed to the design of both sides of the Seal, including Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, William Barton, Charles Thomson, and Pierre Eugene du Simitiere, and all but one were Freemasons. The first metal die for the Seal was cut by Robert Scot, a Freemason, in 1782. However, although dies were commissioned for both the front and the back of the Seal, only the front was actually cut.

None was made for the back of the Seal until much later, and most people were not aware that their national Seal had a back to it at all until it appeared on the dollar bill in 1935. Thirty-third degree Freemason and historian Manly P. Hall wrote that the reverse of the seal was not originally used, "because it was regarded as a symbol of a secret society and not the proper device for a sovereign state."

Just like the Great Seal, the one dollar bill was also designed by a group of Freemasons working for the government; in this case, President Franklin Roosevelt, Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, and Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, although the design was executed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing (which employed exactly thirteen engravers). It was Wallace's suggestion that the front and back of the Great Seal be used on the reverse of the dollar. He originally wanted the front of the seal to be on the left, and the back of the seal to be on the right, which makes sense logically. But it was President Roosevelt who suggested switching that order, and putting the more interesting reverse of the seal on the left, which made more sense intuitively, since the Western eye naturally reads words and images from left to right.

"In God We Trust" was not placed on the bill until 1957. However, it was originally made the national motto of the United States in 1863 at the suggestion of Treasury Secretary Salmon P. Chase, who himself had supposedly been prompted to do so by a protestant minister concerned with the waning of religious fervor in the American public. This man purportedly wanted to ensure that the US would always be officially grounded in faith in divine Providence, and thus this motto has been put on all American coins ever since, although it did not appear on paper currency until much later. But "In God We Trust" is indeed a Masonic motto – one used in almost all Masonic rituals, in which the participants must pledge to always put their “trust in God” during the ceremonies – and this specific phrase can be found in Masonic dictionaries. Its appearance on the dollar bill in the 1950s may have been meant to bolster a currency increasingly dependant on faith due to changes in American monetary policy.

Chapter Two: In God We Trust

Major changes to the very nature of American money began in the 1930s, right around the time that the new one-dollar-bill was being designed. In an effort to help America climb out of the Great Depression, Roosevelt began employing the economic policies of advisor John Meynard Keynes. He suggested that, during times in which the private sector was not producing enough investment to stimulate the economy, the government should become the investor, financing public works, and dumping money into the system in whatever way possible to grow the economy. Thus Roosevelt instituted the "New Deal", creating an "alphabet soup" of bureaucracies, many of which have now become mainstays of federal government. Among these was the FDIC, or Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which insured bank accounts to a limited amount in the event of a bank's failure – something that was necessary after a number of bank failures had occurred in the previous years. It may not be an accident that "FDIC" implies the word "fiducial", a financial term with its roots in the Latin word "fides", which means "trust, confidence, reliance, credence, belief, faith…. credit." Fides was symbolized in the Mithraic mysteries by two hands clasped together, now a common Masonic motif, and the logo of Allstate Insurance. Coins whose face value is more than their metallic content are called "fiduciary tokens" because they require faith to be of value. For similar reasons, "trust" is a financial term that can mean, according to Webster's Dictionary, "confidence in the certainty of future payment for property or goods received"; or, "a fiduciary relationship in which a trustee holds title to property for the beneficiary"; or even, “any large corporation or combination having monopolistic or semi-monopolistic control over the production of a commodity or service.”

It was “faith” and “trust” in the American dollar that Roosevelt and his friends were attempting to create with the new design of the one-dollar-bill. That faith was sorely needed, for in order to free up the money required to finance the New Deal, Roosevelt had to institute sweeping changes to the country’s monetary policy. He removed the dollar from the gold standard to which it had been implicitly set, so that he could have the money supply greatly expanded with no predetermined limit. It worked to stabilize the economy just in time for the United States to enter WWII, which turned out to be another great economic stimulator.

As part of removing the gold standard, Roosevelt had laws passed forcing US citizens to give all of the gold and silver that they owned to the government, in exchange for an equivalent amount of paper dollars. Americans’ faith in the new system was severely tested the following year when the government devalued the dollar relative to gold, thus causing all who had made the exchange to lose 41% of the value of their money.

On July 22, 1946, at the end of WWII, an agreement was signed at a conference between 44 nations in which the other countries agreed to value their currencies in relation to the dollar, rather than gold, silver, or anything else. The US then set the value of the dollar at $35 per ounce of gold, and agreed to redeem dollars held by the central banks of other nations with gold upon demand. However, this led to a steady loss of US gold reserves, until finally, in 1971, President Richard Nixon closed the “gold window”, announcing that the holdings of foreign central banks would no longer be redeemed for gold by the US government.

This was the final step in abandoning the gold standard. Now the value of the dollar floats freely in relation to foreign currencies, with no fixed standard of value. The value of a dollar can only be manipulated by the market forces of the economy, and by the actions of the Federal Reserve. The result has been rapidly expanding inflation, which began during the Nixon years, and which has been felt by all the foreign currencies that were pegged to the dollar. Many of these currencies have repeatedly failed, and the governments of their countries have remained continually insolvent ever since.

So the dollar that we now use is one backed entirely by faith alone – the public's faith in the US economy, and America itself. The economies of other nations are dependent upon this faith as well. For if no one believed in the power of the dollar – if it was not universally accepted as a form of payment – then it would have no value. As Jack Weatherford writes in The History of Money:

The government will not redeem a dollar bill for anything other than another dollar bill. The dollar is simply fiat currency. The dollar rests on the power of the government and the faith of the people who use it – faith that it will be able to buy some thing tomorrow, faith that the US government will continue to exist and to accept dollars in payment of taxes and pay them out in expenses, and faith that other people will continue to believe in it. Aside from that faith, nothing backs up the dollar.

Likewise, William Greider wrote in Secrets of the Temple: How the Federal Reserve Runs the Country that:

'Above all, money [is] a function of faith. It [requires] an implicit and universal social consent that [is] indeed mysterious. To create money and use it, each one must believe, and everyone must believe. Only then [do] the worthless pieces of paper take on value. When a society [loses] faith in money, it [is] implicitly losing faith in itself… The money process… [requires] a deep, unacknowledged act of faith, so mysterious that it could easily be confused with divine powers.

Of course, even before paper money became widely used, the worth of gold and silver coins rested on a similar social contract – a common, agreed-upon value. The difference is that gold and silver have intrinsic value, and when these coins were used in the past, their value was roughly equal (when made properly) to the value of the metal of which they consisted. But our current paper dollars are "fiat currency" – representations of wealth that exists on paper only until they are used to purchase something.

The use of paper money was not new to America in 1935. It has been used throughout our history, beginning with the "Continentals" which financed the Revolutionary War. These were backed with nothing more than the promise that America would win the war, and begin collecting taxes from its citizens. A similar gamble was taken during the Civil War, which was financed by "Greenbacks", forebears of the modern paper dollar. In addition to these two currencies, each of which were issued by the federal government, there were, throughout the United States' early history, many paper dollars in circulation that were issued by privately-owned banks throughout the various states. These dollars differed widely in appearance from one another, which led to massive counterfeiting, and when the banks failed, which they often did, the dollars became worthless. Numerous measures were taken by the federal government in attempts to control this problem. Finally, in 1913, a series of banking collapses inspired the creation of the nation's new central bank, the Federal Reserve, and a new banking and monetary system, the Federal Reserve System.

The Federal Reserve (a.k.a. "The Fed") is now the United States' national bank. It is both quasi-governmental and privately-owned. It sets the basic operating policies for all of its member banks (which includes most of the banks in the U.S.), and provides them with their money supply. The process they use to supply this money, "fractional reserve lending", is not new. It is almost as old as banking itself. But when backed by a powerful dynamo like the Fed, which created tremendous faith in the integrity of the money supply, the new money system became an unstoppable force.

In fractional reserve lending, a bank can take the money from its depositors' accounts, and lend it out to various persons or institutions on interest. It can loan out the vast majority of the money deposited (say, 87%), leaving only a fraction (13%) in the bank's vaults. This fraction is called the "reserve", and it is the only actual money sitting in the bank, backing all of the various loans - the only money that is really ready to be withdrawn, should the depositors choose to take money from their accounts.

When the loans are paid back, the bank earns a profit from the interest. Thus, the bank has caused its depositors' money to multiply, and has kept the difference for itself, essentially creating money out of nothing. If the bank has loaned money to another bank or financial institution, that institution can then loan it out and create even more money out of nothing. Or they can loan it to a person or business who can use it earn more money by producing goods and services that are sold. This money is then spent into the economy again. Thus the money supply multiplies exponentially, and the economy itself acts as a money multiplier – a manna machine, in a way. Money can always be used to make more money.

Now since the Federal Reserve is the point of origin for this money, the load initially injected into the system is sometimes called "high-powered money", because it effects the whole economy. It is the (comparatively) tiny mustard seed which causes the rest of the money supply to grow. The interest rate which the Fed chooses to set for the money it lends determines how much money will be borrowed by other banks at that time, and also determines the rate that those banks will charge for loaning money. This is the primary way in which the Federal Reserve controls the money supply, and thus, as much as possible, the American economy. Too much money being loaned out (and thus created) leads to inflation, and too little leads to recession. When the Fed first loans it out to the member banks, the money is "created", and each time those banks lend it out, they are breeding more. As Martin Mayer writes in The Fed: The Inside Story of How the World's Most Powerful Financial Institution Drives the Markets:

… The Fed's actions were always and necessarily pretty small by comparison with the effects desired, and their effectiveness was explained by the operation of a 'multiplier' inherent in a system where banks had to keep 'reserves' against some fraction of their liabilities. The bank that received the Fed's 'high-powered money' might lend 90 percent of it, and the bank that received the proceeds of that loan would lend 90 percent of that, producing deposits in another bank that would lend 90 percent of that, etc…

It is no wonder, then, that some see the way in which fiat currency can be simply "created", especially paper and electronic money, as nothing short of magic. In 1705, Scottish philosopher John Law wrote in his book, Money and Trade Considered with a Proposal for Supplying the Nation with Money, that he had discovered the "Philosopher's Stone" of the alchemists, which could purportedly turn lead into gold, or dross into something valuable. The key to alchemy, he said, was the printing of paper money, and in 1715 he was hired by the French government to put his theories into action. Law was put in charge of France's national Banque Royale, as well as the Mississippi Company, which gathered investments from French citizens to finance operations in French Louisiana, promising the investors profit payments. He set up a paper-passing scheme between the bank and the company, in which investors could borrow paper money printed by the bank to invest in the company. They were expected to pay the bank in gold, while the company paid their profits in the bank's paper money, which was supposedly redeemable in gold. The whole scheme collapsed dramatically in what became known as "the Great Mississippi Bubble", and Law fled in disgrace, dying shortly thereafter. But his ideas went on to influence German writer and Freemason Wolfgang von Goethe.

In Goethe's classic play, Faust, the title character and his teacher, Mephistopheles (the Devil), gain the favor of the emperor by offering him the secret of alchemy: how to create wealth by printing paper money. Soon the emperor presides over a robust economy and a licentious, materialistic people. But the currency eventually collapses, just as all the Devil's creations turn out, in this play, to be illusions.

It is my belief that the Freemasons and other occultists who have been responsible for creating the United States, designing the dollar bill, and engineering our economy have understood the principles of alchemy, and have purposely chosen to construct our economy upon these principles. They are the principles of creating worth from worthlessness, and for creating a large volume from a small one, using the power of faith. I submit that the creation of money by the Federal Reserve, and its exponential multiplication by the procedures of the banking system, is analogous to the creation and multiplication of gold in alchemy. The power of money to transform almost any thing or situation into another is similar to the alchemical power of the so-called "universal agent" or "Philosopher's Stone", and the act of turning paper into dollars is like turning lead into gold. The members of the Federal Reserve Board are in many ways like sorcerers, conjuring wealth seemingly out of thin air and distributing it at will to transform the American economy according to their desires. The dollar is "fiat currency", declared into existence by the central bank in a manner similar to the creation of the universe by the divine words "Fiat Lux!" - "Let there be light!" Fiat money (best exemplified by the American dollar) is perhaps the only thing that truly means nothing, and has no independent existence, except in relation to something else (i.e., what it can buy, or be converted into). Yet it is the most powerful force within the human sphere of life – like the "Azoth", or secret essence of life spoken of in alchemical texts. If one examined the history of the dollar prior to the formation of the Federal Reserve in 1913, one could easily conclude that most of these magical principles were at work in the American economy from the very beginning.

As stated, this system depends entirely on a religious faith by the American people in the supernatural power of the dollar. The ability of the United States President and other elected officials to uphold and improve the economy depends largely upon their ability to manipulate the spiritual will of the people, in much the same way that a priest or a magician would, inspiring them to have faith in the value of the dollar. This faith is reinforced by the financial terminology currently in use ("trust", "fiducial", "credit", etc.), as well as by watchwords and symbols found on American money – not only on the bills and coins we presently use, but on currently dating back from before the formation of the Republic. These objects thus act as magical charms, containing a unit of magical charge that is passed on from one person to the next, and multiplied as the money changes hands. They also act as tokens of communal trust in, and fidelity to, the dollar as an institution. The symbols and key phrases associated with it thus work to enchant the public into a mass hypnotic spell, in which the mind of each individual confirms the consensus belief in the power of a dollar, and its ability to multiply itself as it moves through the system. Every time a person spends a dollar, or accepts a dollar as payment, they are confirming their belief in the dollar, and using it to exercise their spiritual will.

Now the mysterious markings on the dollar bill can be understood. The words "In God We Trust" are meant to inspire faith in the dollar as a currency, and faith in the American republic. One should trust the dollar the way one trusts in God, for it is implied that God himself has chosen to favor the U.S. and, by extension, the dollar. This is communicated by the message on the reverse of the Great Seal, "Annuit Coeptis" – "He [God] favors our undertaking." The words "E Pluribus Unum" and the other twelve examples of "one" on the bill, along with the pyramid, remind us that our society is made up of various parts that are essentially united. Money is the great uniter, since it is the one thing that everyone in the country uses, and each dollar can continually be passed from person to person, potentially reaching millions. The spider web motif in the background of the bill's design illustrates how we are all connected through the web of commerce. The bald eagle on the front of the Great Seal looks a bit peculiar. Masonic expert Manly P. Hall claimed that it was meant to secretly represent the phoenix, the mythical bird which eternally dies and is reborn, and which is a symbol of transformation in alchemy. (Indeed, the original proposals for the design of the Seal did call for a phoenix instead.)

Even the green color of U.S. dollars is symbolic, representing fecundity, plenteousness, and growth. Former U.S. Treasurer Mary Ellen Withrow explicitly stated in an interview with New Yorker Magazine that this is why the color green is used. This too is the reason why there is foliage all over the one dollar bill, including olive branches, oak leaves, laurel wreaths, and holly. But there have been representations of vegetation all over American money since colonial times, including corn, cotton, wheat, and tobacco. In fact, wheat is one of the most commonly depicted motifs on money from throughout the world and throughout the history. It was even on the first coins ever minted, as I will explain later on.

For now, though, we will examine the role that the Freemasons have played in the foundation of America, the ancient plan for the colonization of the continent, and the role that money has played in the formation of the Republic. This will lead us to a greater understanding of the magic at the heart of the dollar.

Chapter Three: Plus Ultra

As discussed in the previous chapters, members of Freemasonry and other secret societies were largely responsible for the settlement of North America, the American Revolution, and the formation of the United States. But the plan to create a Masonic utopia in North America started much earlier. In fact, it started before the Order of Freemasons was officially founded, in the early to mid-seventeenth century (the exact date is not certain). Freemasonry has its roots largely in a medieval order of warrior-monks called the Knights Temple, who fought for Europe during the Crusades. I will get into the subject of the Templars at length later on, but for now it will suffice to say that the Templars are believed to have possessed an esoteric wisdom doctrine, and a secret goal of creating their own "philosophic empire" in the West, based on this doctrine. This put them at odds with the existing powers: the Catholic Church, and the ruling houses of Europe. They paid heavily for it, and the Order was suppressed in 1307.

The Templar leadership consisted of a close-knit group of noble families, who continued the Order's tradition after it was disbanded. One of these families was the Sinclairs, or Saint-Claires, of France and Scotland. The Sinclairs are purported to have been responsible for the development of an early form of Freemasonry in Scotland that was heavily steeped in Templar tradition. They commissioned the building of the elaborately-decorated Rosslyn Chapel in Scotland, which became "Lodge Number 1" for this proto-Masonic fraternity.

One of the hereditary lords of Rosslyn was Prince Henry Sinclair, also called "Prince Henry the Navigator." In addition to belonging to a traditional Templar family, Henry could trace his roots back to the legendary Viking explorers whom historians believe may have explored North America long prior to Christopher Columbus. Not only that, Henry was a member of the Knights of Christ, which was essentially a Templar spin-off group, created by former Templars, with a focus on sea-faring.

True to his heritage, Prince Henry decided to do some exploring of his own, or so the story goes. He allegedly acquired a map of North America from a Venetian explorer named Nicolas Zeno. Then in 1398, Nicholas and his son Antonia, along with 200-300 soldiers, are said to have sailed in twelve ships to visit Greenland and the East Coast of North America. It is from Antonio Zeno's son that we get the account of the voyage, as well as a copy of the map allegedly used. Nobody is sure if his account is true. However, Rosslyn Chapel was embellished with plant motifs of maize and aloe, which are native to the Americas, causing many authors to speculate that the Sinclairs came to know of these plants because of Prince Henry's voyage to America.

In-between the time of Prince Henry's purported voyage and the formal establishment of Freemasonry, there were many proto-Masonic, neo-Templar groups working in Europe to continue the Templar tradition. They were also actively plotting to establish the Templars' dreamed-of "philosophic empire." There were groups calling themselves "Knights of the Rose-Cross", or "Rosicrucians." Other groups with different names nonetheless described themselves as having a "Rosicrucian philosophy."

The rose-cross is a multifaceted symbol with many layers of meaning. Certainly the Knights Templar had a red equilateral cross as one of their emblems, and thus could be called a "rosy cross." But the real rose-cross symbol actually showed a red rose at the center of a white cross, and specifically represented ancient, hidden wisdom. Like the Templars before them, and the Freemasons after, these Rosicrucian groups believed they were perpetuating divine secrets from the high cultures of antiquity: Greece, Rome, Egypt, Israel, Chaldea, and Persia.

This kind of knowledge had largely been suppressed, from the Dark Ages onward, by the Catholic Church, as well as by other Christian churches, and by the monarchs who depended on the support of these churches for their survival. But more than that, these existing power structures also actively suppressed the pursuit of new discoveries in science, new philosophies, and the expanding of human knowledge, for fear that the spread of such things would threaten their power. (Indeed, their fears turned out to be well-founded, for it was these ideas that ultimately toppled the monarchies and smashed the iron rule of the Church.) The Rosicrucians and proto-Masons believed that if a system of government could be set up somewhere that was not beholden to any church, or to any royal house, then its citizens would be free to learn these ancient truths and explore these new ideas. Then they could export their wisdom, and their enlightened form of government, to the rest of the world.

One of these groups was called the Order of the Helmet, to which belonged British aristocrat, lawyer, and philosopher Sir Francis Bacon. The “helmet” in their title referred to the plumed headgear traditionally worn by the Greek goddess Pallas Athena, whom they revered as a personification of wisdom. It is not known if this is the same secret society which Bacon went on to lead himself, or if he simply took inspiration from the Order of the Helmet when creating his own fraternity. Nonetheless, he was the leader of such a group, the real name of which remains unknown to the public, but which has been cryptically referred to as “the Baconian Circle” by chroniclers. Some of the most influential and forward-thinking men in Europe belonged to this group, including Sir Robert Moray, who would become one of the main contributors to the development of Freemasonry.

Bacon himself was a prominent figure in Queen Elizabeth's court, and in English Parliament. He was also one of the founders of, and a main stockholder in, the Virginia Company, which set up an English colony in Roanoke, Virginia. Some authors say that the colony was his idea, and that it was all part of the grand plan. According to Masonic scholar Manly P. Hall in The Secret Destiny of America:

The English program [of colonizing America] was under the direction of Sir Francis Bacon, and it was his genius that gave purpose to the enterprise… he was the head of a secret society including in its members the most brilliant intellectuals of his day. All these men were bound together by a common oath to labor in the cause of a world democracy. Bacon's society of the unknown philosophers included men of high rank and broad influence. Together with Bacon, they devised the colonization scheme.

To understand Francis Bacon's ultimate vision for the new colony in America, we need only read the treatise he wrote on the ideal philosophic empire, a utopian fantasy called The New Atlantis. For anybody who does not know, Atlantis was, according to a legend recounted by Plato, a perfect "empire of the gods" that supposedly existed prior to the Deluge. Bacon saw the idea of a re-created Atlantis as the perfect metaphor to use for the kingdom of wisdom he wished to establish in America, with hopes that the form of government planted there would spread throughout the world.

To communicate these concepts, Bacon used a fictional device. He described sailors on a ship departing Peru, bound for China, who are accidentally blown off course, and wash ashore in a previously unknown land with an existing high civilization. The capitol of this land is a "Wise Man's City", as Bacon described it, called "Bensalem", or "Son of Peace." This word could also be interpreted to mean "New Jerusalem", and that would be appropriate, for in The New Atlantis, Bensalem is ruled by a society of "philosophers" called "Solomon's house, or the college of the six days work."

This last part referred to the six days it took for God to create the universe, according to Genesis. When applied to the group called "Solomon's house", the term "college of the six days work" indicated that these philosophers were engaged in the study of the very secrets of creation. In the words of William Rawley, who wrote the introduction to The New Atlantis, Solomon's house was "instituted for the interpreting of nature, and the producing of great and marvelous works, for the benefit of men…" The doorway leading to the headquarters of Solomon's house said the following:

The end of our foundation is the knowledge of causes, and secret motions of things; and the enlarging of the bounds of human empire, to the effecting of all things possible.

Manly P. Hall thought that Bacon's work inspired that of the colonizers of America during his lifetime, and afterwards, as well as the founders of the new republic. Furthermore, he felt that Bacon had correctly predicted how the U.S. would use trade to export the philosophic truths on which it was founded. As Hall put it:

…Bensalem maintained a trade with all parts of the world, but not for gold, silver, jewels, silks, spices, or any other material commodity; its merchandise was the Light of Truth. Among the nations it traded with was Atlantis, which was declared [by Bacon] to be the same as America.

The idea of comparing America to Atlantis is fitting, for Plato said that Atlantis was just beyond the "Pillars of Hercules", which marked the Straits of Gibraltar and, according to ancient thinking, the limits of possible sea travel. In fact, on the title page of Bacon's New Atlantis there was a graphic which depicted a ship sailing between two columns, representing the Pillars of Hercules. The age of exploration and the discovery of America proved that there was indeed a world beyond the Pillars. For this reason the words "Plus Ultra", which mean "More Beyond" in Latin, were written on early Spanish silver dollar coins circulated amongst the colonists. These words were accompanied by a depiction of the two columns. The Pillars of Hercules have been linked symbolically with the two columns that supposedly flanked the entrance to the Temple of Poseidon in Atlantis. They were represented by the two pillars outside the Temple of Hercules on the island of Tyre, which was the architectural model for the Temple of Solomon. Also, the two pillars outside of Solomon's Temple, named Jachin and Boaz, play a very important role in Masonic ritual.

The Latin words for the Pillars of Hercules were "Columnae Herculis", the "columnae" being the plural of "columna", meaning "column" or "pillar." This is further related to "columen", meaning "that which is raised on high." Is the basis for yet another Latin word, "columba", meaning a "dove" or "pigeon." Doves hold a very significant place in religious traditions from throughout the world and throughout history. They were the sacred companions of the Middle Eastern goddesses Semiramis and Ishtar, the Egyptian Isis, the Roman Venus, and the Greek Pallas Athena. In Judaism and Christianity they were associated with peace.

One reason for this is the dove's appearance in the story of the Flood of Noah. According to Genesis, when Noah's Ark was perched atop Mt. Ararat, Noah sent out a dove to survey the land. When it came back with an olive branch in its beak, he knew that the waters had begun to subside, and that it would soon be safe to leave the Ark. (It is interesting, then, that the front of America's Great Seal does feature a bird, in this case an eagle, holding an olive branch.)

Another story involving a dove, this time from Greek myth, evokes many of the same themes. It is part of the saga of Jason and the Argonauts, sailing in their ship, the Argo, in search of the Golden Fleece. ("Argo" is related to the word "Ark.") Their ship was attempting to pass through the Symplegades, two rocks marking the passage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean Sea that were continually smashing against each other. Jason, the pilot of the Argo, sent a dove through the passage to see if it was possible to make it across without getting smashed. The bird made it safely through with the help of the Pallas Athena, and afterwards so did the ship. Later on, the dove, named Columba, was placed in the sky by Athena as a constellation, where it forever guides the Argo, which was also made into a constellation. These two star clusters are often associated symbolically with Noah's Ark.

It is interesting that the continents of both North and South America were originally called "Columbia", after their supposed discoverer, Christopher Columbus.

The name is retained in the name of the South American country of Columbia, the Canadian province British Columbia, the Columbia Gorge between the U.S. states of Washington and Oregon, and of course, the U.S. capitol, Washington, District of Columbia. Just like the Athena of the Greeks, the Marianne of the French, and the Britannia of England, Columbia became personified as the national goddess of the United States, depicted on numerous coins and government monuments. On early designs for the Great Seal of the United States, artist and Freemason William Barton had even included a depiction of Columbia holding a dove.

So is there any possible link between Columbia, Columbus, and Columba the dove? Well, the word "columbus" is simply a masculine form of "columba", and thus means "a male dove." Could the explorer have been given this name because he was sent out by the king and queen of Spain to explore beyond the Pillars of Hercules in search of a new passage to India, just as the dove Columba was sent ahead of the Argo to seek passage through the Symplegades?

Many authors have suggested that Christopher Columbus was working under the influence of a secret society of neo-Templars or proto-Masons. Citing a 1937 book by Spyros Cateras called Christopher Columbus was a Greek, Manly P. Hall asserted that "the real name of Columbus was Prince Nikolaos Ypsilantis, and he came from the Greek island of Chios." This is in contrast to the common understanding that Columbus was Italian. It is also commonly believed that Columbus was, like most people in his time, illiterate. But Manly. Hall believed the exact opposite, writing in The Secret Destiny of America that:

All modern research on the life of Columbus tends to prove that he was not a man of humble station, poor, or uneducated… Columbus is emerging as a man of impressive personality with marked abilities as a leader and organizer and an excellent classical education.

Many of us were taught in school that Columbus could not even write his own name, but rather signed his contract with Ferdinand and Isabella the way all illiterate people did in those days – with an "X." The truth, according to Manly Hall, is much different. His signature did contain the letter "X", twice in fact. But it went like this:

X POFERENS

This purportedly stood for a cipher which could be interpreted to mean: "Salvus Christus, Maria, Yosephus – Christopher" – the names of Christ, Mary, Joseph, and then his own. As Manly Hall put it, "The signature of Columbus composed of letters curiously arranged and combined with cabalistic designs, certainly conveys more than is inherent in the signature of a private citizen."

By this he means that Columbus was acting as the agent of a secret society, specifically the same "society of unknown philosophers" which Hall believed was later led by Sir Francis Bacon. Perhaps significantly, Bacon mentioned in The New Atlantis that in the fictional Bensalem stood a statue of Christopher Columbus on display. A possible third connection between Columbus and Bacon can be found in Manly Hall's report that Columbus "was inspired for his voyage by Plato's account of the lost Atlantis and the records of early navigation to the West… Columbus sailed his little ships for a land which by the writings of ancient philosophers he knew existed."

Indeed, Columbus may have had direct, inside access to maps and records of the voyages of Prince Henry Sinclair to America. According to several sources, Columbus' father-in-law was, like Prince Henry himself, a member of the Knights Templar offshoot group, the Knights of Christ. Some sources even claim that Columbus' father-in-law was a captain on one of Henry Sinclair's ships, thus providing Columbus with direct, second-hand knowledge of how to sail to America. It may be significant that Columbus' ships sailed under banners showing a red cross on a white field, one of the symbols of the Knights Templar.

In addition to these possible influences, Manly P. Hall described a mysterious, unnamed stranger who purportedly influenced Columbus, and was present on his first trip to America. As Hall told it:

… in browsing among old records, I have run across a dim figure involved in the life of Columbus, a strange man who seems to have served the explorer in the capacity of counselor. Nothing very tangible has yet come to light, but it is hinted that this mysterious person accompanied Columbus on his first voyage. He was not included in the list of mariners. He did not return, but remained in the West Indies; beyond this, no further mention in made of him.

This person was, according to Hall, Columbus' handler and controller, guiding him in his work on behalf of the "society of unknown philosophers."

So is it possible that, prior to his voyage, Columbus had already been tipped off about America, via a network of secret societies, and that it was not a passage to India he was seeking, but rather the "New Atlantis" later envisioned by Francis Bacon? A provocative passage from Ignatius Donnelly's classic, Atlantis: The Antediluvian World, seems to indicate this:

When Columbus sailed to discover a new world, or re-discover an old one, he took his departure from a Phoenician seaport [the island of Chios], founded by that great race two thousand five hundred years previously. This Atlantean sailor, with his Phoenician features, sailing from an Atlantean port, simply re-opened the path of commerce and colonization which had been closed when Plato's island sunk in the sea. And it is a curious fact that Columbus had the antediluvian world in his mind's eye even then, for when he reached the mouth of the Orinoco he thought it was the river Gihon, that flowed out of Paradise, and he wrote home to Spain, 'There are here great indications suggesting the proximity of the earthly Paradise, for not only does it correspond in mathematical position with the opinion of the holy and learned theologians, but all other signs concur to make it probable.'

In a similar vein, Michael Howard writes of Columbus that:

... [he] believed when he landed in America that God had led him to the New Jerusalem.

The name “America” for the two Columbian continents is of ambiguous origin. The common belief is that the word comes from the name of Amerigo Vespucci, an Italian mapmaker who created maps based on Columbus’ “discoveries.” Supposedly the continents were named by accident when people mistook Vespucci’s signature on the map to be a place-name. However, other authors have suggested that it was no accident at all. Prior to being hired for exploration by Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, Columbus had been under the employ of King Rene d’Anjou, the duke of Lorraine in France. D’Anjou’s family was highly connected to the old families of the Knights Templar, and to the esoteric circles that would eventually evolve into Freemasonry. Vespucci was employed by d’Anjou for a time as well, and it was at King Rene’s salon in Sion-Vaudemont where atlas books containing Vespucci’s maps were produced. The editor of one of these atlases wrote in it that the newly-discovered continents should be named after Amerigo Vespucci. Author John Noble Wilford, in The Mysterious History of Columbus, suggests that Columbus may have found America with inside information provided by Rene d’Anjou, and that the editor of the atlas may have named the place after Vespucci in order to deny Columbus credit for the discovery. In this version of the story, d’Anjou was angry at Columbus for using the information about America to benefit a rival royal bloodline, the Hapsburgs of Spain.

However, some authors believe that the word “America” has nothing to do with Amerigo Vespucci, but rather that it is a word with a hidden meaning known only to the secret societies that settled the continent. In 1895 the magazine Lucifer, published by

H.P. Blavatsky's Theosophical Society, ran an article alleging that the name came from a native Peruvian word "Amaruca", meaning "Land of the Plumed Serpent", a reference to the tall, white, bearded man-god whom native South American legends say brought civilization to the continent in antediluvian times. Manly P. Hall also believed that this was the origin of the word "America."

But more contemporary Masonic historians, Christopher Knight and Robert Lomas, have postulated in their book The Hiram Key a quite different origin for the word "America." They connect it to the Mandeans, a Middle Eastern Gnostic sect influenced by the teachings of John the Baptist. The Mandeans were also connected with the Nasoreans, or "Qumranians", whom Knight and Lomas believe were responsible for depositing numerous secret scrolls beneath King Herod's Temple in Jerusalem (built on the foundations of Solomon's Temple.) Knight and Lomas believe that these scrolls were later discovered by the Knights Templar.

In the writings of the historian Josephus, it was recorded that the Mandeans believed that good people went to Paradise after death, to a land located West, beyond the ocean, and which was marked by a star called "Merica." The authors speculated the following:

We knew the Mandeans were the direct descendants of the Nasoreans, who we had also established were the same group as the Qumranians, the people who buried their sacred scrolls under Herod's Temple. It follows that if the forefathers of the Mandeans were the authors of the scrolls which the Templars unearthed, the mystical land beneath a star called 'Merica' might have been recorded in their secret writings. In short, it seemed possible that the Templars learnt about a wonderful land beneath the bright lone star 'Merica' from the scrolls, and if so, there is a strong possibility they sailed west to find it.

Whatever the case may be with regards to the origin of the words "Columbia" and "America", it seems fairly obvious that their development was not accidental. Perhaps the "mer" in "America" refers to the sea, as this syllable is part of the word for "sea' many languages. "America", then, may essentially mean "land beyond the sea", beyond the Straights of Gibraltar and the Pillars of Hercules. This root syllable is also part of the word "mercantile", originally referring to the traffic of goods by ship. It was mercantilism that quickly made America wealthy, prosperous, and dominant throughout the whole world. First, the discovery of the land beyond the pillars made the monarchs of the Old World rich. Then later, with the help of Freemasons, and with the development of the American dollar, wealth began to flow in the other direction.

Chapter Four: The Almighty Dollar

When Columbus discovered the Americas, purportedly while searching for a new route to India, he failed to acquire the vast quantities of silks and spices that he had been hoping to find in the East. However, the Spanish explorers who followed after him found that these "Indians" possessed treasures even greater than those of their counterparts in the East: voluminous hoards of silver and gold. To the natives, these metals were considered sacred because they were associated with the Sun and the Moon, whom they worshipped as gods. Thus, for example, the Aztecs and the Incas of Central America covered their religious temples and royal residences with gold. There were statues and other artifacts made of gold to be found everywhere.

The Spaniards quickly and easily conquered these Indian tribes. Then they seized the natives' gold and silver artifacts, and made them into ingots which were shipped back to Spain. Within fifty years Spain had processed all of the Indians' existing treasure into coins. They then began tapping the rich mines in Central and South America, with the help of labor provided by the conquered natives. This kept the treasure flowing back into Europe for almost another 300 years. The Portuguese, who also colonized the Americas, got into the business as well, and in 1695 began mining gold from Brazil using slaves imported from Africa. Between the years 1500 and 1800, it is estimated that about 165,000 tons of silver and 2846 tons of gold were shipped to Europe from the Americas, providing 70 percent of the world's gold output and 85 percent of its silver output. This was an unprecedented amount, and the sudden influx had an unprecedented impact upon the European economy. The first result became known as "the Great Price Revolution", where between the years 1540 and 1640, prices for goods and labor in Europe rose by 400 percent.

There is an economic rule that was little understood at this time: whenever there is too much money chasing too few goods, inflation will occur. In this case, the silver and gold from the New World was minted into coins for Europe. These coins were used to buy goods and services on a previously unseen scale. This raised the demand for those goods and services, and thus, the prices. The more gold and silver there was coming into the continent, the less valuable it was. Many of the goods being purchased with these coins were imported from France, England, Holland, and the East, while Spain and Portugal had few goods to export in exchange. Thus much of the gold and silver left these countries almost as quickly as it came.

For most of Europe, despite the inflation, the long-term economic effects of this sudden influx of coinage produced monumental changes in the structure of society. Before this, Europe was still shaking off the trappings of a feudalist society, with an economy based mostly on barter (although trade with coinage had been taking place with the help of Italian merchants, and before them, the Knights Templar, as I shall explain). At this time, many families still worked small plots of farmland owned by a noble lord to earn a subsistence living. They worked desperately each year to produce what they needed to eat, pay their taxes, pay their church tithes, and to pay their rent to their lord. Sometimes, through bartering, they were able to acquire other goods. Gold and silver coins were not being used by everyone. But after the colonization of America by Spain and Portugal, coins began to be used to pay for most things. This opened up the possibilities of economic exchange immensely. As Jack Weatherford explains in A History of Money:

The discovery of the great wealth of the Americas produced [an] immediate impact on the lives of common people… Professions that had traditionally depended upon money such as soldiers, artists, musicians, and tutors, now became even more focused on payment rather than on exchange of services such as room and board or rations paid in bread, alcohol and salt… Particularly in the seventeenth century, the new allocation of wealth gave rise to a middle class of merchants. They in turn spawned entirely new professions centered on money. As banking expanded, brokers appeared who specialized in the buying and selling of anything from real estate to shares in a trading voyage to China. Insurance men specialized in spreading out the risk of one voyage over many.

The result, more or less, of this influx of gold and silver was the creation of the merchant middle class. It allowed merchants and artisans to trade their goods more freely, to expand their overall wealth. Thus they could buy not only more goods and services, but also land and titles. Newly wealthy merchants could even buy their way into a marriage with a lady from a previously impregnable noble class. It was the greatest stride yet in the direction of toppling Europe's old order in favor of the system that would eventually be called Capitalism. The success of Capitalism in the future would be largely attributed to the success of the American dollar. But the dollar was not originally an American currency.

In the year 1516, just five years before the Spaniards began looting silver and gold from America, Count Stephan Hieronymus Schlick discovered major silver deposits near his ancestral home in Jachymov, Bohemia (now in the Czech Republic). His house, by the way, was called "the Castle of Joy", the same name given in the medieval Grail romance Perlesvaus to the Castle of the Holy Grail in which lived the fabled Fisher King. Even more interesting is that the name of the title character in that story, Perlesvaus (also called "Perceval" or "Parzival" in other versions) allegedly means "pierce the valley", and it was in the valley of Joachimstal in Jachymov that Count Schlick discovered his silver. Schlick did indeed pierce the valley, and he began not only mining the silver, but minting it into coins as well. These coins soon began being circulated all over Europe, where they became known as "talers", after the "tal" or "valley" from which they were minted.

In 1527, Georgius Agricola was hired as the "mine physician" for Joachimstal. Agricola had spent his education studying alchemy – the supposed art of turning lead into gold, usually the purview of magicians and occultists. Over the years he had become frustrated with his studies, but, as Jason Goodwin writes in the book Greenback, "in Joachimstal… he saw something more interesting: incontrovertible proof that men could turn dross into silver. Mining, he decided, was what alchemy was meant to be." And although obviously mining had been practiced among civilized man since the earliest days of history, it had never been properly studied or written about in a scientific manner. Agricola's De Re Metallica became the first such treatise, and its author became known as the "Father of Mineralogy."

As the talers of Joachimstal began to spread, their name became incorporated into many different languages, and eventually the name “talers”, or some derivation thereof, became the standard term for any large silver coin, especially in the Teutonic states. One taler, featuring the bust of Austrian Empress Maria Theresa, was issued in 1773, and became the most widely circulated taler in history. (Interestingly, Maria Theresa was married to the duke of Lorraine, the same title held by Rene d’Anjou, mentioned in the previous chapter as an employer of both Christopher Columbus and Amerigo Vespucci. The duke then became Holy Roman Emperor Francis I.)

This particular coin - the Maria Theresa dollar - was used all over the world, and was so loved that after Theresa’s death in 1780, governments continued to have them made, bearing the date of her death, up until as late as 1975. Even after the Holy Roman Empire, which had originally produced the coin, was abolished in 1805 by Napoleon, and the mint that produced them was closed, Napoleon had the coins reissued from another mint, exactly as they had been, bearing the 1780 date, and the mint mark of the original mint. They continued to be made in the Austrian Republic until 1937, when the country was captured by Hitler’s Germany, but Austria resumed making them between 1956 and 1975.

The Maria Theresa taler carried so much prestige that in some places, especially the Middle East and Northern Africa, they became synonymous with the concept of money itself, which is why Mussolini’s Italian government was forced to begin minting them after they took over Abyssinia (now Ethiopia) in 1935. Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Russia, England, and India all produced these exact same coins in the post-WWII era. Such is the power of the “coin of the realm”, to literally define reality. Both “realm” and "reality" have their roots in the word "real", meaning "royal" in Spanish and other languages. This is because the monarch defines what is "real" in his or her kingdom. As I have already mentioned, up until the creation of the United States, coins usually bore the face of the reigning monarch, and thus money became a powerful method for the monarch to remind his subjects of his ever-present influence. (This is still being done with British currency.) It was as though the monarch were putting his or her stamp of approval upon what was previously just a piece of metal, making it "real money." Every times a person uses the coin, he is transacting within the bounds of a system made "real" by the king's "rule." This connection is made explicit in the names of certain currencies, such as the Spanish "real", and the "rials" or "riyals" produced in Oman, Yemen, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar.

In 1497, not long after their hireling Christopher Columbus had returned from his first voyage to America, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of the Spanish House of Habsburg had a coin issued called a "peso", the value of which was eight "reales." When the Spaniards opened a mint in Mexico (soon to be one of the largest in the world), they began circulating the previously-mentioned coins featuring the Pillars of Hercules, and the words "Plus Ultra" ("More Beyond"). It was a lucky circumstance for the British colonists in America. For in the year 1695, the British government stopped exporting coins outside of its borders, even to its own colonies. Thus, the British colonists in North America were forced to acquire coins from the Spanish colonies in Mexico. The "Plus Ultra" peso became the most widely used coin amongst the thirteen British colonies, although they preferred to call them "pieces of eight" (referring to the eight reales they contained), or, more commonly, "dollars."

We can thank the early Scottish settlers in North America for the current name of the U.S. currency. Many of the early colonists were Scottish, eager to escape the direct English influence on the politics of their homeland. Many were also there because they had been expelled from the British Isles by the English government for being rabble-rousers and malcontents. These Scottish immigrants contributed greatly to the anti-British sentiment that began to develop in the colonies. Many of them fought in the Revolution, and contributed to the formation of the new republic. Of these, many were Freemasons, and Jacobites – that is, followers of the Masonically-aligned Stuart dynasty of Scotland. This royal house was directly related to Prince Henry the Navigator, a descendant of a family of famous Knights Templar, who purportedly sailed to America on a secret pre-Columbus mission on behalf of the Templar offshoot group the Knights of Christ.

In 1567, Scots Stuart King James VI commissioned the minting of the "sword dollar", so called because on the back it displayed the outline of a sword, a well-known motif of the Templars which often marked the graves of dead knights. In 1578, the same king issued a dollar bearing the image of a thistle, the symbol of his royal house. The Scottish royals chose to name their currency the "dollar", rather than the "Scottish pound sterling", as a challenge to the authority of the English monarchy. As Jack Weatherford explains in A History of Money:

The Scots used the name 'dollar' to distinguish their currency, and thereby their country and themselves, more clearly from their domineering English neighbors to the south. Thus, from very early usage, the word 'dollar' carried with it a certain anti-English or anti-authoritarian bias that many Scottish settlers took with them to their new homes in the Americas and other British colonies. The emigration of Scots accounts for much of the subsequent popularity of the word 'dollar' in British colonies around the world.

So in adopting the Spanish dollar as the American dollar, which the U.S. Congress did on July 6, 1785, the founders of America were being thoroughly American, because they were being anti-British. The U.S. did not establish its own mint until 1794. Even after that, since gold and silver were hard to come by, and the minting process expensive, the U.S. continued to circulate mostly Spanish silver dollars throughout much of the 1800s. So even though the U.S. did issue its own coins, the Spanish "pillar dollar" remained the "coin of the realm."

It is from the image on the pillar dollar that the dollar sign ($) is said by some historians to have been derived, originally made with two slashes through the "S" instead of one, as is commonly done now. The reason for the supposed relationship is because on the pillar dollar the words "Plus Ultra" were written on banners surrounding each of the two pillars. So the dollar sign would then represent a pillar, or pillars, encoiled within a banner. This would then encompass, within a simple hieroglyph, all which is implied about America by the words "Plus Ultra" and the Pillars of Hercules – that America is the great New World dreamt of by the philosophers of old. The symbol is though to have been chosen for the dollar by Thomas Jefferson, who certainly would have understood its import. Jefferson was also responsible, according to author Jason Goodwin, for deciding that the dollar would be divided into 100 cents, and thus based on the decad, or ten. He reportedly chose this because he believed that this was the unit of measure used in pre-diluvian Atlantis.

Nonetheless, I think that there is more to the dollar sign than a representation of the Pillars of Hercules and an allusion to America as the "New Atlantis." I have always thought it to be reminiscent of the Caduceus, the magical wand of Hermes, a staff with a serpent entwined upon it, which has long been a symbol of alchemical transformation and healing (thus its use by the medical profession). Author David Ovason, in The Secret Symbols of the Dollar Bill, concurs. He also adds that a symbol almost identical to the dollar sign is used in astrology to denote Mercury, the Roman version of Hermes, and the patron deity of alchemists. This theory appears to be supported by the fact that there is a relief on the side of the Federal Reserve building in Washington, D.C. entitled America and the Federal Reserve Board (sculpted by artist John Gregory in 1937), which shows the national goddess, Columbia, holding a caduceus in one hand, and the seal of the Federal Reserve in the other.

There are other theories on the origin of the dollar sign. Modern Masonic scholars Christopher Knight and Robert Lomas, in their book The Hiram Key, note that the dollar was officially adopted by the U.S. on October 13, 1792, the anniversary of the arrest of the Knights Templar, and the same day in which President George Washington laid the foundation stone of the White House, in a Masonic ceremony, in the newly-adopted U.S. capitol, Washington, D.C. The authors then offer their own analysis of the meaning of the dollar sign:

…The 'S' was borrowed from an old Spanish coin but the two vertical lines were the Nasorean pillars of 'Mishpat' and 'Tsedeq', better known to the Masonic founders of the United States as 'Boaz' and 'Jachin', the pillars of the porchway to King Solomon's Temple.

This is an important detail, for as our study of the ancient secrets behind America's money progresses, we will find the pillars of Jachin and Boaz, as well as Solomon's Temple itself, increasingly relevant.

Chapter Five: The Spirit of 1776

When in 1787, the U.S. issued its first coins, they were pennies, and they bore some unusual markings. On the front was a sun over a sundial, with the words "Mind Your Business", and "Fugio" (a Latin word meaning "I fly"). It was a reminder to be industrious, and to make good use of one's time, because time is money, and time (represented by the sundial), flies if you don't keep your nose to the grindstone. On the other side were thirteen circles linked in a chain, along with the words "We are one." We might not appreciate being chastised by our money like that in modern times, and perhaps people did not like it much back then, but within this morally self-righteous maxim, we can detect a hint of what would become the foremost trait of the character of the United States. It was President Calvin Coolidge who once famously said, "The business of the United States is business." And there can be little doubt that the dollar itself - the sheer power, and the overall stability of it - is largely responsible for America's success. In Greenback: The Almighty Dollar and the Invention of America, Jason Goodwin writes:

... the dollar seemed to do the work that class or creed did in Europe. It was America's bishop, its king, its squire. What Michael Chevalier in 1839 called a 'passion for money' was not a greedy passion, in the main: it simply reflected the importance of dollars and cents in a society that had no other standard to work on…

For the U.S. had only just emerged from an exhausting cycle of theological debate that rivaled in its way the acrimonious religious conflicts that battered Europe in the sixteenth century, and produced the nation state. America's theology was a secular one. It revolved around money and liberty, promise and return, profit and loss.

It revolved, in fact, around the miracle of money.

The money religion is known as the worship of Mammon, and the Almighty Dollar is the supreme being.

The idea of the United States, and the values inherent in American culture, have become almost synonymous with the idea of free market Capitalism. It cannot be a coincidence that the Declaration of Independence was signed in the same year that economist Adam Smith's book A Wealth of Nations was published, the definitive work on the laws and merits of a Capitalist economy. Smith came up with the idea of what he called "the invisible hand", his term for the sum total of the individual forces that, collectively, drive the economy, especially the needs and desires of the human individuals participating in the economy. In Smith's philosophy, the invisible hand guides the laissez faire (or free market) economy (output, price, and profit) towards the greatest common good as individuals act in their own self-interest to "pursue happiness" - that is, wealth, prosperity and comfort. (We should recall that the early drafts of the Declaration of Independence asserted the colonists' right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of property", where "property" was later changed to "happiness.")

In Smith's book he noted that a merchant or artisan, out of a selfish motive for gain and profit, produces, not the sort of products he likes or enjoys necessarily, but what the public wants or needs: i.e., whatever is likely to sell. He sells that product at as high a price as he possibly can, again out of selfish motive. But the buying public has selfish motives as well. They will not pay more for the same thing when they can get it cheaper somewhere else, so the merchant can only charge as much as they are willing to pay. Supply and demand dictate that the needs of the public will always be supplied at the lowest price possible. Thus, by selfishly pursuing their own desires, everybody wins, and the Capitalist economy inherently works ever-increasingly towards the greatest public good. The investment of capital anywhere in an economy causes overall wealth (the, G.D.P., or Gross Domestic Product) to grow with no limit. As Smith writes, a man:

…neither intends to promote the publick interest, nor knows how much he is promoting it… he intends only his own gain, and he is in this, as in many other cases, led by an invisible hand to promote an end which has no part of his intention.

Adam Smith's philosophy was, in a way, the economic outgrowth of Newtonian physics. It was part of the trend of "Enlightenment" philosophy that was sweeping the intelligentsia of Europe during the eighteenth century, although it had begun in the previous century with thinkers like Sir Francis Bacon, Isaac Newton, John Locke, Rene Descartes and Voltaire. It was based on the idea that the universe could be understood by the human mind, studied, quantified, and analyzed using reason and science, and that the whole could be comprehended by analyzing its parts. Indeed, "science", as such, had not existed previously, and philosophers (the closest equivalent to scientists) were simply expected to use their writings and studies to confirm the teachings of the Catholic Church. When the Protestant Reformation, and the creation of the Anglican Church, broke the absolute power of the Pope enough to allow freedom of thought to spread amongst the educated, this new "Enlightenment philosophy" was developed. Part of this worldview involved the somewhat naïve belief that human nature was inherently good, but that social institutions squashed this inner nature, and that if society were structured so that men could freely follow their natural instincts and desires, society as a whole would prosper. Adam Smith's economics were based on this presumption as well. Yes, man's instincts are selfish, but selfishness is inherently good.

These views formed part of the basis for the anti-monarchist, republican political movements that were spreading all over Europe, and it certainly formed the basis for the political thought of the founders of the United States. Enlightenment philosophy can essentially be considered Masonic philosophy, with much of the occult mumbo jumbo or traditional Masonic thought simply translated into modern "scientific" terminology. Certainly, much of the Enlightenment was fostered by the Royal Society, a body of scientists and thinkers founded by Sir Francis Bacon that was sponsored by the British government. A search through history books will confirm that most of the Royal Society scientists, and indeed, most of the Enlightenment philosophers, were members of either the Masonic brotherhood, or some similar offshoot. As Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh wrote in The Temple and the Lodge:

Without eighteenth-century Freemasonry, the principles at the very heart of the conflict – liberty, equality, brotherhood, tolerance, the 'rights of man', would not have had the currency they did. True, those principles owe much to Locke, Hume, Adam Smith and les philosophes in France. But most, if not all, of those thinkers were either Freemasons themselves, moved in Freemasonic circles or were influenced by Freemasonry.

So Capitalism, as an economic philosophy, is an outgrowth of the Enlightenment era. But what does “Capitalism” mean? The word comes from the Latin “capitalis”, meaning “of the head”, and the relation of this concept to the later financial connotation of the word “capital” is unclear. Its first use in that sense was actually the circa 1630 word “capitale”, meaning “stock or property.” The basic building unit of capitalism is the corporation, and these first started, not surprisingly, in the 1600s. The development of the corporation was spurned on by the improvement of sailing and navigation technology, and the ensuing boom of the shipping industry. This is why the root word “mer”, meaning “sea” is at the heart of the word “mercantile”, and why we still say “shipping” when we are referring to the transport of goods, no matter the method. The improvement of seafaring led to the blossoming of a new form of economy. Now merchants could sail to India, Asia, Africa, or even the Americas, and trade an unprecedented variety of goods, with an unprecedented volume of gold and silver coin available to aid those transactions.

But ships and crew were still expensive, and the voyages dangerous. If one trip went bad, an investor could find himself in debt for life, and worse, in debtor’s prison. So the government of Holland, a leading power amongst the sea merchants of Europe, came up with a novel concept by which numerous merchants could pool their resources and minimize their individual investment risk. They created a “corporation”: a group of investors who would collectively invest in a business venture to form a company, which then became a “legal person” according to a declaration in the company’s charter, granted by the government. This “person” was then able to enter into legal contracts and business ventures, just like a regular person. Only there was one important difference: unlike a real person, the corporation could not be thrown into debtor's prison. Indeed, there was, and is still, no real way to force a corporation to pay its debts. When the corporation determines that it is no longer viable, it declares bankruptcy and, more often not, leaves those to whom it owes money holding the bag. This arrangement worked out well for the Dutch merchants of the seventeenth century, and soon the idea was picked up by other countries, like Britain. Thus the formation of the famous "British East India Company", as well as its rival, the "Dutch East India Company" was possible.

In a corporation, the total worth of the company is divided into "shares", which are sold to the investors as percentages of the company's worth – slices of the pie. The more shares each investor owns, the greater his slice of the pie. The price, or value, of each share fluctuates along with the overall value of the company. Dividends from the company's profits would be paid to the investors annually in relation to the number of shares that they owned. At any time, an investor may sell his shares to another investor. It did not take the Dutch merchants long to realize that these shares of a corporation could be traded almost as a form of currency, just like any fiat money. This led to the creation of the first stock exchange in Holland in the year 1631, a year after "capitale" began being used as a financial term.

Prior to the invention of corporations, the rise of Capitalism was foreshadowed by a slow economic revolution that took place between the fifth and thirteenth centuries. This was a result of the aforementioned phenomenon of "mercantilism": the trade of goods overseas via the newly-developing shipping technology for the explicit purpose of turning a profit in coin, not merely to barter. This practice paved the way for Capitalism, as merchants learned to buy goods in coin at one place and then sell them at a higher price somewhere else. Mercantilism originated in Rome and the Middle East, and was widespread throughout the Roman Empire. Indeed, the spread of the Roman Empire and the spread of mercantile trade were really one and the same process.

But when the Roman Empire fell, mercantilism fizzled. The economy of what was now Europe contracted and localized. This led to an overall decline in the use of coin for trade. As the "Dark Ages" took root, economics, education, health, and scientific progress came to a halt. The system of Feudalism began to develop, in which only the nobility had access to, or even need of, money. Everyone else worked small farms to produce what they and their feudal lords required.

Yet throughout Europe's Dark Ages, the cultures of North Africa, the Middle East, Asia, and even Islamic Spain continued their tradition of mercantilism, and continued to trade in coin. Not only that, while the Europeans were devolving scientifically (with the help of repressive Catholic Church policies), Middle Eastern cultures were developing newer, more sophisticated methods of sailing, minting coins, calculating money, and otherwise doing business. Europe would languish in its own ignorance until, in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, an empire of enlightened warrior-priests would rediscover the secrets of the East, and lead Europe out of the dark, onto the path to the Renaissance. A large part of this involved the rediscovery of the power of money. I am speaking, of course, of the Knights Templar, forefathers to the brotherhood of Freemasons, and the inventors of modern banking.

PART II

Chapter Six: The Death of the West and the Birth of the Temple

The rise and fall of the Roman Empire mirrored the rise and fall of the Roman mercantile economy, and in fact, Rome's decline was largely caused by a decline in trade. It was the ancient Lydians who had first begun the minting of coins, but it was the enterprising Greeks who spread the trade of coins around the ancient world to all of the many nations with which they did business. The Romans, who succeeded the Greeks as the next great culture, took it even further. As the expanding empire conquered more and more foreign lands and appropriated them into their economy, they built what Jack Weatherford describes in A History of Money as:

…the world's first empire organized around money. Whereas the great Egyptian, Persian, and other traditional empires had largely rejected money in favor of government as the main organizing principle, Rome promoted the use of money and organized all of its affairs around the new commodity.

But this same process would eventually become their undoing. Like the Spaniards who would later appropriate American lands into their empire, the Romans fell into the same trap. Their conquests made them rich, but the decadent emperors rapidly spent their money importing luxury goods from these and other foreign lands. They purchased much, but they exported little, and thus Rome's wealth flowed in only one direction – out of Rome. To make matters worse, they now had a huge empire to maintain, which was expensive, and they also continued their military efforts to expand this empire, which meant hiring mercenary armies.

To pay for everything, one emperor, Nero, tried to increase the amount of money available by reducing the silver and gold content of the coins, and making them smaller. All this resulted in, of course, was inflation, and each of the coins was now worth less than it was before. To get more of these devalued coins into the government coffers, taxes were increased greatly, while welfare programs were devised to keep the poor from rioting. As any student of trickle-down economics will tell you, such actions stifle growth and discourage enterprise. But in the latter days of the Roman empire, the effects of this would forever alter the very economic system with which society operated. They slouched from a relatively free society with a free market and an open class system (with class defined by monetary wealth) towards a closed, repressive, and highly stratified caste system based upon the privilege of noble birth. As John Weatherford explains:

Like people anywhere, once the tax burdens became too high in comparison to the benefits and services offered by the government, the Roman subjects found ways to avoid taxation. Commerce declined. People produced more of what they needed for themselves and traded less on the open market. While the poor suffered from heavy property taxes, the latifundia, the great landed estates, grew greatly, particularly those that had been granted a tax-free status. The high taxes induced more peasants to abandon their land and move to the tax-free estates where they at least had a steady supply of food and the essential goods produced on the estate itself.

In other words, society was slouching towards Feudalism, which would soon become the West's new economic system. The way was further paved for a feudal state when Emperor Diocletian initiated laws forbidding farmers from selling their land, and dictating that all sons had to follow in the same profession as their fathers. Thus generations were locked into the same occupation on the same piece of land. Money all but vanished from society. The government was still minting highly-devalued coins for commerce, but refused to accept them as payment for taxes. Soon there was so little money around, and what there was inspired so little confidence, that the government found it had to conscript people into slavery to complete state projects. They also persecuted Christians within their domains, and appropriated what wealth they had.

Things took an interesting turn with the rule of Emperor Constantine from 306 to 337. It was he who, after experiencing a religious vision, and decided to make Christianity the new religion of the state. Some cynical historians choose to say that Constantine was just an opportunist who wanted to use Christianity for his own ends, and they say that he remained an unrepentant pagan who only "truly" converted to Christ on his deathbed. But to be specific, the cult that Constantine remained loyal to was that of Sol Invictus, or "the Invincible Sun", in which the Sun was revered as a symbol of the omnipotent God. I submit to you that this does not a "pagan" make.

At any rate, Constantine contributed much to the historical foundations of Christianity. He issued the Edict of Milan in 313, which gave Christians the right to practice their religion freely, and returned their confiscated property. In 325, he convened the Council of Nicea, which developed the Nicean Creed, a major basis for all mainstream Christian thought today. Because of these actions, he gained the moniker "the thirteenth Apostle." He then proceeded to have many of the pagan temples of Rome looted for their gold and silver artifacts, which he melted down and had minted into coins. These he used to finance the building of a new, Christianized capitol in the East on the Black Sea, which he named after himself: Constantinople. In doing so, he diverted all future investment and trade to the new capitol as well. This was the beginning of what would become known to historians as the “Byzantine” (not the “Roman”) empire, although the people of the new Eastern Empire still called themselves “Romanians” at the time. Byzantium continued to flourish, but the old Roman Empire collapsed. It was sacked by barbarians in 476, and thus began what was known as the “Dark Ages” of the West.

With no real money in circulation, Feudalism became the new economic system. From 476 until the emergence of the “Renaissance” (put by some historians at about 1350 B.C.), peasants worked on large manors owned by nobles, where every effort was made to keep the manor self-sufficient. On the manor, they produced their own food, clothes, and tools, and paid their taxes in these goods. Everyone lived and died on the same manor, just as their father had done before them. Reading, writing, math, and every form of learning or science virtually ceased. The only way to learn these things was to join the clergy, which is why the Catholic monastic orders became the new bastions of the intelligentsia. Because of their overall ignorance, people were reluctant to use money for trade, as most people did not know how to figure numbers at all. Learning and trade continued in the Byzantine East, but in the West, it was dead.

The only people who were lending out money at all in Europe were Jews. For many years, Jews had been banned from practicing any profession other than money-lending. This was not done just because Jews were “good with money.” The Catholic credo held the lending of money upon usury to be sinful, but since Jews were already damned to Hell in the eyes of the Church, they were encouraged to take on the dirty job of money-lending for the rest of the community. In England, William Rufus, son of William the Conqueror, forbade Jews from converting to Christianity, which, as Paul Morrison writes in The Poetics of Fascism: Ezra Pound, T.S. Eliot, Paul de Man, would "rid him of valuable property and give him only a subject." But when Jews were expelled from many communities, of and on, during the pogroms of the Middle Ages (sparked periodically when people began to realize how much money they owed to the Jews), these communities lost their money-lenders.

Luckily, however, the Holy See was inspired by God to grant the Knights Templar immunity from this anti-usury injunction. As I mentioned earlier, briefly, the Templars, or as they were officially titled, the Poor Knights of the Temple of Solomon, were an order of crusading warrior-monks thought to have been the lineal predecessors of the Order of Freemasons. Formed in the early twelfth century, like many other knightly orders which formed during the Crusades, they were an elite fighting force of Catholic monks at the forefront of the European struggle to capture and control the Holy Land. But in addition to fighting, they were also in charge of fulfilling many practical roles for the community, among them, money-lending. The Church allowed the Templars to charge interest on loans at an even higher rate than Jews had been allowed to. In fact, they were granted a charter that basically established the Templars as a law unto themselves, accountable to no one but the Pope. Thus they were able to operate autonomously at their various bases throughout Europe. They even had the right to establish their own sovereign country, which is essentially what they were doing in the Holy Land when they helped to create the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem.

The Knights Templar had a very interesting entrance policy. Not only did new initiates pledge lifelong fidelity to the Order, but they also took very stringent vows of celibacy, secrecy, and poverty. This last part was most interesting, for it amounted to the ultimate entrance fee: one literally handed over everything one owned to the Order, and vowed to remain in "poverty", donating any earnings one might make after joining, to the Order as well. Considering that their knights were taken from the cream of European aristocracy, the younger brothers of wealthy and powerful heirs, this was quite significant. It allowed them to amass a large amount of wealth and land in a relatively quick amount of time.

They then multiplied this wealth exponentially over the next several decades by investing in various business ventures. They farmed, manufactured textiles, built roads and hospitals, and engaged in all sorts of trade. They were responsible for numerous technological advances during this time, either through their own invention, or through techniques that they learned through their frequent contact with Arabs, Jews and Byzantines. Their business ventures had the effect of largely transforming Europe's economy, paving the way for the mercantilism that was emerge soon in post-Medici Italy, later giving birth to Capitalism in Europe and America. The Templars' most significant contribution on this front was in the field of banking, which became their most lucrative industry.

The Templars were, first and foremost, the official guardians of pilgrims en route to the Holy Land. This was supposedly the reason why the Order was created in the first place. In this capacity, they devised a system to protect pilgrims from the "highway robbery" that often made such pilgrimages dangerous. Instead of loading themselves down with gold and provisions, which were likely to be stolen, the pilgrims would simply deposit some money in the form of gold or silver at the Templar preceptory nearest to their point of departure. From there they would make their way to Jerusalem along a pre-selected route consisting of a series of churches and cathedrals, which were themselves associated with nearby Templar preceptories, each featuring banking services. There the pilgrim would present the banker with a "chit": a piece of paper that was encoded with ciphered information regarding the pilgrim's deposit at the originating bank. The pilgrim could then withdraw from the bank at his current location the amount of money he need to pay for his stay at that particular stop on the route, or make donations to the various churches, and could leave the rest in his "account." He could also make direct charges to the account for any goods or services which the Templars themselves were able to offer the pilgrim, which was often the case.

It is thus that the word "check" or "cheque" entered into the English and French languages. Indeed, a great many Middle English words, especially those pertaining to banking and commerce, seem to have originated in one way or another with the Templars. In the case of "cheque", it was related directly to the use of the chequerboard clothe which Templar merchants and bankers used to square their accounts – to "check" their assets and liabilities. The Templars had originally picked up the use of the chequer pattern from their contact with the East, from whence they also learned to play chess, and it is theorized by some authors that it was Templars who originally combined the chessboard (which was not at first chequered) with the chequerboard pattern, enhancing the deep symbolism that the game of chess already possessed. The use of the chequerboard as an abacus became widespread as mercantilism progressed, and thus the term “exchequer” came to mean “a treasury, as of a state or nation.” The term “check” may also be related to “jetton”, which is the name of the round coins that were often used as tally chips on exchequer boards, representing various denominations of money. They were introduced by the Templars in France in the mid-thirteenth century.

As the Templars expanded their banking empire, and as they came to control many other staple industries throughout Europe, they quickly became the continent’s most dominant economic influence. Never before has a single institution used money alone to amass so much worldly power. This power threatened not only the monarchs of Europe (most of whom were now financially indebted to the Templars), but even Pope Clement V, who was no longer was able to hold the Templars under the thrall of his signet ring. Soon the Templars would become a force that no one could stop, and they seemed to hold allegiance to no one else either – no earthly power, at least. Their enemies hypothesized that for the Templars to have become so wealthy and powerful in such a short span of time, they would have had to have made a pact with the Devil. With a little investigation, it was discovered that in fact they had.

When the Templars were arrested en masse on Friday, October 13, 1307, on charges of idol worship and heresy, there were found throughout their preceptories various human skulls, and representations of human skulls or severed heads, which appeared to have been afforded certain ceremonial importance. The symbol of the skull and crossbones, apparently invented by the Knights Templar, was used everywhere throughout their possessions. Carvings depicting a grotesque goat-headed creature, with a semi-human body at once both male and female, were also found in the Templars’ ritual chambers. In confessions painfully extracted, many knights admitted that the skulls, the heads and the hybrid creature all represented their secret god, “Baphomet”, whom they worshipped because it “caused the land to germinate”, and also “made them rich.”

Modern occultists, for whom Baphomet is now a potent symbol, see in this idol a representative of the “Universal Principle”, the “Azoth” or “Fifth Element” which to alchemists is the key to turning lead into gold. This is probably what it meant to the Templars too, as we shall see. But to their interrogators, the tortured knights were confessing Devil worship, and they were punished accordingly. The Order was disbanded, the Grand Master burnt at the stake, and the offending knights sent to do penance at various monasteries. The power of the Templars was crushed.

Chapter Seven: The Renaissance and the Rise of the Merchant Class

After the disappearance of the Knights Templar, the tradition of mercantilism and banking continued on, conducted mainly by a group of Italian merchant families based in cities like Genoa, Pisa, Florence, Venice, and Verona. These families chose to get around the Catholic prohibition against usury by using semantics. Instead of issuing “loans”, they wrote out “bills of exchange”, specifically called “cambium per lettras” in Latin, meaning “exchange through written documents or bills.” These bills were contracts in which the bank gave the contractee an amount of money in one currency, and that person agreed to pay the bank a certain amount of money in another currency at a certain date. It just so happened that the amount of money paid back had an exchange value greater than the amount of money that had originally been issued. Thus the Italian banks got their “interest” without having to call it that.

The new Italian bankers brought money-lending to a whole new level, because they brought it to the street. The Templars had dealt exclusively with the noble class, but the Italians dealt with everybody - landlords, merchants, and vendors - with no discrimination between Catholic, Muslim, or Jew. It was around this time that the word “bank” actually came about, from the Italian word for “table”, or “bench.” Unlike the Templars, who operated out of fortified castles, the Italian banks operated from temporary benches and tables set up at market fairs that took place in various cities throughout the year.

One of the advantages of this new system was that the economy was not bound to the availability of any single currency. In the past, a shortage of one type of coin could put business to a halt. But now, if there was a shortage of one type of money, the bankers would just continue working with another type. They could also continue to write bills of exchange representing a certain currency, even if there was not much available, so long as the currency still retained the public confidence. If there were not enough coins available in the currency in which the loanee was obliged to pay the bank, he could arrange to pay them in another currency instead.

Yet another advantage of this banking system was that now money was flowing much more freely in and out of bank accounts, and thus, being utilized much more efficiently. Instead of vast treasure-stores of money sitting stashed in a castle, it was in a bank account, allowing the bank to use it as a reserve to loan money out to merchants or to other bankers. This money would then be used by the merchant loanees to do business, stimulating the local economy, and would eventually be paid back to the bank with the equivalent of interest. Thus each deposit into one of these banks multiplied the overall money supply of the economy exponentially. As Jack Weatherford explains:

Under the new system a bag of a hundred florins [gold coins from Florence] that might once have sat idle for years in a noble's strong-box could now be deposited for safekeeping in an Italian bank that had access to branches across the continent. The bank then lent the money and circulated the bill of exchange as money. The noble still had his one hundred florins, which were now on deposit in the bank; the bank had one hundred florins on its books. The merchant who borrowed the florins was richer, and the person who held the bill of exchange now had one hundred florins as well. Even though only one hundred gold coins were involved, the miracle of banking deposits and loans had transformed them into many hundreds of florins that could be used by different individuals in different cities at the same time. This new banking money opened vast new commercial avenues for merchants, manufacturers, and investors. Everyone had more money; it was sheer magic.

Of those who profited, none did more so than the banking families of Peruzzi, Bardi, and Acciaiuoli, all from Florence. Their wealth and money-lending services gained them influence with both the Papacy, and the monarchy of England (Edwards I, II, and III), whom they were largely responsible for financing. Because of these families, Italian currencies, especially the Florentine florin and the Venetian ducat, became the standard coins of continental Europe. The downfall of these families came when the English monarchy, then headed by Edward III, defaulted on its loans with the bankers in 1343. Soon there was no reserve cash left in the banks to cover all of the other loans that they had outstanding. The system worked great so long as all of the participants maintained their confidence in it. But now the vulnerabilities of a system built on faith were exposed, and these banking enterprises collapsed like a house of cards. An outbreak of plague in Italy from 1343 to 1348 finished them off.

Luckily for Europe, though, another family was soon to take over the reins of Italian banking – a family seemingly destined for greatness. In 1360, a man named Giovanni di Bicci de Medici was born. He grew up to be a merchant and, along with two of his sons, Cosimo the Elder and Lorenzo the Elder, created not only a powerful banking and mercantile dynasty, but a multi-generational political power as well. They became the dominant financial force in Europe. They intermarried with the royal families of the continent, and two Medici women, Marie and Catherine, became queens of France, fathering French kings as well. Meanwhile, two Medici sons, Giulio and Giovanni, became the Popes Clement VIII and Leo X, respectively. Numerous Medicis held other posts of importance in the Church and in government.

More important, perhaps, is that the Medicis quite purposefully used their influential positions to change the world for the better, and forever. They patronized the arts and letters, science and mathematics. They paid for the establishment of schools, churches, and hospitals. Because of their financial backing, the enlightened ideas of the Renaissance took hold with artists like Michelangelo and Botticelli, writers like Dante Alighieri, and scientists like Galileo. Learning began to flourish once more, and the strangle-hold that the Catholic Church had held on learning began to lift, as artists now felt more free to compose human-centered rather than purely God-centered works, even in scenes depicting religious events. Christ and the Holy Family were now portrayed as more human, more real.

Indeed, most of our modern visual conceptions of the people, supernatural beings, and events described in the Bible are based on the art of the Medici-era Renaissance. So too is much of our Christian mythology. The Medici Popes used the power they held to modernize and liberalize the Church in a radical way. Certain ideas, such as the existence of Purgatory, were even appropriated in whole from the works of Dante Alighieri. As a result of the Medicis' patronage of authors from Tuscany (their ancestral home and center of power), the Tuscan dialect of Latin became the predominant language of the Italian peninsula, and later developed into modern Italian.

In addition, their patronage of the study of philosophy and the sciences was equally influential. Although it would be many years before their views were widely accepted, thinkers like Galileo, whom the Medicis supported, were questioning the official Church version of the structure of the universe, in which, it was believed, the Sun and all other heavenly luminaries revolved around the Earth, the supposed center of God's creation. These new scientists and philosophers suspected that there was a whole new universe out there to be explored beyond this Earth, just as there was quite a bit of Earth yet left to be explored. These years were also the age of exploration, in which European royals (no doubt using money loaned to them by Medici bankers) paid daring navigators (descended from Templar families) to search for a new sea route to India, inadvertently proving radical new theories about the shape, size, and contents of planet Earth.

Authors Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh, in their book The Temple and the Lodge, succinctly described the monumental nature of, in particular, Cosimo de Medici's contributions to society:

In 1439 … Cosimo de Medici began sending his agents all over the world in quest of ancient manuscripts. Then, in 1444, Cosimo founded Europe's first public library, the Library of San Marco, and thus began to challenge the Church's long monopoly of learning. At Cosimo's express commission, the corpus of Platonic, Pythagorean, Gnostic, and Hermetic thought found its way into translation for the first time and became readily accessible. Cosimo also instructed the University of Florence to begin teaching Greek for the first time in Europe for some seven hundred years. And he undertook to create an academy of Pythagorean and Platonic studies. Cosimo's academy quickly generated a multitude of similar institutions throughout the Italian peninsula, which became bastions of Western esoteric tradition.

One of the major developments to take place in Europe, starting from the time of the Templars and continuing on through the Medici years, was the widespread use of mathematics, not just by scholars or intellectuals, but by normal, everyday people for practical purposes. The revolution began with the introduction of Arabic, rather than Roman, numerals. It is the new Arabic numbers that we use now. (They had actually been adapted by the Arabs from an Indian system, although some scholars say that they are ultimately Chaldean in origin.) Roman numerals were notoriously difficult to calculate with, necessitating an abacus, jetton, and/or exchequer board. The existence of Arabic numerals was known in some circles, but had been frowned upon, for during the era of the Crusades, nobody wanted to touch the accursed symbols of the infidels. But the Italian merchants were already dealing with Arabs, and were in need of a more effective way of calculating their finances. Practicality won the day.

A watershed event was the publication of Liber Abaci by Leonardo Fibonacci, famous also for the discovery of the so-called "Fibonacci sequence", also called the "golden mean numbers", or the "Phi ratio". This was the book that really introduced Arabic numerals to the West. Notably, it occurred during the height of the Knights Templar's banking operations, which undoubtedly helped to spread the use of these numbers. Overnight, merchants discovered that there was a way of calculating numbers that was conceptually simple, and that could be done on a sheet of paper rather than using some cumbersome contraption. This new system was not immediately accepted. In fact, many colleges in Europe continued to teach Roman numerals exclusively until the 1600s. But in the meantime, the merchants made use of it. They were even responsible for the development of the "plus" (+) and "minus" (-) signs, which they used to mark shipments of goods that were overweight or underweight.

During the Medici years, many great strides were made in Italy in the field of mathematics. An anonymous textbook from 1478 called Treviso Arithmetic, tailor-made for merchants, taught them how to multiply and divide. Nicolas Chuquet's 1484 Triparty en la science des nombres introduced the idea of separating numerals into groups of three, as we do now with commas (for example: 100,000), to make them easier to read. He also introduced words like "million" and "billion", to replace phrases like "a hundred hundred thousand." Luca Pacioli's 1487 treatise Summa de aritmetica geometria proportioni et proportionalita introduced double-entry book-keeping.

There were more ideas from the Arab East that got introduced into the West at this time. Algebra was developed in the ninth century by a man named Muhammad ibn-Musa al-Khwarizmi, but the word "algebra" entered European languages after having been lifted during the Renaissance from the title of his book: Hisab al-Jabr w-al-Muqabalah (The Science of Restoration and Reduction). Al-Khwarizmi also introduced the idea of decimals rather than fractions, and the term used in Europe at the time for them, "algorism" (a corruption of his name, Al-Khwarizmi), eventually became a more generalized term in mathematics. Mr. Al-Khwarizmi's ideas were actually introduced to the West by a Jewish scholar named Immanuel ben Jacob Bonfils of Tarascon in the year 1350.

It was only 250-300 years later, when the universities of Europe began to teach the new mathematics system, that people really began to understand the philosophical implications of mathematical principles. Math made philosophers realize many irrefutable truths, and taught them to look for truths that were quantifiable and unchanging, like mathematical axioms, rather than basing one's "facts" on faith in religious dogma. This paved the way for the revolutionary scientific discoveries of men like Rene Descartes and Sir Isaac Newton.

Thus developed the philosophy of the Enlightenment era, which held that the universe was rational, and could be understood using rational means. These ideas were promoted by the influential men involved in the newly-developing phenomenon of speculative Freemasonry. These men also promoted the idea of a representative government, separated from the Church, so that no Pope, and no Pope's royal lackey, could ever again squelch scientific progress. The need for this form of government led to the colonization of America by Sir Francis Bacon's Virginia Company, with the aim of turning this new country into the ultimate philosophic empire, where learning and discovery could thrive without interference, and indeed, would be encouraged.

All of these amazing changes occurred in European society from the end of the Dark Ages, signaled by the accomplishments of the Knights Templar, through the Italian merchant and banking years (which ended with the collapse of the Medici bank in 1494, following the French invasion of Florence by King Charles VIII, and the expulsion of the Medicis from the city), then on through the Enlightenment era. In this series of widely diverse events, separated by space and time, we can detect a certain continuity.

To understand what I mean, let us go back to the year 324, when Constantinople was founded.

Chapter Eight: The Empire in the East and the Church of the Holy Wisdom

When the newly-converted Christian emperor of Rome began raising funds to found his new capitol in the East, Constantine made a point of using gold coins minted from the melted down idols of Roman pagan temples to pay for the construction. It was an "f- you" not only to the gods of Rome, but to Rome itself, for in founding Constantinople, the emperor was establishing a "New Rome." But he really intended for it to be the recreation of another ancient city - Jerusalem.

Already Constantine's mother, Helena, had been converted to Christianity along with him, and had become so devout that she made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in search of the grave of Christ. A lucky woman, that Helena. She just happened not only to discover Jesus' tomb, but remnants of the True Cross, the Crown of Thorns, and numerous other holy relics. She had churches erected on the spots where she found these items. Constantine, too, erected churches, mainly the first St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, and the first "Hagia Sophia" (the "Church of the Holy Wisdom") in Constantinople.

The change of the capital of the Roman Empire from Rome to Constantinople had major effects on the development of the Catholic Church. Constantine's successor, Theodosius I, held an ecumenical council in 381 in which it was declared that the Bishop of Constantinople would be second in Christendom only to the bishop of Rome. Theodosius officially banned pagan cults, and began closing any pagan temples that remained. But although the church in Rome and the church in Constantinople had started out as the same church, East and West began to divide theologically and culturally, until they were eventually two separate churches, and two separate empires: one waning, the other rising. The Byzantine Empire lasted from 324 to 1453, and at its height included Northern Italy, Macedonia, Southern Spain, Turkey, Bulgaria, North Africa, and parts of Egypt. As the empire grew, the Byzantines reverted back entirely to the Greek language, and in many ways continued Greek traditions by fostering within their empire a cultural love of Greek philosophy, art, and literature.

It was during the rule of Byzantine Emperor Justinian I that an unfortunate incident occurred involving Constantine's Hagia Sophia. In 532, a riot broke out in the sports stadium known as the Hippodrome: a conflict between fans of the blue chariot team and the red chariot team. It was the ancient equivalent of a soccer hooligan brawl. The melee spread throughout the city, and before long the Hagia Sophia had been completely trashed. Justinian had all the rioters in the Hippodrome massacred, and that put an end to the riot. Afterwards he had the church rebuilt more magnificently than ever before. It immediately became the most renowned building in Christendom, and remained so until St. Peter's Basilica was rebuilt to extravagance during the Medici years. As one author, Benita Goldman of Eastern Michigan University put it in her essay, Byzantium and Her Arts:

Hagia Sophia was rebuilt on a daring scale.....the dome was so large, the interior so spacious, that visitors said the dome itself appeared to be resting on light, or suspended from heaven by a golden chain. The example of Hagia Sophia was so profound that, as the Byzantine Empire expanded and contracted, not one corner of it did not prefer a church with a central dome. The Eastern Orthodox structures of Russia, Greece and Bulgaria all pay homage to the church of Holy Wisdom. Even the humblest Eastern Orthodox structure could hardly be called complete without a dome. Just as with the Greek culture and the Romans who revered it (the captors were held by their captives in thrall), the later inhabitants of Constantinople, the Ottoman Turks, even devised their Imperial Mosques after the example of Hagia Sophia.

To finish off his creation, Justinian took precious, expensive decorations from older temples all over the empire, and used them for Hagia Sophia instead. When he was done, the emperor is said to have exclaimed: "Solomon, I have outdone you", a reference to the opulent temple, equally encrusted with gold and jewels, which King Solomon had built in Jerusalem to house the Ark of the Covenant.

Byzantium went through a great deal of turmoil throughout the history of its empire, expanding and contracting in size as it continually fought off invasion from barbarian and Muslim hordes. Their church (now the Eastern Orthodox Church) was even influenced somewhat by Islam, in that they began to take on the ideology of iconoclasm. Islam shunned the depiction of any living form in nature as idolatry, and would allow only abstract, geometric art forms. In contrast, Christianity, both the Roman and the Eastern Orthodox varieties, made great use of art and architecture depicting Christ, the Holy Family, and religious themes. They did not shy away from using these depictions in their rituals, either. The Eastern Orthodox Church used what they called "icons", by which they specifically meant portraits of saints which one would pray to, asking the saint to intercede on one's behalf, and to pass the prayer on to Jesus. Author Benita Goldman explains in further detail the role these items play in church ritual:

The Iconostasis or 'Icon Wall' in a Byzantine or Eastern Orthodox Church is a screen separating the faithful from the divine and mysterious rituals of the Holy Sacrament. Unlike the Catholic Church, this ritual takes place behind a wall or screen, rather than at the altar in front of the congregation. Commonly, the Iconostasis is painted with the Deesis (literally, the 'entreaty'). This is an arrangement of the following elements: Christ enthroned centrally, flanked by St. John the Baptist and the Virgin Mary (the Theotokos.) Both St. John and Mary are most frequently depicted making prayerful entreaties to the enthroned Christ…

In Russia, most homes had an 'icon corner' where the icon was placed. Icons were believed to have a miraculous power of protection over the home and its occupants. Some icons, such as the famous Virgin of Vladimir, were thought to protect the city. Often, these famous icons were embellished with covers in precious metal and gems. The Virgin of Vladimir was revered enough to have several such covers, embellished through the years in silver and gold...

Similar practices existed, and still exist, in the Catholic Church, which likewise encourages its members to pray to statues and portraits of Jesus, the Holy Family, and other saints. So when the Orthodox Church went through two waves of Iconoclasm, in which the use of images was prohibited, it further drove a wedge between them and the Catholic Church. This is why in the year 800, Pope Leo II personally crowned a new Emperor of the Western Romans, Charlemagne, creating the Holy Roman Empire which was to last in Europe for 1000 years, subverting the power that Empress Irene of Constantinople believed she still held in the West.

To do this, the Pope asserted a document called “the Donation of Constantine” that he claimed had been drafted and signed by the Thirteenth Apostle himself, in which Constantine supposedly “donated” his imperial power to Church, giving the Pope the power to crown kings. Constantine, of course, would never have signed such a thing, and the document is now universally regarded by scholars as a fraud. But it remained the basis of the Holy Roman Empire for the rest of its duration, although of course it went totally unrecognized by the now completely separate Eastern Church and empire. The Western ruler became known as the “Imperator Romanorum” (“Emperor of the Romans”), and the Eastern ruler became known as the “Imperator Graecorum” (“Emperor of the Greeks”). The schism between the churches was finalized in 1054.

The Crusades of the Holy Roman Empire to capture Jerusalem had an inadvertently negative effect on Constantinople. In the year 1096 the First Crusade traveled through the city en route to the holy land. The Roman Catholic soldiers were feeling spiteful towards their Eastern Orthodox rivals, so they sacked the city, and other nearby domains, as they passed through. The same thing happened in 1204 during the Fourth Crusade, only this time they not only pillaged it: they actually set up their own “Latin Kingdom” in the city. The Eastern Orthodox Greeks managed to take the city back in 1261, but it didn’t last too much longer. However, the great Constantinople fell at last not to fellow Christians, but to the Muslim Ottoman Turks. As we all know, the city once known as “Constantinople” is now called “Istanbul.”

Chapter Nine: The Head of Prophecy and the Aegis of the Goat

Let us return now to the concept of the "Baphomet", the idol which the Knights Templar were found guilty of worshipping, purportedly because it "caused the land to germinate", and "made them rich." These facts, coupled with the fact that the idol was often depicted as a goat with male and female sexual organs, might cause one to think that the Templars had somehow stumbled upon and absorbed the tenets of the cult of the she-goat Amalthea. This is the creature who purportedly nursed Zeus while he was a babe in exile on the island of Crete, hiding from his father Kronos, who wished to kill him. Her name means "tender", specifically referring, not to the financial term, but to that definition of "tender" as "a person who attends to or takes charge of someone or some thing" (Webster's College Dictionary, 1999). Having little thanks for the favors of Amalthea, Zeus had her slaughtered as soon as he was fully grown, and fashioned from her skin an impenetrable shield called the "Aegis." The word "aegis" or "aigis" literally means "goat-skin."

Zeus would shake this shield (emblazoned with the image of the severed head of Gorgon) in the air in order to create thunder, and thus he earned the epithet "Aigiokhos", meaning "wielder of the goat-skin." Zeus used this shield when he went to battle against the Titans. He also used the "cornucopia" or "horn of plenty", which he made from one of Amalthea's horns: a magical object that contained an inexhaustible supply of fruits and flowers. After he had killed her and used all of her parts that he wanted, Zeus placed Amalthea amongst the stars, where she became the constellation of Capricorn. The figure of Capricorn then came to be thought of as a “sea-goat”, since she resided in the “celestial sea” of Heaven.

So Amalthea was venerated by some cults in much the same way that the vegetation deity known as the “Green Man” was in Celtic culture: as a representative of nature, of fecundity, plenteousness, and thus, by extension, wealth. Likewise, the goat-god Baphomet was so literally associated with money by the Templars that they kept small statuettes of him in their money coffers. But the Baphomet is reported to have done more for the Templars besides just making them rich. He is also said to have made them “wise.” In fact, it has been shown that Baphomet’s name literally means “wisdom”, according to several linguistic interpretations.

I explained previously that the Templars made use of cryptograms, or ciphers, in the checking system that they invented. One of the ciphers that they used most often was a simple one called “Atbash”, in which the first letter of the alphabet is replaced with the last letter of the alphabet, then the second replaced with the second-to-last, etc. It has been discovered that if the letters of “Baphomet” are converted into Aramaic (a late Hebrew-Greek blend used in the New Testament), and then run through the Atbash cipher, you get the word “sophia”, which means “wisdom.” “Sophia” was indeed the name used for the goddess of wisdom who was often revered in Gnostic cults in New Testament times. It was believed in these cults that one could unite spiritually with Sophia by performing certain rites and meditations, thus obtaining “gnosis”, or divine knowledge. In addition to the message rendered from the Atbash cipher, according to the 1865 tome Worship of the Generative Powers, by Thomas Wright, Baphomet was sometimes referred to simply as “Mete” by Templars, a word which in itself means “wisdom”.

Gnosticism was widely practiced in the Roman Empire during Christ’s time. One man widely believed to have been a Gnostic was John the Baptist, the prophet of the New Testament who announced the coming of Christ. John was, after his death, revered by a number of Gnostic cults. There were even, by medieval times, numerous underground “Christian” sects called “Johannites”, who believes that John was the true Messiah. Johannite cults even exist today in the form of semi-Islamic Gnostic sects found in Iraq known as “Mandeans.” It has been charged that that Templars followed this doctrine, and indeed, he was their patron saint, as he is now for Freemasonry. More importantly, perhaps, he is known to have been beheaded at the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, and his head, or skull, has become a central Christian icon. This brings into focus the claim of occultist Aleister Crowley that the name “Baphomet”, by itself, without running it through any ciphers, means “Baptist of Wisdom.” Given what we know of John, this could easily have been a title for the prophet himself.

So can John’s head be the skull that the Templars are said to have not only worshipped, but talked to? Specifically it is said to have “prophesied” for them. In the Gnostic text The Apocryphon of St James, John’s severed head is referred to as “the head of prophecy.”

Moreover, the use of a severed head or skull for divination was a common practice throughout the ancient East and even, though secretly, in Judah and Israel during Old Testament times. Such devices were called “teraphim”, as defined by the online Jewish Encyclopedia:

...the teraphim were made of the head of a man, a first-born which, after the man had been slain, was shaved and then salted and spiced. After a gold plate on which magic words were engraved had been placed under the tongue, the mummified head was mounted on the wall... lighted candles were placed round it; the people then prostrated themselves before it, and it spoke to them.

Likewise, famous mystic H.P. Blavatsky wrote an article alleging that the practice continued on into Renaissance Europe. The article is called "Animated Statues", written for her magazine, The Theosophist. In it she wrote:

[Thesaurist] Ugolino puts in the mouth of the sage Gamaliel, St. Paul's master (or guru), the following words, which he quotes, he says, from his Capito, chap. xxxvi: 'They (the possessors of such necromantic teraphim) killed a new-born baby, cut off its head, and placed under its tongue, salted and oiled, a little gold lamina in which the name of an evil spirit was perforated; then, after suspending that head on the wall of their chamber, they lighted lamps before it, and prostrate on the ground they conversed with it.'...

In the Middle Ages... several Roman Catholic priests are known to have resorted to [this practice]; among others the apostate Jacobin priest in the service of Queen Catherine of Medici, that faithful daughter of the Church of Rome and the author of the St. Bartholomew Massacre. The story is given by [Jean] Bodin, in his famous work on Sorcery, Le Demonomanie, ou Traité des Sorciers (Paris, 1587); and it is quoted in Isis Unveiled (Vol. ii, p. 56). Pope Sylvester II was publicly accused by Cardinal Benno of sorcery, on account of his Brazen Oracular Head.'

This is exactly what many scholars believe Baphomet was for the Templars: a teraph made from the head or skull of John the Baptist. It is interesting, then, that Ms. Blavatsky tied the Medici family to the use of teraphim, for reasons that will become clear later on in this book. The same connection was made by Freemason and Masonic expert Manly P. Hall, who wrote about "the infamous oracular heads of de Medici."

So how would the Templars have gotten hold of the skull of John the Baptist? Well, during their formative years, the Templars were stationed at the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, right there on the mountain itself. It was the fact that they were formed there, at the site of what was once the great Jewish temple, which gave the Order its name, "the Poor Knights of Christ of the Temple of Solomon." Since the Knights Templar are known to have explored the secret caves beneath the Temple Mount (looking for the Ark of the Covenant, some say), it is quite possible that they discovered the head of John while down there. It is also possible that they picked it up from Constantinople while they were passing through to Jerusalem for the First Crusade. While most of the soldiers were busy with more ordinary raping and pillaging, the Templars could have been on a systematic hunt for any religious relics that might have been housed there.

There were of course, many of them there. For a while, Constantinople had been the center of Christendom, and is the most likely place for Constantine to have housed some of the relics found by his mother, Helena, in her search through the Holy Land. Of course, most of the relics she found are accounted for, and were venerated in churches that she had erected in Jerusalem, and also in Rome. But some ended up in Constantinople, and I think this is the likely landing place for any relics deemed too precious to put on public display. I can even see Constantine and Helena plotting to put fake relics on display in the various churches, and hiding the real ones in the original Hagia Sophia.

There are indeed stories of the skull of John the Baptist having ended up there. The most widely-accepted claimant to the title has long been the skull on display in Antioch. But there was another claimant that was put on display in Constantinople and was venerated by the royalty of Aquitaine, Gaul, Italy, and Spain, who all made a pilgrimage to the Byzantine capital to celebrate its translation there by Emperor Theodosius. It was said by contemporary chronicler Ademar of Chabannes to have been "enclosed in a stone reliquary formed in the shape of a pyramid", and placed in a suburb of Constantinople called Hebdomoes, where a "magnificent temple" was erected for it. When it was installed in its new home, fantastic powers were ascribed to the relic, to cure people and to effect miracles.

Besides the skull of John the Baptist, there is another candidate for the Baphomet which is also an artifact that the Templars may have obtained from Constantinople. It was called "the Mandylion." This object's official story is described in full and adequately by the website printeryhouse.org, which sells reproductions of Greek Orthodox Christian icons:

This image is considered to be the oldest known icon and also the oldest known portrait of Jesus. According to ancient legend, King Abgar of Edessa, (now Urfa in Turkey), was a leper. He sent his archivist named Hannan (or Ananias) to Galilee with a letter to Jesus, beseeching Him to come to Edessa and heal him. Hannan was a painter and had orders to make a portrait of the Lord in case he refused to come. Hannan came upon Jesus in the midst of a large crowd. He tried to make a portrait but could not. Seeing Hannan's need, Jesus asked for some water, washed himself, and wiping His face on a linen cloth, imprinted it with his features. When Abgar beheld the cloth, his leprosy was cured, although his scars remained. After Pentecost, the apostle Thaddeus, one of the seventy, went to Edessa and completed Abgar's cure and conversion to Christianity.

The image of Christ on the linen cloth was preserved for centuries in Edessa as the city's most sacred treasure. The legend and the image are referred to by many ancient writers, such as Eusebius of Caesarea (325 AD), and Evagrius (590 AD). In 944, the Byzantines captured the image from Edessa, which was under Moslem rule, and brought it with great ceremony to Constantinople. The event is still celebrated in the Orthodox liturgical calendar on August 16. It remained there until the sack of that city by the crusaders in 1204, when it disappeared. But by that time, innumerable icons had been made, preserving the sacred image to this day.

The image has been referred to in many ways over the centuries. In Greek, it is called the 'Achieropoietos,' meaning 'not made by human hands,' in keeping with its miraculous origin. It has also been called the Mandylion, literally 'little handkerchief.' This word having an Arabic root, was used in Byzantium only to describe this image. In iconography, there are two variants; a version with Christ's hair and beard curly and flowing, and this version with beard wet and forked.

There are similarities between this object and descriptions of the object worshipped by the Templars. The most obvious is that it shows the disembodied head of a bearded man, as the head of Baphomet is said to have been. Also, if the Mandylion were the mystically-created imprint of a man's face, like the Shroud of Turin supposedly is a mystically-created imprint of Christ's body, it might look as the Shroud does, like a photo negative, and thus, somewhat skull-like. If this is indeed what the Baphomet was like, one can see how it could have been reported, by knights who were exposed to it, as both a bearded head, and a skull. They might have thought it looked a little bit "goaty" as well.

But another important similarity between the Baphomet and the Mandylion is its possible use for divination. The Mandylion was used by the Byzantine Church as an "icon", and copies of it are still used as such in the Greek Orthodox Church today. You will recall that with these icons, people believe that they can directly contact the saint or divine being depicted on them. Is it not possible that with an icon such as the Mandylion, which was also a holy relic, an imprint of the Savior's own face, some people believed that it could talk back to them as well? Or especially so, if the head that was actually depicted on the cloth was the "head of prophecy", that of John the Baptist?

In an article entitled "The Templars, The Shroud, the Veil and the Mandylion" on the website templarhistory.com, Chevalier John Ritchie (a member of the neo-templar group the Sovereign Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem) suggests that the Mandylion did depict the head of John the Baptist, and that it was the same as the Baphomet of the Templars. He suggests that they obtained it during the sacking of Constantinople in 1204, during the Fourth Crusade, after which the Crusaders set up a "Latin Kingdom" in Constantinople. As he describes it:

The most likely possessors of the Mandylion would appear to be the Order of the Knights Templar. They were the first troops into Constantinople in 1204, they knew of the imperial collection, and were in fact the bodyguard to Count Baldwin of Flanders [the newly-crowned Latin King in Constantinople], so it would have been very easy for them to obtain the Mandylion and other relics during the sacking.

Ritchie also suggests that it was not unusual for Templar depictions of Baphomet to be flat, wall-mounted portraits rather than standing idols:

…every Templar Preceptory had a copy of this 'head', and one of these came to light in England in 1951, during the demolition of an outhouse at Templecombe Somerset, the site of a long vanished Templar preceptory. This was a curious panel painting covered with dust but clearly depicting a bearded male head of the type referred to in the confessions forced from the Knights Templar under... Today this Templecombe panel hangs in the church of St. Mary. Templecombe, its resemblance to the face on the Mandylion is unmistakable.

Chapter Ten: A Contract with Baphomet

But how could possessing an item such as the Mandylion, or a mummified severed head, make the Templars rich? Well, let us just suspend disbelief for a moment and swallow the Templars' own beliefs. Obviously they believed that Baphomet could talk to them, and that Baphomet possessed "divine wisdom." So right off the bat, with that belief as our basis, it is possible to contend that Baphomet taught the Templars all forms of knowledge, including the mysteries of money and wealth. It is evident that the Templars did come into possession of great sources of wisdom, which enabled them to be involved in breakthrough accomplishments of art, science and medicine during their time. The ideas they applied to create their international banking system were sheer genius.

But more than that, it is clear that the Templars afforded the image of Baphomet itself a certain ceremonial reverence, accrediting to it a certain talismanic power, which demonstrates that they believed their devotion to it, and their sacrifices to it, would gain them wealth in return. This is a very ancient concept, and one which I will get into in greater detail later on. It is the belief that one can contact a deity through divination and negotiate a contract with it, in which one agrees to perform certain services for the deity, in exchange for blessings in return.

A deity whose symbolism was associated with the very idea of a divine contract was the Persian god Mithras. He was known as the "god of contracts", and the inventor of the legal system. People would invoke him as a witness when drawing up a contract of any sort between two parties, and it was believed that he would punish severely all those who broke their contracts. These deals would be sealed with a handshake which, according to mythology, was another invention of Mithras, first taught by him to mankind when he was inducting priests into his cult. In the rites of Mithras, the initiates were made to shake the hand of Mithras (usually played in the ritual by another cult member) as a seal of a pact between the inductee and his new teacher, Mithras, referred to in the ritual by the nickname "the Friend." Many aspects of this ritual were absorbed into the rites of Freemasonry.

The name "Mithras" is related to words in all ancient languages that mean 'to measure." These root words have resulted in modern terms like "metric", "method", "medicine", and "mathematics." This is because Mithras was also known for having taught basic math, science, and medicine to mankind in ancient times. The root word "mitr" has been said to actually communicate the more generalized concept of "knowledge" or "wisdom." Indeed, according to several modern occult scholars, including author Nicholas de Vere (The Dragon Legacy, USA, 2004), the name "Baphomet" means "Father Mithras" or "Father of Wisdom."

Mithras was a solar deity, and the cult of Sol Invictus in Rome, followed by Emperor Constantine even after his conversion to Christianity, was very much an offshoot of the cult of Mithras. It is noteworthy that the "sign" which Constantine saw in his divine vision, was not the Christian cross, or even the equilateral cross later used by the Templars, but actually the "Chi Rho" symbol, made from the first two letters of Christ's name in Greek. Or at least, that is what Christians today say its meaning and origin is. According to most scholars it actually has a pre-Christian origin, and was used by the ancient cult of Sol Invictus. But the fact remains that after his vision, Constantine had the symbol inscribed on the shields of his soldiers, who then went charging into battle against his rival for the throne. His army was victorious. He became the emperor, converted to Christianity, and moved the capitol of his empire to a new city which he had built – Constantinople.

It seems to me that the Chi Rho symbol, which looks like a modern letter "P" on top of a modern letter "X", greatly resembles the skull and crossbones symbol of the Templars, the simple hieroglyph they used to represent Baphomet. It was also a symbol of Mithras. In a segment about the Chi Rho in the classic Masonic textbook, Morals and Dogma, Albert Pike wrote that:

The Cross, X, was the sign of the Creative Wisdom or Logos, the Son of God… Mithras signed his soldiers on the forehead with a Cross.

So let us say for the sake of argument that the Baphomet was a talisman of some sort that, among other things, bestowed upon its possessor 'wisdom" and "riches" – or more specifically, the power to both gain and create wealth. Let us say that Constantine somehow came into possession of it, perhaps when his mother Helena was in Jerusalem digging around for holy relics. His religious vision may have foreshadowed this discovery, or even led him and his mother to it. Or it might have just been a story made up after the fact. It is also possible that it was already there in Rome in some hidden vault known only to the emperor, and Constantine only learned of it after he ascended to the throne. The Romans, of course, had taken over the land of Judah, and had sacked Jerusalem, carrying off all of the treasures of the Temple that they found. If this was the case, Helena's treasure hunt in Jerusalem could have been simply to find more artifacts.

At any rate, as my hypothesis goes, Constantine used the power of this talisman to create his new empire in Constantinople. In this proposed version of events, he would have formed a "divine contract" with the deity represented by the talisman, just as the Templars would have later done with Baphomet. He created a temple to house this relic, the "Hagia Sophia", or "Church of the Holy Wisdom" – or in other words, the Church of Baphomet. Constantine then sacrificed to this idol all of the wealth from the temples of Rome's pagan gods. That is, he sacrificed everything dedicated to the old religion, the old "divine contracts", and put them in the service of his new religion, his new "divine contract" with Baphomet. In exchange, Byzantium became the global center of wisdom and learning, and the most beautiful, most wealthy city in the whole world. It was an empire that lasted over 1100 years. It was only when Constantinople fell to the Turks in 1452 that the European Renaissance is said to have fully kicked into high gear, when all of the Jewish and Greek Orthodox scholars who had been living there fled the Muslim terror and sought relative safety in Europe.

So let us then say that the Templars took control of this artifact in turn. This could have happened in their first pass through the city in 1090, when they and other crusaders sacked it on their way to the First Crusades. It was only after this – after capturing Jerusalem and becoming stationed on the Temple Mount – that they formally organized themselves into an order. Then they started digging for buried treasure there, just as Constantine's mother had done after (in my proposed scenario) Constantine came into the possession of Baphomet. Perhaps Baphomet operates better as a talisman and divination device when it is used in conjunction with other holy relics. Perhaps that explains why the Templars were eager to get the Mandylion, which could have been a copy of the Baphomet head, rather than the original.

After coming to possess the Baphomet, I think the Knights probably formed a pact with the deity connected to it. They began to structure their order into an international system for advancing learning and science, and for creating wealth – exactly as Constantine had done by creating the Byzantine Empire. Their wealth and membership expanded exponentially after they created a formal constitution for their Order, which I hypothesize was an extension of their pact with Baphomet. As Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh describe in their book The Temple and the Lodge:

Until 1128… the Templars were said to have consisted only of nine knights… Then, at The Council of Troyes, conducted under the auspices of Saint Bernard, the Templars were given a monastic rule, the equivalent, so to speak, of a constitution, and were thereby formally established…

From 1128 on, the Order expanded at an extraordinary pace, receiving not just a massive influx of recruits, but also immense donations of both money and property. Within a year, they owned lands in France, England, Scotland, Spain, and Portugal. Within a decade, their possessions would extend to Italy, Austria, Germany, Hungary, and Constantinople. In 1131, the king of Aragon bequeathed to them a third of his domains. By the mid-twelfth century, the Temple had already begun to establish itself as the single most wealthy and powerful institution in Christendom, with the sole exception of the Papacy.

If the Templars did possess this "Baphomet", capable of bestowing wisdom and wealth, this may explain what both King Philippe IV and Pope Clement V were itching to take from the Templars when they engineered their arrest, even if they did not fully understand what it was they were looking for. It is said that Philippe's seneschals searched frantically all throughout the Templar properties in France, seeking their fabled "treasure", for he knew they were rich. But he did not really understand that their wealth was created by banking, and was spread throughout their domains, invested in various money-making enterprises. Only a fraction of it actually existed in reserve as physical currency. Alan Butler and Stephen Dafoe described the situation in their book The Warriors and the Bankers: A History of the Knights Templar from 1307 to the Present:

Templar treasuries there may have been, and their accumulated values must have been incredible, but it would have been economic and political suicide to keep one vast depository. It should also be mentioned that much of the Templars' wealth was constantly moving about, and was being used to make more money, thickening out the services on offer and expanding the business empire. The Templars owned vast areas of land in almost every Western European country, the accumulated revenues of which went to finance bigger and better ventures – all run by a staff who were not paid in the general sense of the word, but whose efficiency was legendary. It is a fact of history that neither Philip IV, or anyone else, ever found the Templar treasure that was said to exist, though this may, in part, be due to the same sort of careful pre-planning that ensured the survival of the majority of Templar personnel. Just as surely as De Molay could take care of the brothers and servants of his order… so he must surely have ensured that movable wealth, in the form of treasure and objects, was spirited away to locations beyond the jurisdiction of the French Crown. Unfortunately, the Templars' greatest asset – farm land – could not be moved, and this form of treasure ultimately did fall to either the Knights Hospitaller, or, in many cases, to the monarchs of Europe… It is likely a great deal of their wealth passed to organizations which took their place, such as the Knights of Christ in Portugal…

After the Templars were disbanded, many of them were sentenced to penance in monasteries, and thus they ended up joining these other knightly orders, including the Knights of Christ, the Knights Hospitaller, and the Teutonic Knights. Despite the wishes of King Philippe to claim everything for himself, Pope Clement V stepped in and had most of the Templars' properties transferred to these other orders, especially the Knights Hospitaller.

It is the Hospitallers who I believe most likely inherited the Baphomet, or at least, the secrets of wealth creation which it had imparted to the Knights Templar. The Hospitallers were a rival order during the Templars' time, especially known, as the name implies, for setting up hospitals throughout Europe. These hospitals operated with what was, at the time, cutting-edge medical technology. Like the Templars, their patron saint was John the Baptist. Their full name was actually "the Knights Hospitaller of St. John", but it was later changed to just "the Knights of Saint John." They eventually changed their name again to the one we know them as today: the "Knights of Malta." In their book The Messianic Legacy, Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln described the origins of this group:

The Order of Saint John originated with a hospital dedicated to Saint John in Jerusalem and established around 1070, some thirty years before the First Crusade, by Italian merchants to minister to pilgrims... By 1126… the Knights of Saint John had begun to assume and increasingly military character which was soon to eclipse, though not altogether supplant, their Hospitaller services. In the years that followed, they came to comprise, along with the Templars and subsequently the Teutonic Knights, the major military and financial power in the Holy Land, and one of the major such powers in all Christendom. Like the Templars, they became immensely wealthy.

The Hospitallers began to increase their membership and take on a more military character in 1126, just two years before the Templars began their own first major expansion of manpower and landholdings. However, the true "heyday" of the Hospitallers seems to have come after the fall of the Templars in 1307. Just two years later, in 1309, they moved their headquarters to the island of Rhodes, which, according to The Messianic Legacy, they "governed as their private principality." After three sieges by the Turks, they moved to another island, Malta, in 1530. By the 1600s, the Order's significance had waned according to Baigent, et. al. They write:

By the seventeenth century, the knights still resident on Malta had been left behind by the tide of history, a staunch Catholic enclave still adhering to obsolete chivalric tenets while the rest of Europe moved into a new age of mercantilism and middle-class hegemony.

Nevertheless, they continued to operate in Malta until Napoleon invaded the island in 1798. They re-established themselves in Rome in 1834 and strangely, only then did they change their name to "Order of Malta", to distinguish themselves from other, Protestant, Orders of St. John that had cropped up since their initial inception.

Here in Rome, they settled into a role which they continue to this day. They act as an unofficial intelligence service for the Vatican. They also possess a "sovereignty" granted by the Church which operates in much the same way that the Knights Templar's similarly granted sovereignty once did, and although the Church no longer holds the sway it used to over the governments of the world, these states still recognize the sovereignty of the Knights of Malta. Baigent, et. al. describe in The Messianic Legacy the role that the Knights now play in international affairs:

In international law, the current status of the Knights of Malta is that of an independent sovereign principality. The Grand Master is recognized as a head of state, with a secular rank equivalent to a prince and an ecclesiastical rank equivalent to a cardinal. The Order maintains formal diplomatic relations with a number of countries, especially in Africa and Latin American, and in those countries its ministers enjoy standard diplomatic privileges. The upper grades of the Order are still fastidiously aristocratic. The highest Knights must be able to display a coat of arms dating back at least three hundred years, in unbroken succession from father to son.

The twentieth-century Order of Malta is, needless to say, ideally placed for intelligence work. Its network of membership is international and at the same time well-organized. Its hospital and medical services often place it strategically at points of crisis… Its membership extends from medical staff and ambulance drivers to important figures in politics, business and finance who have access to spheres that ordinary priests would not. In consequence, the Knights of Malta became closely associated with the Vatican's own intelligence department…

The book then goes on to describe how the Knights of Malta liaised for decades with the CIA and European intelligence organizations, as well as other Catholic and right-wing political groups during the latter half of the twentieth century. They worked together to fund and organize an anti-Communist united Europe movement (which has now succeeded in creating the European Union), as well as anti-Communist movements in Latin America. It is also known that many of these knights work for banks and financial institutions that handle the Vatican's accounts.

So could there be a relationship between the Italian merchant families that set up the Knights of St. John, and the Italian merchant families that came to dominate international finance during the post-Templar Renaissance era? Moreover, is not it likely that the secret contingent of Knights Templar, those who may have smuggled the Baphomet head to safety when the Templars were disbanded, also continued the Baphometic tradition of finance by sharing the secrets of wealth creation with these families? Like all chivalric knightly orders, both the Knights Templar and the Knights of St. John were strictly aristocratic organizations meant only for those of noble birth. Of course, all noble families were genetically connected one way or another through common ancestry because of the aristocratic tradition of marrying close to one's own gene pool. So a relationship between Templar and Hospitaller families, and thus, by extension, Italian merchant families, is implicit. It may be significant, then, that the Florentine florin, which became one of the two standard currencies of Europe during the years of Italian mercantilism, bore the image of John the Baptist on its face.

With the Medici family, these possible relationships with Hospitaller families seem even more obvious. For one thing, the name "Medici" itself implies ancestry from someone in the medical profession. For another, the Medicis' own family legend boasts of their descent from a mysterious knight of some unnamed order. As Jack Weatherford explains in A History of Money:

After coming to great power, the family claimed descent from a Knight Averado, who reputedly came to Italy on a pilgrimage to Rome but stopped in Tuscany long enough to slay a giant who had been terrorizing the peasants. The Holy Roman Emperor Charlemagne then supposedly awarded the brave knight a coat of arms bearing three red circles, representing the dents made in his shield by the giant. Some sources outside the family, however, claim that the three circles represent the three balls that have traditionally been the sign of the pawnbroker; others say they represent three coins.

The name Medici indicates descent from someone in the medical or pharmaceutical field, professions that were about equal in prestige to pawnbroking or barbering at that time. The three circles on the family's coat of arms may therefore represent pills, or the cupping glasses that doctors heated and applied to a patient's flesh in order to draw the 'bad blood' up to the skin's surface.

The Medicis were also connected to the royal and noble families ancestrally associated with the Knights Templar. You will recall how I mentioned in a previous chapter that the duke Rene d'Anjou had once employed both Christopher Columbus and Amerigo Vespucci, thus linking him inextricably to the movement to explore America. Rene d'Anjou was a descendant of Templar families as well, and is even believed to have been the Grand Master of a Templar splinter group called the Priory of Sion. In addition, Rene d'Anjou was connected to Cosimo de Medici, and was, like him, a pivotal figure in spreading the enlightened ideas of the Renaissance. Indeed, according to some authors, Rene d'Anjou may have been responsible for persuading Cosimo to undertake a lot of his influential activities. Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh and Henry Lincoln laid out this hypothesis in their bestseller, Holy Blood, Holy Grail:

It would not be inaccurate to regard Rene d'Anjou as a major impetus behind the phenomenon now called the Renaissance. Owing to his numerous Italian possessions he spent some years in Italy, and through his intimate friendship with the ruling Sforza family of Milan established contact with the Medicis of Florence. There is good reason to believe that it was largely Rene's influence that prompted Cosimo de Medici to embark on a series of ambitious projects – projects destined to transform Western Civilization.

Furthermore, this group, the Priory of Sion, is believed to have actually been in the possession of the head of Baphomet, which according to the Priory's own documents, was given to them by the Templars in 1307, the year the Templars were disbanded. The head was referred to in the documents as the "Caput 58M" ("caput" being Latin for "head"), with the "M" written like the astrological symbol for Virgo (which looks very "M-like"). One year earlier in 1306, the Priory of Sion had adopted the subtitle "ORMUS." For their insignia, they chose the "M"-shaped Virgo symbol, inside of which they placed the other four letters of their new name: "O", "R", "U", and "S."

This name "ORMUS" is very significant. For one thing, it was the name of a famous Egyptian alchemist from A.D. 46. It also stems from the name used for God in the Persian religion of Zoroastrianism, and for the wisdom principle in some Gnostic cults: "Ormuzd." It further contains the root word "or", which means "gold" in most European languages. All of this tends to indicate that the Priory of Sion anticipated receiving the Baphomet head, and believed that from it they would soon gain the ability to perform the alchemical task of turning dross into gold.

At the same time, the old medieval Masonic guilds, which once revolved around the actual construction of buildings, now became based upon abstract ideas of philosophy. Thus was born Speculative Freemasonry, with the help of Templar-descended families who essentially turned this organization into a continuation of the Order of the Temple. Freemasonry, as we know, was perhaps the dominant influence on world events during the 1700s, as proto-Masonic/neo-Templar groups were during the 1500s and 1600s.

As I explained previously, the early proto-Masonic occult circles of England came to be led, in the 1600s by a visionary named Sir Francis Bacon. He was one of the founders of the Virginia Company, which first colonized the East Coast of North America for England. He also wrote The New Atlantis, a utopian fantasy in which he spelled out his vision for America as the site of the ultimate Masonic empire, directed by a cabal of enlightened intellectuals who called themselves, collectively, “Solomon’s House.” Francis Bacon and his friends were responsible for laying the groundwork for what was destined to happen in America in 1776, and any secrets which the Templars might have possessed about statecraft or economics may have been passed along to the founders of the U.S. via this “Baconian Circle”, as it has been called.

Indeed, many authors see the United States as an attempt by the Knights Templar to set up their own autonomous state – the ideal state, completely immune to religious and kingly authority, based upon enlightened philosophic principles, and made powerful with economics that the Templars invented, using the eternal hidden power of the universe symbolized by Baphomet. The only thing that one must bear in mind is that by the time the ideal Templar state was created, the Templars had become Freemasons.

In the next section, I explain how these principles are rooted in the ancient religious traditions of Christianity, Judaism, and pagan idol worship. I argue the following: that money has always been viewed as representative of both divine and royal power; that the coining of money has always been associated with the priesthood; that the operation of the economy has always been seen as metaphysical; that the tokens of money have always been thought of as enchanted objects; and that people have often made pacts with divine or demonic powers in order to gain wealth. I also draw an interestingly link between America’s wealth, King Solomon’s treasure, and the famous “lost treasure of the Knights Templar.” I think that this was not a vast horde of gold, but a formula for creating wealth. This formula was probably discovered by the Templars and passed on to certain Freemasons, who used it to construct the architecture of the US banking system.

PART III

Chapter Eleven: The Temple of Money

The pursuit of money has long been thought to be at odds with the pursuit of spirituality. “Ye cannot serve both God and Mammon”, Jesus says in the New Testament, “Mammon” being a Syriac word meaning “riches.” We have seen that the Catholic Church has historically condemned the pursuit of wealth by individuals, although the pursuit of wealth by the Church itself has always been laudable and necessary. Similarly, the general religious attitude towards money is reflected in the almost universal prohibition against usury. The Judeo-Christian scriptures specifically prohibit it: Leviticus 25:36-37 tells us: “Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase.” Similarly, we read in Ezekiel 18:13: “Hath given forth upon usury, and hath taken increase: shall he then live? he shall not live: he hath done all these abominations; he shall surely die; his blood shall be upon him.”

While few churches or synagogues enforce these injunctions in modern times, Muslims still observe the prohibition against charging interest to another Muslim. Many Islamic countries find themselves in an economic straight-jacket because of this, and it would be fair to say that the standard of living in these countries might improve greatly if they would abandon it. Some financial institutions who do business in Islamic counties have found clever ways around the injunction, just as the merchants of Renaissance Venice and Florence found loopholes in the Catholic credo.

It may surprise some people, then, to learn that money actually has a religious origin. The oldest known coin currency that has been found is the Sumerian shekel, which dates from around 3000 B.C. It was created for use in a public religious rite known as “sacred prostitution.” The priestesses of the fertility goddess Ishtar served her by offering themselves as representatives of her to male worshippers. It was thought that if the men simulated intercourse with the goddess, this would stimulate fertility in the land. A very important part of the ritual was the donation that occurred beforehand. The worshipper was expected to make offerings to the goddess in the form of wheat, which was the main agricultural product that they were asking the goddess to stimulate the production of.

During religious festivals, worshippers would bring a portion of their yearly wheat crop to the temple, where it was used to feed all of the priests, priestesses, and temple support staff. In exchange, they received one coin for each bushel of wheat, and each coin would entitle them to a visit with one of the priestesses. This is how the coin got its name: “shekel” means “bushel of wheat.” The coin featured a sheaf of wheat on one side, and a depiction of Ishtar on the other. This identification of money with wheat continues into the present day, where words that translate as “bread” or “corn” are used as slang terms for money.

The origin of money in Greece was similar. Beginning in 1000 B.C., they minted coins as tokens given to the worshippers of Dionysus in exchange for the donation of a bull to the Dionysian temple. These bulls would all be sacrificed at the annual celebration known as the “sacred feast”, to which Dionysus himself was invited. Half of the meat would be burned in honor of the god, while the rest was shared by the congregants – all those who could furnish a coin as proof of their donation.

As well, in contrast to the modern notion that “You can’t take it with you”, the Greeks believed that a deceased soul had to pay the ferryman, Charon, a fee for a ride down the river Styx to the underworld, Hades. Thus it was a tradition to place a coin under the tongue of a dead man. It was thought that if he did not have the fare for the ride, the man's soul would be lost in limbo, haunting the Earth forever. This tradition survived in the Western world into the early twentieth century, where it was customary to place two pennies on the eyelids of the deceased. (Note that even the economy of Hades is subject to inflation.)

When the large-scale minting of coins in Rome began in 269 B.C., this too had a connection to the divine. The new silver coin, called the "denarius" (root of the Spanish word for "money" - "dinero") was minted in the temple of the goddess Juno Moneta. This was the same Juno who was the wife of Jupiter, but she had been given the surname "Moneta", in much the same way that the Madonna is given specific appellations in Catholicism, named after various apparitions that she has made (Our Lady of Lourdes, etc). "Moneta" means "to warn", and its application to Juno stems from the following incident, described by Jack Weatherford in A History of Money:

As an extension of her role as protector of women and guardian of the family, Juno became the patroness of the Roman state. According to Roman historians, in the fourth century B.C., the irritated honking of the sacred geese around Juno's temple on Capitoline Hill warned the people of an impending night attack by the Gauls, who were secretly scaling the walls of the citadel.

We should note that as the wife of Jupiter, the most high god of the Romans, Juno was the most high goddess, the Queen of Heaven, and thus was essentially equivalent to the Greek Hera, wife of Zeus, or to the Eastern goddess, Ishtar. You will recall that in a previous chapter I described the phenomenon of political states throughout history identifying themselves with a national goddess figure (Columbia for the Americans, Britannia for the British, Marianne for the French, etc). Juno played that role for the Romans, who saw her as the protectress of the state. Thus, the issuance of money was one of the activities in Rome that she was thought to preside over. It is from Juno's surname of "Moneta" that the English words "money", "monetary", and "mint" are derived. Jack Weatherford notes that there are similar words in many other languages, and also mentions the fact that the use of these words continues the ancient association between money and the goddess. He writes:

Cognates in other European languages also derive from 'moneta', including the Spanish 'moneda', meaning 'coin.' From very early classical times, money showed a close relationship to the divine and to the female. We can still see that connection in money-related words in European languages, which are frequently feminine in gender, as in the Spanish 'la moneda' and the German 'die Mark' and 'die Munze' (coin).

In addition, there were a number of ancient societies that valued gold and silver, even before they learned to use it for money, because they associated it with their main god and goddess, the Sun and the Moon. Juno and Jupiter, as well as Hera and Zeus, were lunar and solar deities, with the male god representing the Sun, and his wife representing the Moon. The same associations were made in almost all ancient cultures, and as Jack Weatherford explains, they often made religious offerings of silver and gold to their gods and goddesses:

In particular, gold was considered a divine substance. People around the world noted the resemblance of the color to the sun, a coincidence to which they ascribed a deeper meaning. The ancient Egyptians believed that gold was sacred to Ra, the sun god, and they buried great quantities of it with the corpses of their divine pharaohs. Among the Incas of South America, gold and silver represented the sweat of the sun and the moon, and they covered the walls of their temples with these precious metals. Even after conquest, when the Spaniards took the Indian gold and silver, the natives decorated their new Christian temples with foil paper to imitate the sacred substances, and they tossed gold- and silver-colored confetti into the air in place of gold dust. The ancient people of India considered gold the sacred semen of Agni, the fire god; therefore they donated gold for any service performed by Agni's priests.

In his thorough examination of ancient customs, Atlantis: The Antediluvian World, author Ignatius Donnelly surmised why gold was valued by the ancients so much more than silver:

…as the reverence for the great burning orb of the sun, master of all the manifestations of nature, was tenfold as great as the veneration for the smaller, weaker, and variable goddess of the night, so was the demand for the metal sacred to the sun ten times as great as for the metal sacred to the moon. This view is confirmed by the fact that the root of the word by which the Celts, the Greeks, and the Romans designated gold was the Sanscrit word karat, which means, 'the color of the sun.'

Donnelly then draws our attention to a fascinating custom among the English which demonstrates that the association between the Moon and silver has survived into the modern era:

In England, to this day the new moon is saluted with a bow or a curtsy, as well as the curious practice of 'turning one's silver,' which seems a relic of the offering of the moon's proper metal. The custom of wishing, when one first sees the new moon, is probably a survival of moon-worship; the wish taking the place of the prayer.

Another author, Bernard Lietaer, in his book The Future of Money: Creating New Wealth, Work and a Wiser World, introduces anecdotal evidence which tends to indicate that there is something intrinsic in nature that does indeed link these metals with their respective heavenly bodies. As he states:

Many centuries later, without the need for further clerical intervention, gold and silver remained respectively symbolically associated with the sun and the moon. Their prices settled mysteriously into a stable ratio of 1/13.5, astrologically determined to reflect the heavenly cycles.

What he means regarding the heavenly cycles is that there are thirteen lunar cycles for every solar year, and in a lunar year (thirteen cycles of twenty-eight days each), there are 364 days. Thus the Moon, and by extension, silver, is linked symbolically with the number 13. More evidence of a link between silver and the Moon comes from A Beginner's Guide to Constructing the Universe: The Mathematical Archetypes of Nature, Art, and Science, by Michael S. Schneider, where he writes:

Just as gold is the metal whose color, and inability to tarnish, has traditionally associated it with the sun, silver is linked with the moon. Indeed, on a clear night in the country the moon appears quite silvery. The ancients chose a symbol more appropriate than they may have known. It was only in this century that scientists probing the atom found that the atomic weight of silver, its weight relative to carbon, is 107.870, or nearly 108, a tenth of the moon's radius of 1080 miles.

There was another ancient culture which also used precious metals for religious purposes, and they are directly related to our inquiry. I am speaking of the ancient Jews and Israelites of the Holy Land. The origin of money in ancient Israel was the same as with all civilizations of antiquity: it originated with the priesthood.

Chapter Twelve: The Iniquity of Priesthood

In Old Testament times, the practice of priesthood in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel was restricted to those of the tribe of Levi. Every single male Levite was required to serve in the priesthood. That was the only occupation allowed to him. This was a circumstance demanded by God himself, who had personally stipulated not only that all priests should be Levites, and all Levites priests, but that the priests should also be banned from owning property. Their only source of income was the tithes and other offerings given to them by the people of Israel in exchange for their priestly services. The Israelites were obliged to give ten percent of their own earnings to the priesthood, and often paid for each priestly duty performed as well. But the Levites were not allowed to own any land, and while the other eleven tribes each had their own territory within Israel, the Levites were obliged to live scattered throughout the other territories. Sometimes they lived in public-owned housing, in or near the centers of religious worship, and sometimes they lived as guests at the houses of certain wealthy families who could afford to hire a personal priest.

The Old Testament is very clear about the fact that service in God's priesthood was, more than anything else, a burden. As it states in Numbers 18:

And the LORD said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father's house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood....And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel: to you they are given as a gift for the LORD, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation....

But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance. But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave offering unto the LORD, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance.

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes which I have given you from them for your inheritance, then ye shall offer up an heave offering of it for the LORD, even a tenth part of the tithe.

The Levites were chosen for the priesthood partially as a punishment for the behavior of their progenitor, Levi, who, along with his brother Simeon, had waged a genocidal war on the nation of Shechem, against the wishes of Jehovah, and of their father, Jacob. This led Jacob to pronounce a curse upon the two sons when he was on his deathbed. He stated:

Simeon and Levi are brethren; instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united: for in their anger they slew a man, and in their selfwill they digged down a wall. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in

Jacob, and scatter them in Israel.

However, it was not until the Exodus that God cursed them with the iniquity of priesthood. On the night of the first Passover, God slaughtered the firstborn of every house in Egypt. But he passed over the houses of the Hebrews, who had painted the doors of their houses with lamb's blood at the command of God. Thus did the angel of death know to leave those houses alone. Yet in exchange for sparing the firstborn of the Hebrews, God demanded a substitute sacrifice. The sons of the tribe of Levi were chosen as the substitute, and although they were allowed to continue living, their inheritance, promised tribe descended from Jacob, was taken away from them. Moses and Aaron (both Levites) led the Hebrews out of Egypt and initiated an everlasting covenant between God and the Hebrews, in which they would pay homage and sacrifice to God in exchange for His protection. The Levites were then called to the priesthood, to be the mediators of this contract.

In a sense, the Levites became the most powerful people in Israel, and yet they had no property. They were the scapegoats who took on ultimate responsibility for the community. If the people of Israel sinned against God, then God would punish the people in general, but would punish the Levites foremost for failing to properly lead. If God punished the people of Israel, then the people blamed the priests for failing to secure God's favor. Thus the Levite priests endured much, and wholly earned the tithes that they received. The tithes were not considered gifts, but rather payment for services rendered, and the priests used what they were given not only for religious activities, but for their own personal needs as well. This was considered not a potential corrupting influence, but as a bulwark against corruption, for a well-paid priesthood was less likely to accept bribes to perform impious deeds.

Nevertheless, the priests of Israel often did indulge in impious deeds, by accepting money or other donations in exchange for performing rites to heathen gods. Although God may have looked down upon such behavior, it was considered quite normal in Israel, especially when times were hard financially. In Louis Ginzberg's The Legends of the Jews, the author writes about a certain Levite priest, the grandson of Moses, who learned from his grandfather that if a priest could not earn an acceptable living serving God, it was better to supplement one's income by serving heathen gods for heathen clients, rather than begging for handouts from fellow Israelites. As Ginzberg writes:

From his grandfather he had heard the rule that a man should do 'Abodah Zarah' for hire rather than be dependent upon his fellow-creatures. The meaning of 'Abodah Zarah' here naturally is 'strange', in the sense of 'unusual' work, but he took the term in its ordinary acceptation of 'service of strange gods.'

Perhaps because heathen religious rituals often involved the rites of "sacred prostitution", as previously described, with the use of "temple prostitutes" who were paid for their services, the worship of strange gods is often referred to in the Old Testament as "whoring." In heathen religions, as in the Judaic tradition, there was quite a significance placed on the relationship between the service of the priests and the money they were paid to perform it. Simply put, the tithes paid to the priests, along with the prayers, animal sacrifices, and other rituals was seen as providing the power – the spiritual energy

- upon which the priesthood operated. The money paid by the congregation to the priests was a financial sacrifice to the god(s) they were servicing.

This is illustrated by the fact that heathen rites often involved the worship of religious idols which were made out of gold and silver that had been donated to the cause, sometimes by members of the congregation. In The Book of Judges, we read about Micah, the Levite priest I discussed earlier who was descended from Moses. It was he who performed "strange service" for Israelites with heathen beliefs. Micah held services with a handful of religious idols which he had crafted out of silver that had been donated by his mother Delilah specifically for this cause. By donating this silver, she was providing a seed upon which Micah's lucrative priesthood would grow, for he would then charge believing heathens money to perform rites on their behalf in homage to these idols. The same principle was illustrated in the story of the golden calf in Exodus, which was fashioned by the high priest Aaron out of the golden jewelry donated by the people who worshipped it. Thus it "contained", spiritually, their covenant with Belial, the deity it represented - a covenant bought with the price of that gold, which is why Moses had them drink the gold as a punishment - to internalize the curse which God had placed upon them for worshipping the calf.

Chapter Thirteen: A Trespass Offering

There is another story in the Old Testament which illustrates a similar principle as that found in the golden calf story. It is the story of the plague at Ashdod told in I Samuel 4 – 6. When Israel was at war with the Philistines, there was an incident in which the enemy actually managed to capture the Ark of the Covenant. They took it to Ashdod and set it up in the Temple of Dagon, their god of wisdom, placing it right next to the great statue of Dagon that was there. The next day, however, the Philistines awoke to a surprise. I Samuel 5:3 – 5 states:

And when they arose early on the morrow morning, behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground before the ark of the LORD; and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold; only the stump of Dagon was left to him. Therefore neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon in Ashdod unto this day. But the hand of the LORD was heavy upon them of Ashdod, and he destroyed them, and smote them with emerods, even Ashdod and the coasts thereof.

These "emerods" appear to be bubonic tumors, a punishment brought by God to the Philistines for defiling the Holy Ark. The Philistines found that everywhere they tried to bring the Ark, a plague of "emerods" broke out. I Samuel 5:7 – 11 says:

And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us: for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god. They sent therefore and gathered all the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel? And they answered, Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel about thither. And it was so, that, after they had carried it about, the hand of the LORD was against the city with a very great destruction: and he smote the men of the city, both small and great, and they had emerods in their secret parts. Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron. And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people. So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to his own place, that it slay us not, and our people: for there was a deadly destruction throughout all the city; the hand of God was very heavy there.

After consulting with their oracles, the priests of the Philistines decided to return the Ark to the Israelites, hoping that this would end the plague. Also, to ward off any future bad karma, they decided to make a "trespass offering" - an "I'm sorry" gift to the God of Israel. The priests instructed the Philistines to make golden replicas of the emerods they had been smitten with, as well as effigies of the mice that, presumably, had carried the plague everywhere the Ark went. I Samuel 6: 3-8 quotes the priests as saying:

...If ye send away the ark of the God of Israel, send it not empty; but in any wise return him a trespass offering: then ye shall be healed, and it shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you. Then said they, What shall be the trespass offering which we shall return to him? They answered, Five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines: for one plague was on you all, and on your lords. Wherefore ye shall make images of your emerods, and images of your mice that mar the land; and ye shall give glory unto the God of Israel: peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land. ... Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go.

Thus we see that the Philistines believed gold was a fitting offering to a foreign god. They also believed that using gold to make representations of their afflictions would cure them of it, if these representations were offered to the god whom they believed to be causing their afflictions.

A fascinating side note is that the Philistine town in which this all started, Ashdod, has been changed in many European renderings to "Azoth." For instance, when the French painter Nicolas Poussin portrayed the incident, he titled his work La Peste d'Azoth. The "Azoth" is also a code name for the alchemical element of Mercury. It actually represents the idea of totality because it starts with "A", which is the first letter in most alphabets, and end with "z", "o," and "th", which are the final letters of the Latin,

Greek, and Hebrew alphabets. It was thought by some alchemists in Renaissance Europe (those who studied the teachings of an alchemical sage named Paracelsus) that the "Azoth" was a cure for syphilis, which they believed was the true nature of the plague at Ashdod. Nicholas Poussin was such a follower of Paracelsus, as explained by Sheila Barker in her article "Poussin, plague, and early modern medicine" in the December 2004 edition of The Art Bulletin:

Given Poussin's contact with a Paracelsan adherent in the years preceding The Plague of Ashdod, it should also be mentioned that in certain learned circles, Azoth, French for Ashdod, signified more than just the city of the Philistines. Azoth was the name of the kabbalistic sign for the mercury principle in alchemical operations; it was a name for the mercury (argento vivo, quicksilver) cautiously recommended by both Paracelsus and Potier as an effective but dangerous remedy for syphilis; and it was the secret name of Paracelsus's famous panacea ('Azoth of the Red Lion'), extracted from cinnabar and associated with the alchemistic philosopher's stone. This last significance is laid out in medical writings including Potier's Pharmacopoea spagirica and his De febribus, as well as in esoteric writings such as Jacques Nuysement's 'Philosophical Poem on the Philosophers' Azoth' and a late sixteenth-century pseudo-Paracelsan treatise that identifies this substance, 'AZOT,' as the 'arcanum sanctum' (the secret of secrets) and associates it etymologically with the kabbalistic theme of the Ark of the Israelites - the same as that seen in Poussin's picture.

The idea of the "trespass offering" was not unique to the Philistines. The Israelites likewise made these offerings to their God, whenever they sinned against him, in an effort to appease him. The most important such offering was that which was made on behalf of the whole kingdom, in the form of the Scapegoat sacrifice on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. The ritual is described in Leviticus 16, in which two goats are sacrificed, one of whom (the Scapegoat) is literally cursed with the blame of all of the people's sins for the entire year. (Interestingly, the Hebrew word for the Scapegoat is "Azazel", the name of a Middle Eastern goat deity thought to have partially inspired the idea of Baphomet.) Later, especially after the destruction of the Temple of Solomon, trespass offerings would be made mainly in cash.

Chapter Fourteen: The Shekel of the Sanctuary

The payment of tithes to the priesthood of Israel, and to their royal government as well, became a major part of the lifestyle of the ancient Israelites. Either way, whether received by the king or the priesthood, tithes were considered sacrifices unto the Lord himself. The first recording of the practice in the Bible is in Genesis, where Abraham gave a tenth of his possessions as a donation to the priest-king of Salem, Melchizedek. In Genesis 28:22, Jacob promised God that he would give "the tenth" after his divine vision at Bethel, which led to him building a temple of God there. But tithing developed over time into a rather complex system. As described by The Catholic Encyclopedia, (http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/), tithing is:

Generally defined as 'the tenth part of the increase arising from the profits of land and stock, allotted to the clergy for their support or devoted to religious or charitable uses.' A more radical definition is 'the tenth part of all fruits and profits justly acquired, owed to God in recognition of his supreme dominion over man, and to be paid to the ministers of the church.' ... Under the Mosaic Law the payment of tithes was made obligatory. The Hebrews are commanded to offer to God the tenth part of the produce of the fields, of the fruits of the trees, and the firstborn of oxen and of sheep (Lev., xxvii, 30; Deut., xiv, 22). In Deuteronomy there is a mention not only of an annual tithe, but also of a full tithe to be paid once every three years. While it was to God Himself that the tithes had to be paid, yet we read (Num., xviii, 21) that He transfers them to His sacred ministers: 'I have given to the sons of Levi all the tithes of Israel for a possession, for the ministry wherewith they serve me in the tabernacle of the covenant.' In paying the tithe, the Hebrews divided the annual harvest into ten parts, one of which was given to the Levites after the first-fruits had been subtracted. This was partitioned by them among the priests. The remainder of the harvest was then divided into ten new parts, and a second tithe was carried by the head of the household to the sanctuary to serve as a sacred feast for his family and the Levites.

If the journey to the temple was unusually long, money could be substituted for the offering in kind. At the triennial tithe, a third decimation was made and a tenth part was consumed at home by the householder with his family, the Levities, strangers, and the poor. This triennial year was called the year of tithes (Deut., xxvi, 12). As the tithes were the main support of the priests, it was later ordained that the offerings should be stored in the temple (II Par., xxxi, 11).

The Catholic Encyclopedia then goes on to point out that tithing was widespread throughout the ancient world – not just offering donations to the priesthood, but specifically donating a tenth of one's holdings. They offer the following analysis:

The explanation of why the tenth part should have been chosen among so many different peoples is said to be (apart from a common primitive revelation) that mystical signification of the number ten, viz., that it signifies totality, for it contains all the numbers that make up the numerical system, and indeed all imaginable series of numbers, and so it represents all kinds of property, which is a gift to God. All species of property were consequently reckoned in decades, and by consecrating one of these parts to God, the proprietor recognized the Source of his goods.

In addition to these tithes, a tax was instituted among the Israelites to support the upkeep of the Tabernacle, when it was built to house the Ark of the Covenant. When God instructed Moses on how to build the Ark, the Tabernacle, and all of the other priestly accoutrements, He told Moses that the materials had to be donated by the Israelites. As he explains in Exodus 25: 1-8:

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying. Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering: of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering. And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass, And blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair. And rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins, and shittim wood. Oil for the light, spices for anointing oil, and for sweet incense. Onyx stones, and stones to be set in the ephod, and in the breastplate. And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them.

This is yet another example of the ancient idea that members of any particular cult must donate the materials used to craft their idols and places of worship. Notice that gold is the primary material used, being the most appropriate gift to honor a god.

The Lord goes on to explain to Moses the exact "pattern" to use when constructing each item – indicating that there was something sacred about every detail of the dimensions of these objects, the materials used, and the manner in which they were obtained. The Tabernacle was made to house the Ark, in which the spirit of the Lord was believed to literally reside. Inside of this Ark the Tablets of Testimony were also placed, written by the very finger of God, detailing the contract between God and the Israelites that was being continued with the priestly services performed in the Tabernacle.

In the next few passages, God describes at length how the Levites should take a census of the Israelites every year, and tax them all a half-shekel each, "after the shekel of the sanctuary." Yes, like the Sumerians and other ancient peoples, the Israelites called their currency the "shekel." Exodus 30: 12 -16 states:

When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the LORD, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them. This they shall give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary: (a shekel is twenty gerahs:) an half shekel shall be the offering of the LORD. Every one that passeth among them that are numbered, from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the LORD. The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel, when they give an offering unto the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls. And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls.

The phrase "shekel of the Sanctuary" is used repeatedly throughout the Pentateuch, and refers to the fact that the standard weight for Israelite shekels was to be measured and assayed (tested) within the Tabernacle by the Levites, as it later would be in the Temple of Solomon. The shekel's weight was actually related mathematically to the size of the Israelite cubit, the standard of which was extracted from the measurements of the Holy of Holies, the 20 cubit by 20 cubit by 20 cubit perfect cube in the center of the Tabernacle, in which the Ark was kept, and in which only the High Priest Aaron and his sons were allowed to step foot.

But when people speak of "the Sanctuary" and the "Holy of Holies" now, they are usually referring not to the Tabernacle, but to King Solomon's Temple, the crowning achievement of Israel. It would become not only the house of God, and the center of an empire, but a symbol of wisdom and wealth in perfection to future Jews, Christians, Templars, and Freemasons.

Chapter Fifteen: King Solomon's Temple

Wisdom, wealth, and the building of the Temple are the three things that King Solomon is best known for. The wisdom he acquired from God himself, when he went before the Ark of the Covenant to pray. II Chronicles starts off with this story, telling us in Chapter 1:6-12 that:

…Solomon went up thither to the brazen altar before the LORD, which was at the tabernacle of the congregation, and offered a thousand burnt offerings upon it. In that night did God appear unto Solomon, and said unto him, Ask what I shall give thee. And Solomon said unto God, Thou hast shewed great mercy unto David my father, and hast made me to reign in his stead. Now, O LORD God, let thy promise unto David my father be established: for thou hast made me king over a people like the dust of the earth in multitude. Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and come in before this people: for who can judge this thy people, that is so great?

God was impressed with the pious and humble nature of Solomon's request. Given the option to be granted anything he wished, he chose wisdom! Because of this, God blessed Solomon even beyond what he had requested:

And God said to Solomon, Because this was in thine heart, and thou hast not asked riches, wealth, or honour, nor the life of thine enemies, neither yet hast asked long life; but hast asked wisdom and knowledge for thyself, that thou mayest judge my people, over whom I have made thee king: Wisdom and knowledge is granted unto thee; and I will give thee riches, and wealth, and honour, such as none of the kings have had that have been before thee, neither shall there any after thee have the like.

It was after God invested him with this wisdom that Solomon started becoming very wealthy, collecting chariots and horses, importing exotic linens and spices, jewels, gold and silver, and numerous other luxury items. In particular, II Chronicles says that he "made silver and gold at Jerusalem as plenteous as stones." He then became obsessed with a mission that he had inherited from his father David: to build a spectacular temple to house the Ark of God, instead of the tent that it had heretofore been sitting in. He also wanted to build an extravagant royal palace for himself and his many wives. II Chronicles treats the creation of these two buildings as one event, whereas I Kings, which also tells the story of Solomon, specifies that he spent the first seven years building the temple, and then the next thirteen years building the royal palace. Nevertheless, they were both part of the same overall architectural compound.

II Chronicles details how Solomon reached out to the King of Tyre, Hiram (called "Huram" in II Chronicles), who had previously been an ally of his father David. Hiram was also wealthy and wise, and ruled over a powerful Phoenician island city-state, which at the time held a vast empire with numerous colonies, and was the center of the world's merchant economy. They had colonies in Greece, Northern Africa, Carthage, Sicily, Corsica, and Spain. The word "Tyre" is actually a Latinization of the name of this city. It was called in the Phoenician tongue "Assur", or "Sur", as the natives who live there still call it. The word means "rock", and is connected to the name of the later people known as the “Assyrians”, as well as the modern Syrians. When Tyre was dominant, most of the Phoenicians or, as they termed themselves, “Canaanites”, were also loosely called “Tyrians” by the outside world, or else, “Sidonians”, after another Phoenician city, Sidon.

All collectively termed “the Sea Peoples” by historians, the Phoenicians were sea-farers and merchants. The word “Canaanite” became a more generalized international term for “merchant.” Meanwhile, “Phoenician” is a term that is derived from one of the region’s chief exports, a purple dye made from snails that was highly valued for coloring textiles, specifically those made to be worn by royalty. (The color has been associated with royalty ever since.) “Phoenix” also became the name of a mythical bird, which purportedly was able to live 500 years and then died, only to be reborn from the ashes of her own funeral pyre. This bird became a symbol of alchemy, and was employed by the Freemasons. (You will recall that Manly P. Hall believed the eagle on the back of the Great Seal of the U.S. was meant to covertly represent a phoenix.)

The Phoenicians developed an alphabet (technically called an “abjad” because it contains no vowels), which they developed for use in trade. This 22-letter abjad formed the basis of the Greek alphabet and, in an indirect way, all those of the Middle East and India. The major goddess worshipped by the Sea Peoples, Astarte, is probably related to the Phoenician name of Tyre, “Assur.” Their main god, known as “Baal” or “Melqart”, became united over time in their minds with the Greek figure of Hercules. In King Hiram’s time, there was a magnificent temple of Melqart which dominated the island, and outside of the entrance to the temple were two massive pillars, representing the Pillars of Hercules. This temple became the blueprint for the one that Solomon was to have built.

Solomon and Hiram had a close friendship and business relationship, which was a continuation of a friendship between Hiram and David. II Chronicles, 2:3 states:

… Solomon sent to Huram the king of Tyre, saying, As thou didst deal with David my father, and didst send him cedars to build him an house to dwell therein, even so deal with me.

The Tyrians did indeed provide lumber for the building of King David's royal palace. But there was more going on in this new relationship between Solomon and Hiram than just the continuation of a hereditary alliance. They were forming a new bond. I Kings 5:12 describes it thusly:

And the LORD gave Solomon wisdom, as he promised him: and there was peace between Hiram and Solomon; and they two made a league together.

The phrasing of this is interesting, as though the diplomatic relations between Hiram and Solomon were a result of the wisdom that he obtained from God. At any rate, the word "league" is defined by Webster's Dictionary as "a covenant or compact made between persons, parties, states, etc., for the promotion or maintenance of common interests or for mutual assistance or service. "This is what Hiram and Solomon had together, and this is why their relationship serves as an example of the ideal fraternal bond in the rituals of Freemasonry. The league between Solomon and Hiram was formed when Hiram agreed to help provide materials, architects, and workmen for the building of Solomon's Temple, in exchange for certain provisions. I Kings 5:8-11 says:

… Hiram sent to Solomon, saying, I have considered the things which thou sentest to me for: and I will do all thy desire concerning timber of cedar, and concerning timber of fir. My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea: and I will convey them by sea in floats unto the place that thou shalt appoint me, and will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them: and thou shalt accomplish my desire, in giving food for my household. So Hiram gave Solomon cedar trees and fir trees according to all his desire. And Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil: thus gave Solomon to Hiram year by year.

The reason why the Tyrians needed these things from the Israelites was because the Phoenicians were not very good at conducting their own agriculture, since their land was non-arable. Necessity being the mother of invention, the Phoenicians developed sophisticated trade networks and practices that gained them enough wealth and power to obtain everything else they needed or wanted. Also, luck had positioned them in the middle of the trade routes between Mesopotamia, Arabia and Egypt. They were able to use this strategic position as leverage to impose their own trade agreements on the surrounding nations.

The agreement the Tyrians made with Solomon began with the building of the Temple, but quickly grew into a much larger trading partnership that greatly expanded the wealth and territories of Israel. The Tyrians even allowed Israel to make use of their shipping fleet. Clearly Solomon's wisdom was guiding him on how to create a vibrant economy.

In every way, the Temple reflected the concept of extravagant wealth, and of its continual growth. The materials used in building the temple were extremely valuable: the cedars of Lebanon, expensive cloth dyed with Tyre's famous purple, and lots of gold. Furthermore, every item was crafted by the best craftsmen in the world, the Phoenicians, most especially the architecture of the Temple itself. The Sea Peoples were among the ancient world's most accomplished temple-builders.

In the rituals of Freemasonry, there are two "Hirams" who each play a role in their rituals regarding the building of Solomon's Temple. One is Hiram, the king of Tyre, and the other they call "Hiram Abiff", referring to another figure mentioned in both II Chronicles and I Kings, who was a master architect sent by Hiram of Tyre to direct the building of Solomon's Temple.

Whoever this architect was, he created Solomon's Temple as a virtual replica of the Tyrian Temple of Melqart. He even added the two pillars outside the entrance. II Chronicles, 3:17 states:

And he reared up the pillars before the temple, one on the right hand, and the other on the left; and called the name of that on the right hand Jachin, and the name of that on the left Boaz.

When the work of building the Temple was through, seven years later, Solomon made a point of filling it with objects that had already been dedicated to the Lord, as we read in II Chronicles, 5:1:

Thus all the work that Solomon made for the house of the LORD was finished: and Solomon brought in all the things that David his father had dedicated; and the silver, and the gold, and all the instruments, put he among the treasures of the house of God.

When dedicating the Temple, he made sacrifices of incalculable magnitude, to show his appreciation to God, as it says in II Chronicles,5:6:

Also king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel that were assembled unto him before the ark, sacrificed sheep and oxen, which could not be told nor numbered for multitude.

These were standard practices in the ancient world when commemorating a new temple. Such acts as building the temple with donated materials, filling it with religious treasures, and sacrificing animals upon a Temple's dedication were all believed to build up a powerful spiritual energy reserve within the temple, to turn it into a conduit for this power to be passed between the congregation and the gods they worshipped. So too was the placing of a special "cornerstone" in a temple's foundation. Solomon's Temple is said to have had a special cornerstone, which elsewhere in the Bible is used as a metaphor for Christ. Freemasons have used it as a symbol of the Philosopher's Stone. The Temple could be thought of as a living, growing organism, and the cornerstone as the seed at its root. In fact, Solomon's Temple had a number of vegetation motifs in its gold and brass work (representations of lilies, pomegranates, etc), which would tend to reinforce this notion.

The Temple became the central foundation of a new covenant between God and the Israelites, negotiated by Solomon after the Temple was built. Solomon asked for, and received, a new deal with God: as long as the people walked in the ways of God, a son of David would always sit upon the throne of Judah, and God would bless them abundantly all the days of their lives. If they sinned, they were to pray for forgiveness, in the direction of the Temple, in much the same way that Muslims now pray towards Mecca. I Kings, 9:2-9 reads:

And the LORD said unto him, I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication, that thou hast made before me: I have hallowed this house, which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever; and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually. And if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart, and in uprightness, to do according to all that I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments: Then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever, as I promised to David thy father, saying, There shall not fail thee a man upon the throne of Israel. But if ye shall at all turn from following me, ye or your children, and will not keep my commandments and my statutes which I have set before you, but go and serve other gods, and worship them: Then will I cut off Israel out of the land which I have given them; and this house, which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight; and Israel shall be a proverb and a byword among all people: And at this house, which is high, every one that passeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss; and they shall say, Why hath the LORD done thus unto this land, and to this house? And they shall answer, Because they forsook the LORD their God, who brought forth their fathers out of the land of Egypt, and have taken hold upon other gods, and have worshipped them, and served them: therefore hath the LORD brought upon them all this evil.

In addition, even non-Israelite strangers could become involved in the covenant, if they prayed towards the Temple. As we read in II Chronicles, 6:32 – 6:35:

Moreover concerning the stranger, which is not of thy people Israel, but is come from a far country for thy great name's sake, and thy mighty hand, and thy stretched out arm; if they come and pray in this house; Then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for; that all people of the earth may know thy name, and fear thee, as doth thy people Israel, and may know that this house which I have built is called by thy name. If thy people go out to war against their enemies by the way that thou shalt send them, and they pray unto thee toward this city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name; Then hear thou from the heavens their prayer and their supplication, and maintain their cause.

The agreement even specifies that foreigners can appeal to Israel's god and obtain victory in battle (provided that battle is not against Israel, of course). One cannot help but think that Solomon interjected this particular part into the agreement so that his friends in Tyre could enjoy the benefits of the new covenant as well.

Chapter Sixteen: King Solomon's Treasure

Just as the agreement had stipulated, after Solomon built the Temple, his kingdom's already voluminous wealth began to grow exponentially. As it states in II Chronicles, 7:11:

Thus Solomon finished the house of the LORD, and the king's house: and all that came into Solomon's heart to make in the house of the LORD, and in his own house, he prosperously effected.

One of the ways in which Solomon managed to increase his wealth was by having the subject nations in his empire pay him tributes. I Kings, 4:21-24 tells us that Solomon's empire was quite large:

And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life...

For he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphsah even to Azzah, over all the kings on this side the river: and he had peace on all sides round about him.

I Kings, 9:20:22 also tells us how he forced the people of these subject nations to serve him as "bondmen." This is how the empire was maintained. It further specifies that Solomon exempted his own people from having to perform labor. It states:

And all the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, which were not of the children of Israel, Their children that were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel also were not able utterly to destroy, upon those did Solomon levy a tribute of bondservice unto this day. But of the children of Israel did Solomon make no bondmen: but they were men of war, and his servants, and his princes, and his captains, and rulers of his chariots, and his horsemen.

In addition, Solomon even accepted gifts from foreign travelers who would come to hear him share his now world-renowned wisdom. Such was the case with the Queen of Sheba, who ruled another rich land, and came for an extended stay in Israel to test Solomon's wit. In II Chronicles: 9:9 it says:

And she gave the king an hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of spices great abundance, and precious stones: neither was there any such spice as the queen of Sheba gave king Solomon.

More evidence of Solomon running his "wisdom racket" (in which he accepted gifts in exchange for dispersing advice) can be found in extra-biblical sources, such as those compiled in Louis Ginzberg's Legends of the Jews, Volume IV, where he quotes

Jewish folk myths regarding the many riddle contests which King Hiram and King Solomon would have. Hiram would compose mind-bending riddles, which Solomon would inevitably crack, forcing Hiram to pay him a monetary tribute.

Through these various methods, and through international trade utilizing the ships and the shipping routes of the Tyrians, Solomon had a constant stream of wealth flowing into his country and constantly multiplying itself. As I Kings, 10:29 describes it:

Now the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred threescore and six talents of gold. Beside that he had of the merchantmen, and of the traffick of the spice merchants, and of all the kings of Arabia, and of the governors of the country. And king Solomon made two hundred targets of beaten gold: six hundred shekels of gold went to one target. And he made three hundred shields of beaten gold; three pound of gold went to one shield: and the king put them in the house of the forest of Lebanon. Moreover the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold. The throne had six steps, and the top of the throne was round behind: and there were stays on either side on the place of the seat, and two lions stood beside the stays. And twelve lions stood there on the one side and on the other upon the six steps: there was not the like made in any kingdom. And all king Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon. For the king had at sea a navy of Tharshish with the navy of Hiram: once in three years came the navy of Tharshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks. So king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches and for wisdom. And all the earth sought to Solomon, to hear his wisdom, which God had put in his heart. And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and garments, and armour, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year. And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem. And the king made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones, and cedars made he to be as the sycamore trees that are in the vale, for abundance. And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price. And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and an horse for an hundred and fifty: and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means.

But multiplying horses, wives, and gold unto oneself are three things specifically prohibited in the Hebrews scriptures for a king, who is supposed to remain humble and God-fearing. Solomon's wealth and decadent lifestyle was making him weak to the temptations of sin. Moreover, Solomon's many wives, including the daughter of the Pharaoh of Egypt, were turning his heart away from the one true God, and towards the abominable deities of the heathen. The scriptures tell us that his wives persuaded him to build temples to these other gods, including "Ashtoreth" and "Milcom", the equivalent of Tyre's Astarte and Melqart. We read in I Kings, 11:1 – 10:

But king Solomon loved many strange women, together with the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites; Of the nations concerning which the LORD said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you: for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods: Solomon clave unto these in love. And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods: and his heart was not perfect with the LORD his God, as was the heart of David his father. For Solomon went after Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites. And Solomon did evil in the sight of the LORD, and went not fully after the LORD, as did David his father. Then did Solomon build an high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon. And likewise did he for all his strange wives, which burnt incense and sacrificed unto their gods. And the LORD was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the LORD God of Israel, which had appeared unto him twice, And had commanded him concerning this thing, that he should not go after other gods: but he kept not that which the LORD commanded.

Obviously, this constituted a breach in the contract that Solomon had with God, and it would cost him the kingdom. But God would not take it away during Solomon's lifetime. Honoring previous agreements with Solomon's ancestors, God allowed the kingdom to remain intact while Solomon lived, but rent it during the reign of his son Rehoboam. Always true to his contracts, God still allowed Solomon's descendant to keep the throne of Judah, Jerusalem, and rule over the tribe of Judah, again because of previous agreements, while the rest of the tribes were lost to his rival, Jeroboam. Thus were created the separate kingdoms of Judah and Israel, and from that time on, God was out to get them both, to punish them for the sins of Solomon. I Kings, 11:12 -13 tells us:

Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant. Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father's sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; but will give one tribe to thy son for David my servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake which I have chosen.

Chapter Seventeen: Solomon's Pact with the King of Demons

The classic book series, The Legends of the Jews, by Louis Ginzberg, which draws upon extra-Biblical Jewish, Arabic, and Christian sources, tells a very different account of Solomon's life. According to the story presented therein, the main assistance which Solomon received in the building of the temple came not from Hiram of Tyre, but from demons. The text says that because of his wisdom, God gave Solomon to rule not only over his kingdom and empire, but over all beasts, and all spirits as well. It says that Solomon knew "the language of the birds", which is a form of cant described by alchemists as being all-powerful, able to command people, animals, and ethereal beings, and to alter physical reality. As the book explains:

Never has there lived a man privileged, like Solomon, to make the demons amenable to his will. God endowed him with the ability to turn the vicious power of demons into a power working to the advantage of men. He invented formulas of incantation by which diseases were alleviated, and others by which demons were exorcised so that they were banished forever. As his personal attendants he had spirits and demons whom he could send hither and thither on the instant. He could grow tropical plants in Palestine, because his ministering spirits secured water for him from India.

In this version of the story, when Solomon invited the Queen of Sheba to come visit him, he actually sent her a message demanding that she immediately come and pay homage to him, or else:

… I shall send out kings, legions, and riders against thee. Thou askest, who are these kings, legions, and riders of King Solomon? The beasts of the field are my kings, the birds my riders, the demons, spirit, and shades of the night my legions. The demons will throttle you in your beds at night, while the beasts will slay you in the field, and the birds will consume your flesh.

So when it came time for Solomon's most ambitious project, the building of the Temple, it was natural that Solomon would turn to the demonic realm for help, according to this account. This was actually not terribly unusual for the time. In an ancient world where it was quite normal to make contracts with spirits in order to obtain one's desires, a demon's assistance in building something was one of the most common requests. Architecture was believed to be one of their areas of expertise, as was the forging of metals, since demons ruled over the subterranean caverns in which these substances were found. But in this story, for the building of the very House of God, Solomon would enlist the help of the greatest demon of all, Asmodeus, whom he compelled to obey him by the use of a magical signet ring. Louis Ginzberg tells us:

The demons were of greatest service to Solomon during the erection of the Temple. It came about in this wise: When Solomon began the building of the Temple, it once happened that a malicious spirit snatched away the money and the food of one of the king's favorite pages. This occurred several times, and Solomon was not able to lay hold on the malefactor. The king besought God fervently to deliver the wicked spirit into his hands. His prayer was granted. The archangel Michael appeared to him, and gave him a small ring having a seal consisting of an engraved stone, and he said to him: 'Take, O Solomon, king, son of David, the gift which the Lord God, the highest Zebaot, hath sent unto thee. With it thou shalt lock up all the demons of the earth, male and female; and with their help thou shalt build up Jerusalem. But thou must wear this seal of God; and this engraving of the seal of the ring sent thee is a Pentalpha.'

The seal of Solomon's ring, the "pentalpha", is just another word for the pentagram. It is so called because, if you look at a pentagram, you will notice that you can actually break it down into three triangles, and also three letters "A", or the Greek "alpha." This is the true "Seal of Solomon", and he used it as all magicians have traditionally used it since then: to imprison demonic spirits, and to bind them to their will. The pentagram is called the "Endless Knot", and was first used by the ancient Sumerians as a sign which meant "shackle" or "prison." It was even used as the City Seal of Jerusalem, according to an article called "the pentagram" on the website of the Masonic Grand Lodge of British Columbia and Yukon, which adds:

Roman Emperor Constantine I, after his defeat of Maxentius and the issuance of the Edict of Milan in 312CE, ascribed his success to his conversion to Christianity and incorporated the pentagram, one point down, into his seal and amulet.

The six-pointed star is more widely referred to nowadays as the "Seal of Solomon", and also as the "Star of David." But anciently, both symbols were used for similar purposes, and both were called by each of those names. However, it was most definitely the pentagram which was featured on Solomon's magical ring. As Ginzberg relates:

Armed with it, Solomon called up all the demons before him, and he asked of each in turn his or her name, as well as the name of the star or constellation or zodiacal sign and of the particular angel to the influence of which each is subject. One after another the spirits were vanquished, and compelled by Solomon to aid in the construction of the Temple.

The manner in which Asmodeus became involved in the building of the Temple occurred when Solomon sought the help of a magical worm called the "shamir", which was capable of cutting stone. Legends of the Jews reads:

While Solomon was occupied with the Temple, he had great difficulty in devising ways of fitting the stone from the quarry into the building, for the Torah explicitly prohibits the use of iron tools in erecting an altar. The scholars told him that Moses had used the shamir, the stone that splits rocks, to engrave the names of the tribes on the precious stones of the ephod worn by the high priest. Solomon's demons could give him no information as to where the shamir could be found. They surmised, however, that Asmodeus, king of demons, was in possession of the secret, and they told Solomon the name of the mountain on which Asmodeus dwelt, and described also his manner of life. On this mountain there was a well from which Asmodeus obtained his drinking water. He closed it up daily with a large rock, and sealed it before going to heaven, whither he went every day, to take part in the discussions in the heavenly academy. Thence he would descend again to earth in order to be present, though invisible, at the debates in the earthly houses of learning. Then, after investigating the seal on the well to ascertain if it had been tampered with, he drank of the water.

Clearly, Asmodeus, as king of the demons, was also seen as one of the keepers of heavenly wisdom. This is made apparent by the fact that he is presented as participating in intellectual debates at the "heavenly academy", and oversees those which take place at schools on Earth. This accords with the ancient interpretation of the word "demon", which literally translates as "wise one."

But as wise as Asmodeus was, Solomon managed to pull one over on him. He had the demon's drinking well filled with wine instead of water. Once he was all good and drunk, Asmodeus was easily captured, and compelled to spill the beans regarding the shamir worm. The text continues:

Asmodeus told Solomon that the shamir was given by God to the Angel of the Sea, and that Angel entrusted none with the shamir except the moor-hen, which had taken an oath to watch the shamir carefully. The moor-hen takes the shamir with her to mountains which are not inhabited by men, splits them by means of the shamir, and injects seeds, which grow and cover the naked rocks, and then they can be inhabited. Solomon sent one of his servants to seek the nest of the bird and lay a piece of glass over it. When the moor-hen came and could not reach her young, she flew away and fetched the shamir and placed it on the glass. Then the man shouted, and so terrified the bird that she dropped the shamir and flew away. By this means the man obtained possession of the coveted shamir, and bore it to Solomon. But the moor-hen was so distressed at having broken her oath to the Angel of the Sea that she committed suicide.

Taking Asmodeus captive proved to be very helpful for Solomon, not only because he led the king's men to the shamir, but also because he became, in many ways, the chief architect of the Temple, at least according to the legends provided by Ginzberg. In this version of events, King Hiram of Tyre appears to play only a minor role in the building of the Temple, and no other Hirams are mentioned at all. Instead, Asmodeus is playing the role of the architect Hiram.

Using the king of demons to build the Temple proved to be not only helpful to Solomon, but harmful as well. The spirit was too crafty for Solomon, and managed to trick him into giving up the source of his power. As Legends of the Jews states:

Although Asmodeus was captured only for the purpose of getting the shamir, Solomon nevertheless kept him after the completion of the Temple. One day the king told Asmodeus that he did not understand wherein the greatness of the demons lay, if their king could be kept in bonds by a mortal. Asmodeus replied, that if Solomon would remove his chains and lend him the magic ring, he would prove his own greatness. Solomon agreed. The demon stood before him with one wing touching heaven and the other reaching to the earth. Snatching up Solomon, who had parted with his protecting ring, he flung him four hundred parasangs away from Jerusalem, and then palmed himself off as the king.

Solomon was carried off so far away from Jerusalem that nobody recognized who he was. Separated from his ring, and all other accoutrements of power, Solomon was forced to wander about as a miserly beggar, desperately trying to convince everyone was he was the famous, wise, and wealthy King Solomon. But everyone who heard this thought he was a madman, for Solomon was thought to still be ruling with great pomp from Jerusalem. You see, Asmodeus had transformed himself into the king's likeness, and was ruling in his stead, with none being any the wiser. Meanwhile, Solomon took up residence with the king of the Ammonites (in modern Egypt), whom he served as chief cook. Solomon ended up falling in love with the king's daughter, and this turned out to be the key to regaining his throne. As Ginzberg explains:

At the end of that time, God took mercy upon him for the sake of his father David, and for the sake of the pious princess Naamah, the daughter of the Ammonite king, destined by God to be the ancestress of the Messiah. The time was approaching when she was to become the wife of Solomon and reign as queen in Jerusalem. God therefore led the royal wanderer to the capital city of Ammon. Solomon took service as an underling with the cook in the royal household, and he proved himself so proficient in the culinary art that the king of Ammon raised him to the post of chief cook. Thus he came under the notice of the king's daughter Naamah, who fell in love with her father's cook. In vain her parents endeavored to persuade her to choose a husband befitting her rank. Not even the king's threat to have her and her beloved executed availed to turn her thoughts away from Solomon. The Ammonite king had the lovers taken to a barren desert, in the hope that they would die of starvation there. Solomon and his wife wandered through the desert until they came to a city situated by the sea-shore. They purchased a fish to stave off death. When Naamah prepared the fish, she found in its belly the magic ring belonging to her husband, which he had given to Asmodeus, and which, thrown into the sea by the demon, had been swallowed by a fish. Solomon recognized his ring, put it on his finger, and in the twinkling of an eye he transported himself to Jerusalem. Asmodeus, who had been posing as King Solomon during the three years, he drove out, and himself ascended the throne again.

It seems clear that this Asmodeus figure bears many parallels and possible connections to the figure of Baphomet. For one thing, they are both demons, and both associated with wisdom, Asmodeus being responsible for overseeing the academic institutions of both Heaven and Earth. Masonic author Albert Pike referred to the Temple of Solomon as a "Temple builded by Wisdom." Asmodeus is here being credited with building that Temple, the foundation of which the Knights Templar lived on top of, and excavated underneath looking for treasure, perhaps finding there the head of Baphomet, and/or other religious artifacts. Indeed, it was this Temple which they named their organization after. Could Asmodeus have left something behind when he was building the Temple – something which the Templars later used to contact him, under the name of "Baphomet"?

In addition to being described as a skull or a head, Baphomet was also said to be a demonic creature with a goat's head, and a human body, having both male and female sexual organs. In this guise, Baphomet has been depicted (most memorably by nineteenth-century occultist Eliphas Levi) as seated upon a throne, with one arm pointing up towards the heavens, and the other down below the Earth, embodying the concept of the unity of opposites that Baphomet represents. How can we resist comparison, then, when Asmodeus strikes the exact same pose right before he assumes the likeness of Solomon? Recall what the text said:

The demon stood before him with one wing touching heaven and the other reaching to the earth. Snatching up Solomon, who had parted with his protecting ring, he flung him four hundred parasangs away from Jerusalem, and then palmed himself off as the king.

"Asmodeus" contains the root word "As", or "Az", that we also find in "Azoth", another word for the alchemical concept that Baphomet symbolizes, as well as the demon "Azazel", the name of the Scapegoat traditionally sacrificed by the Levite priests of Israel on Yom Kippur. It is furthermore the name of a demon who, according to Judeo-Christian apocryphal legends, was shackled to a mountain forever as punishment for having taught forbidden wisdom to mankind. This very myth is referenced in the story of Solomon in Legends of the Jews, where "Azazel" is split into two characters, "Azza" and "Azzael." Nevertheless, it is clear that this is a reference to the same figure. It says:

As the spirits were subservient to [Solomon], so also the animals. He had an eagle upon whose back he was transported to the desert and back again in one day, to build there the city called Tadmor in the Bible. This city must not be confounded with the later Syrian city of Palmyra, also called Tadmor. It was situated near the 'mountains of darkness,' the trysting-place of the spirits and demons. Thither the eagle would carry Solomon in the twinkling of an eye, and Solomon would drop a paper inscribed with a verse among the spirits, to ward off evil from himself. Then the eagle would reconnoitre the mountains of darkness, until he had spied out the spot in which the fallen angels 'Azza and 'Azzael lie chained with iron fetters, a spot which no one, not even a bird, may visit. When the eagle found the place, he would take Solomon under his left wing, and fly to the two angels. Through the power of the ring having the Holy Name graven upon it, which Solomon put into the eagle's mouth, 'Azza and 'Azzael were forced to reveal the heavenly mysteries to the king.

So Azazel is shown in this story to be yet another purported source of some of Solomon's wisdom. Azazel seems to equate to the figure of Asmodeus, who also is the same figure later called Azoth by the alchemists, and Baphomet by the Templars.

Chapter Eighteen: The Universal Agent

The Baphometic and alchemical concept of the balance of opposites is represented in Solomon's Temple with the two pillars that were placed outside of the entrance. As I have mentioned, these were replicas of the ones that stood outside of the Temple of Melqart on Tyre, which in turn were meant to represent the Pillars of Hercules. At Solomon's Temple they were named "Jachin", which means "He shall establish", and "Boaz", which means "It is in strength." These pillars came to be a powerful symbol for occultists and Freemasons, to whom they now represent the balance of opposites such as light and dark, male and female, etc. Jachin is often shown as white in color, and Boaz black. The two pillars are represented at the entrance of each Masonic lodge, which is always (when possible) facing East. Masonic writer Albert Pike analyzes the meaning of the names of the pillars in Morals and Dogma:

The word Jachin, in Hebrew, is יכין, It was probably pronounced Ya-kayan, and meant, as a verbal noun, He that strengthens; and thence, firm, stable, upright.

The word Boaz is בעז, Baaz. עז means Strong, Strength, Power, Might, Refuge, Source of Strength, a Fort. The ב prefixed means 'with' or 'in,' and gives the word the force of the Latin gerund, roborando - Strengthening.

The former word also means he will establish, or plant in an erect position - from the verb כון, Kūn, he stood erect. It probably meant Active and Vivifying Energy and Force; and Boaz, Stability, Permanence, in the passive sense.

Elsewhere, Pike states that Jachin and Boaz together represent "the unlimited Power and Splendour of Perfection of the Deity."

Baphomet too, according to Pike, represents "unlimited power." Pike has this to say about Baphomet in Morals and Dogma, linking the figure to the alchemical "Universal Agent" called the "Azoth" that supposedly could be used to create the Philosopher's Stone, or to turn lead into gold:

There is in nature one most potent force, by means where of a single man, who could possess himself of it, and should know how to direct it, could revolutionize and change the face of the world.

This force was known to the ancients. It is a universal agent, whose supreme law is equilibrium, and whereby, if science can but learn how to control it, it will be possible to change the order of the seasons, to produce in night the phenomena of day, to send a thought in an instant round the world, to heal or to slay at a distance, to give our words universal success, and make them reverberate everywhere.

This agent, partially revealed by the blind guesses of Mesmer, is precisely what the Adepts of the Middle Ages called the elementary matter of the great work. The Gnostics held that it composed the igneous body of the Holy Spirit; and it was adored in the secret rites of the Sabbat or the Temple, under the hieroglyphic figure of Baphomet or the hermaphroditic goat of Mendes.

So this is what Baphomet was: a "universal agent", created through the unity of opposing forces of nature, which composes a new force, powerful enough to alter physical reality, from the atomic level upward. It is the very same Philosopher's Stone of the alchemists, capable of turning dross matter into gold. The possession of the secret of this force would presumably place its possessors amongst the most powerful people in the world. It seems probable that this is the wisdom that Solomon possessed, which enabled him not only to control animals and spirits (as The Legends of the Jews suggests), but also to become fabulously wealthy. Louis Ginzberg tells us that when Solomon was granted a wish by God, he chose wisdom not because he was uninterested in money or power, but because he was already smart enough to know that "wisdom once in his possession, all else would come of itself." Solomon's wisdom led him to utilize economic principles that were little understood at the time, and not widely used. It also seems likely that he learned more specifics about managing an economy from Hiram of Tyre.

It further seems just as likely that the keys to finding and utilizing this "universal agent" were encoded into the architecture of Solomon's "temple builded by Wisdom", as Masonic legends explicitly state they were. Indeed, the practice of Freemasonry largely involves the study of sacred geometric principles believed to have been used in the building of Solomon's Temple. Masonic legend also suggests that the Freemasons possess these secrets because they were discovered by the Knights Templar while excavating beneath the Temple Mount.

Chapter Nineteen: The Plot to Rebuild the Temple

But would the Templars necessarily have known what to look for under the Temple Mount, or have understood it when they found it? They could have, if information regarding this had been passed down hereditarily from biblical times onward. This was the premise of the bestselling 1980s book Holy Blood, Holy Grail, by Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln. The book alleged that the founders of the Templars, including the famous Godfroi de Bouillon and Hughes de Payen, were descendants of a royal bloodline which traced its roots back to Jesus Christ and thus, ultimately, to King Solomon. Modern scions of this bloodline were quoted in Holy Blood, Holy Grail as claiming to know the whereabouts of the Ark of the Covenant, and numerous other biblical secrets, which were said to have been passed down from generation to generation from the Bible characters themselves.

If the Templars truly were the descendants of biblical figures, they probably also had in their veins the blood of the Levite priests. It would seem clear that, bloodline or no, the Templars saw themselves as fulfilling the role that the Levites once did. The Templars too were priests, and performed the duties of banking for the community, as the Levites did. But more importantly, they were performing the Levites' chief function of overseeing the activities of the Temple – even if it was, at the time, only the foundation of the building that remained. Also in this context, we should note the Templars' devotion to John the Baptist, who was a direct descendant of the first Levite High Priest, Aaron.

But if the Templars had Jewish genes at all, Levite genes were likely among them. Since ten tribes of Israel were destroyed by the Babylonian captivity, only three remained: those of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi (the latter of which was not counted as a "tribe" by Jehovah, because they were denied the right to own property). These then became interspersed with each other so much in Israel that they were virtually indistinguishable in many ways. So by the time of the Templars, chances were good that if you were of Jewish ancestry at all, it probably included the lines of both Judah and Levi.

In this regard, there is an interesting detail to note: the Templars were obviously highly involved in creating the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem after the capture of the city during the First Crusade – so much so that one of the Templar founders, Godfroi de Bouillon, was offered the crown of the new kingdom. He declined the title, choosing instead to call himself "Defender of the Holy Sepulcher." But he was succeeded by his brother Baudouin, who did accept the title and became King Baldwin I. Strangely, both men are reported by some authors to have converted to Judaism upon taking their titles. Perhaps it was this alleged association with Judaism and Jewish bloodlines which persuaded the Pope to grant the Templars the right to practice usury.

Albert Pike argues in Morals and Dogma that the Templars not only discovered the secrets of the Temple of Solomon, but that they actively wanted to rebuild the Temple. This, he says, was all part of their larger plot to take over the world through the power of money. He also alleges that they colluded with the Byzantine Church in this plot, because they too shared the dream of rebuilding Solomon's Temple, as part of their goal of supplanting the Roman Church. As Pike explains it:

In 1118, nine Knights Crusaders in the East, among whom were Geoffroi de Saint-Omer and Hugues de Payens, consecrated themselves to religion, and took an oath between the hands of the Patriarch of Constantinople, a See always secretly or openly hostile to that of Rome from the time of Photius. The avowed object of the Templars was to protect the Christians who came to visit the Holy Places: their secret object was the re-building of the Temple of Solomon…

This re-building, formally predicted by the Judaizing Mystics of the earlier ages, had become the secret dream of the Patriarchs of the Orient. The Temple of Solomon, re-built and consecrated to the Catholic worship would become, in effect, the Metropolis of the Universe; the East would prevail over the West, and the Patriarchs of Constantinople would possess themselves of the Papal power.

However, Pike tells us that the Templars were not exactly loyal to the Eastern Church, but more so to the Gnostic doctrines taught by John the Baptist. Pike even claims that the Templar leader Hughes de Payens was initiated into a secret Johannite church led by what were supposed to be direct linear successors of John's priesthood. In fact, Pike states that de Payens himself was made a successor of that priesthood. Pike writes:

The secret thought of Hugues de Payens, in founding his Order, was not exactly to serve the ambition of the Patriarchs of Constantinople. There existed at that period in the East a Sect of Johannite Christians, who claimed to be the only true Initiates into the real mysteries of the religion of the Saviour…

…The Johannites ascribed to Saint John the foundation of their Secret Church, and the Grand Pontiffs of the Sect assumed the title of Christos, Anointed, or Consecrated, and claimed to have succeeded one another from Saint John by an uninterrupted succession of pontifical powers. He who, at the period of the foundation of the Order of the Temple, claimed these imaginary prerogatives, was named THEOCLET; he knew HUGUES DE PAYENS, he initiated him into the Mysteries and hopes of his pretended church, he seduced him by the notions of Sovereign Priesthood and Supreme royalty, and finally designated him as his successor.

Thus, one could say that the Baphometic wisdom believed to be possessed by John the Baptist (symbolized by the image of his severed head or skull), along with the priestly prerogatives that John was entitled to as the lead descendant of the High Priest Aaron, were legitimately bestowed upon another likely descendant of Aaron, Hughes de Payens. Armed with this, the Templars may have felt that they already possessed more real power than any institution on Earth. Says Pike:

To acquire influence and wealth, then to intrigue, and at need to fight, to establish the Johannite or Gnostic and Kabalistic dogma, were the object and means proposed to the initiated Brethren. The Papacy and the rival monarchies, they said to them, are sold and bought in these days, become corrupt, and to-morrow, perhaps, will destroy each other. All that will become the heritage of the Temple: the World will soon come to us for its Sovereigns and Pontiffs. We shall constitute the equilibrium of the Universe, and be rulers over the Masters of the World…

…Their watchword was, to become wealthy, in order to buy the world.

Pike then goes on to describe how their arrogant pretensions led to the persecution and downfall of the Templar Order. But, he says, before the last Grand Master, Jacques de Molay, was consigned to the flames for heresy and witchcraft, he arranged for the work of the Templars to be carried on after his death by a new institution: Freemasonry. As he explains it:

The end of the drama is well known, and how Jacques de Molai and his fellows perished in the flames. But before his execution, the Chief of the doomed Order organized and instituted what afterward came to be called the Occult, Hermetic, or Scottish Masonry. In the gloom of his prison, the Grand Master created four Metropolitan Lodges, at Naples for the East, at Edinburg for the West, at Stockholm for the North, and at Paris for the South.

The fact that Albert Pike connects the Templars directly to the Byzantine church brings to mind an interesting possibility that I would like to present. It involved the well-known Templar standard, or battle flag, which showed their trademark red equilateral cross on a black and white chequered field.

Chapter Twenty: The Beautiful One

I have previously mentioned that the Templars picked up use of the chequer pattern from their contacts in the East, possibly from Islamic sources, but more likely from the Byzantines. Like Jachin and Boaz, this pattern represented to the Templars their Baphometic concept of the unity of opposites. They also believed, as Freemasons do today, that the floor of Solomon's Temple was covered with black-and-white-chequered tiles. All of these concepts, and that of the Baphomet itself, were symbolized by the Templar flag, which they actually had a name for. They called it "Beaussant", which means "the beautiful one."

Clearly there is a similarity between this word, "beaussant", and the root word "Byzant." Of course, "Byzantium" was not called by that name that during its time. It was only called that later on by seventeenth century scholars. The origin of the name is said to have come from the mythical (pre-Constantine) founder of the area who supposedly was named "Byzas." But this explanation is not widely accepted. Nobody really knows why it was called that. But the coins which Constantine had minted to pay for the construction of Constantinople (out of the gold looted from pagan Roman temples) were called "besants", and they continued to be the currency of the empire afterwards. The word "Byzantine" is now used as an adjective to describe any form of complex pattern, and this comes from the mosaic nature of Byzantine art. The chequer pattern is commonly used in Byzantine art. The Templars may have picked up its use when they passed through Constantinople during the First Crusade, just as they patterned the design of their monasteries after the domed architecture of Byzantium, most especially, the Hagia Sophia (the Church of the Holy Wisdom).

This lends further credence to the possibility that the words “beaussant” and “Byzant” may be related. And too, one might consider a common origin in the word “Boaz”, which Albert Pike tells us was also pronounced “Baaz.”

Later on in history, we find that many of the early Freemasons or “proto-Masons” became engaged as privateers, or “pirates”, sailing the high seas in search of plunder. They too had a battle flag that represented the Baphomet. It was a black field upon which was featured the famous Templar and Masonic symbol of the skull and crossbones. They had a cute name for it too: “the Jolly Roger.” The origin of this is mysterious, but it is possible that “Roger” refers in code to the Hebrew word for “head”, which is “rosh.”

The fact that Baphomet, or the head of John the Baptist, would be represented on these two flags brings to mind other interesting possible linguistic connections. A flag is sometimes called a “jack”, as in the “Union Jack” of Britain. Of course, “Jack” is also a popular nickname for a person named “John”, although it is sometimes an anglicized version of the French name “Jacques.” These connections stem from the common origin of all of these names in Hebrew. Also related are “James”, “Jacob”, and “Jachin.” The names “James” and “Jacob” were still considered interchangeable in Britain in the 1600s, when supporters of the Stuart kings James I and II were called “Jacobites.”

But “John”, or “Johannes”, is also related anciently to “Oannes”, the name of a Babylonian deity who was remembered for having taught divine wisdom to mankind. This name, in turn, is related to the name of the Roman deity “Janus”, who, as with some descriptions of the Baphomet head, had two faces, and was recalled by the Romans as having invented the concept of money. “Jnana” means “wisdom” in Hindi. “Sion”, a name for the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, is also the Welsh way of spelling “John.” Furthermore, we should consider the Persian word “djinn” (pronounced “jin”), which means “genius” or “demon.” Finally, it should be noted that “jack” is also a term that has been used to refer to ghosts or demons, as well as being a slang term for money. All of these concepts are linked with that of the Baphomet.

But if this is not enough to link John to the concept of Baphomet, the Masons make it explicit with their iconographic depiction of him posing in the now “Baphometic” stance, with one hand pointing up to Heaven, and the other pointing down to the Earth (see figure 22).

Chapter Twenty-One: Triskadekaphilia

Returning to the subject of the Jolly Roger, there was one more notable detail that appeared on the flag, beneath the skull and crossbones. It was the number “13”, written in Arabic numerals, with no explanation given.

The origin of this may lie with the association between the Knights Templar and the number thirteen. This association comes from the fact that their arrest and persecution by the king of France began on Friday the Thirteenth of October, in 1307. In addition, I discussed previously the fact that the Templars apparently had possession of a golden head (which may have been one of their auxiliary Baphomet heads) labeled “Caput 58 M”, with the “M” written as the astrological symbol for Virgo. I mentioned that this could be a code for 13, because the digits 5 and 8 add up to 13. Also, “M” is the thirteenth letter of not only our own alphabet, but many others, including the Hebrew. In addition, I mentioned what appears to be a Knights Templar spin-off group called the Priory of Sion, which observes the use of a thirteen-house zodiac system. In this system, Virgo may have been considered the “thirteenth house.” It is possible that this same zodiac system was used by the Knights Templar. Either way, it is evidence that the number 13 was important to the Templars, and that they associated it with the head of Baphomet. This then may be the origin of the number 13 beneath the skull and crossbones on the Jolly Roger flag.

In my previous book, The Merovingian Mythos and the Mystery of Rennes-le-Chateau, I discussed the rather voluminous evidence that the members of the Priory of Sion considered the number 13 to be important. I even demonstrated how that organization's use of a membership ranking system based on multiples of 13 contained a hidden lunar calendar, based on lunar years of 364 days. I also discussed the fact that the 52-piece modern deck of playing cards contains a hidden lunar calendar as well. This, I stated, was particularly interesting given the historical evidence indicating that the Knights Templar may have played a role in bringing playing cards to the West from Eastern sources, and also may have helped to modify them into the form in which we see them today. Incidentally, playing cards directly influenced the development of the Tarot deck, and in modern tarot decks (such as the standard one developed by Arthur Edward Waite, a Freemason), the card labeled "XIII" is "Death." Also, Masonic lodges usually meet every full moon, which means there are thirteen of these lunar meetings every year.

Other possible connections with the number 13 that may have been important to the Templars include the fact that the tribe of Levi was at one time the thirteenth tribe of Israel, but at the same time was considered a non-tribe, with special rights, special restrictions, and special duties compared to those of other tribes. As I have explained, the Levites did not have a territory of their own, but their domains were scattered about the territories of the other tribes. In a way, the activities of the Templars reflected this, in that they did not have any particular land assigned to them, but possessed a right of sovereignty which allowed them to be a law unto themselves. Like the Templars, the Levites were not allowed to own property, but lived well by taking donations from the people they served. So if the Templars were copying the Levites in some symbolic way, they may have taken on the number 13 as a symbol for that reason.

However, I think the most important connections in this regard are those between the skull and crossbones, the number 13, and alchemy. The skull and crossbones symbol, or sometimes just a picture of a skull, is called a “death’s head” in occult parlance. This symbol has been used by alchemists at least since the Middle Ages to symbolize the “nigrido”, the primary stage in the alchemical process, when the initial substance which one is attempting to transform (usually, into gold), is broken down into its original atomic components – called “prima material” (“first matter”) in alchemy. The idea is that an object or substance must be utterly destroyed and disintegrated, down to the atomic level, before it can be translated into something else. Thus, this stage of the process is identified with “death”, while the creation of the new substance is compared with “rebirth.” A good way of picturing this would be to think of the way in which people and objects are “beamed” from one place to another on the TV show Star Trek. The technology used on that show is all based upon these ancient alchemical ideas. Another prefect example is the replicator machine used on Star Trek, which essentially can make any thing or substance seemingly out of nothing, using pure energy as the “prima materia.”

Interestingly, according to some, there are exactly thirteen stages in the alchemical process. These, according to legend, are written upon the “Emerald Tablet of Hermes”, a green stone that supposedly fell from Heaven. The study of alchemy was greatly advanced in Hellenized Egypt, and that is where the myth of the Greek god Hermes’ invention of alchemy developed. Hermes would seem to be yet another figure upon whom the character of Baphomet was based. This is made obvious, if nothing else, by the fact that Hermes is often portrayed in statues and drawings pointing one hand up, and the other down. Also, Hermes was traditionally viewed as one of the satyrs, which were half-man, half-goat creatures from Greek mythology, just as Baphomet was seen as half-human and half-goat. Then consider the fact that Hermes was known for teaching alchemical wisdom to mankind, and his eternal symbol was the caduceus: a staff with two serpents entwined upon it (or sometimes one). The depiction of Baphomet by Eliphas Levi shows him with a double-serpent caduceus formed around the base of his penis. Finally, I note that Baphomet is a "hermaphrodite", both male and female, a word that comes from the name Hermes, and that of the Greek goddess Aphrodite. Mark Amaru Pinkham writes in Guardians of the Holy Grail: The Knights Templar, John the Baptist, and the Water of Life, that:

…13 was also very important for the alchemical process because it denoted the number of stages in the alchemical process leading to death and rebirth. Legend has it that these 13 stages were inscribed by the sage Thoth-Hermes as 13 precepts on a tablet called the Emerald Tablet that was made of solid emerald; thus, the stages leading to the creation of the Philosopher's Stone were themselves inscribed on a version of the Philosopher's Stone. These 13 precepts became the foundation of Egyptian alchemy, and they were later inculcated within the Islamic Universities of Constantinople and Seville…

Of course, other sources say that there are ten, or sometimes seven, stages of alchemy denoted by the Emerald Tablet, but who's counting? Pinkham also makes the following observations:

Three very important 'alchemical' numbers eventually occurred to the alchemists from observing the cycles of Venus. The first number was eight, which is the number of [Earth] years it takes for Venus' cycle to elapse; the second number was five, the number of times the planet becomes the Morning and Evening Stars during the cycle; and the third was thirteen, the number of times Venus revolved around the sun during the span of eight years. Of these numbers, the Arabic number 8 was adopted by alchemists as their definitive symbol for polarity union and the infinite state of immortality in engenders. The number 8 symbolized polarity union as two united circles, and also revealed that alchemy was the union of two circular 'worlds', Heaven and Earth. The number and symbol 8 became so important to the early alchemists that they made it the sacred number of their eternal patron, the Egyptian Thoth-Hermes.

Thus the "58" in "Caput 58M" could be a reference to all three of these numbers: 5, 8, and 13, and thus, the heavenly cycles of Venus. It is also noteworthy that the Templars are specifically remembered not for being arrested on "October the thirteenth" so much as on "Friday the thirteenth." Friday was named after "Freya", the Norse name for Venus.

Furthermore, 5, 8, and 13 are among the first numbers found in the "Fibonacci sequence." This is a sequence of numbers which represents the growth pattern of all living things in nature: of the embryo as it becomes a fetus, then a baby, then a child, then an adult, or of a seed that becomes a seedling, then a plant, etc.. This growth pattern contains the Fibonacci sequence of 2, 3, 5, 8, and 13. The Fibonacci sequence defines itself geometrically in things like the "golden spiral", the "golden mean proportion", and the pentagram (see figures 25 and 26). These are shapes found everywhere in nature, as they are visual representations of the mathematical sequences at work in creation. Long ago, ancient astronomers noticed the the movements of Venus contain Fibonacci numbers and golden mean geometry, yet more reasons why they held the goddess Venus to be sacred. No wonder, then, that the Fibonacci sequence is important both to the studies of sacred geometry and of alchemy.

You could even say that the Fibonacci sequence is what mathematically unifies the study of alchemy and the study of sacred geometry. Golden mean geometry and Fibonacci numbers were used in the building of the pyramids, and, it is rumored, Solomon's Temple. Undoubtedly they could be found in the Hagia Sophia as well. Later on from about the year 1100, medieval stonemasons hired by the Knights Templar used the same principles, utilized in a different way, to create the magnificent the Gothic cathedrals of Europe. Because they are made from the numbers and geometry of nature, these buildings symbolically acted as living organisms, a theme emphasized ever more so by the common use of floral, agricultural, and other plant motifs for decoration.

But the number 13 plays some specific roles in the geometry of nature that are very interesting. One is that there are thirteen geometric solids in the third dimension, as classified by the Greek philosopher and mathematician, Archimedes. The other is that thirteen spheres, when placed together, make the most tightly compact arrangement of spheres mathematically allowable. When arranged this way, they form a three-dimensional representation of a hexagon. This brings to mind the thirteen stars arranged in the form of a larger, six-pointed star, which we find above the head of the eagle on the front side of the Great Seal of the United States. In each of these arrangements, the thirteenth piece is the hidden element which unifies and perfects the whole – like the Philosopher's Stone of the alchemists. This is the same symbolism found on the reverse of the Great Seal, signified by the All-Seeing Eye which completes the pyramid. In his book A Beginner's Guide to Constructing the Universe: The Mathematical Archetypes of Nature, Art and Science, Michael S. Schneider illustrates how hexagonal geometry can be applied to the entire front side of the Great Seal (see figure 30). Furthermore, the hexagram is implied on the reverse of the Seal as well, formed when you connect the All-Seeing Eye with the letters "M", "A", "S", "O", and "N", to spell "mason."

This brings me to another interesting observation that Michael Schneider made in his book regarding the number 13:

Twelve is related to thirteen, the notorious but misunderstood number of superstition. While twelve is a solar number, thirteen is lunar, as the twelve months of a solar year contain nearly thirteen lunations. The relationship is more obvious when we look geometrically. Each of the methods for constructing a dodecagon results in twelve equally spaced points around a thirteenth one at the center. Twelve points occur at the crossings of a hexagram star around the thirteenth at their center…

Less well-known is the existence of a twelve-around-one pattern in the government of the United States, the founders of which were Freemasons. Seeking to establish a utopian society in the ancient tradition, they gave the government a classic twelvefold structure-function-order. In every way possible they incorporated zodiacal symbolism. George Washington kept a circle of twelve generals around him to fight for the thirteen colonies. The symbolism of thirteen stars and thirteen stripes on their flag, thirteen letters in their motto, 'E Pluribus Unum' ('From many, one'), and thirteen buttons on the sailor's uniform accented their intent. The number of colonies was not accidental but a hidden reference to an ancient teaching.

To this I would add that the flag of the Confederate States of America (which had many Freemasons, including Albert Pike, heading its cause) bore thirteen stars as well. This is because there were really thirteen secessionist states in the Confederacy, even though history books often cite only 11. (The states of Kentucky and Missouri each had mini-civil wars within themselves, with each having both a Unionist government, and a break-away Confederate government.) At any rate, it seems that, even if the number 13 is not an especially "Masonic" number per se, it was a sacred number, the associations of which the Masonic founders of the United States were certainly familiar with. Could this be the meaning of the use of 13 by the USA's founders: that it signifies both the unifying principle, and the principle of creation, that is at once the Philosopher's Stone of the alchemists, and the Templar concept of Baphomet?

When placed on the US one-dollar-bill, this representation of the Baphomet, made by the repeated use of the number thirteen, takes on a greater significance pertaining to alchemical nature of fiat currency. Baphomet was, to the Templars, the key to applied alchemy – both economic alchemy, and other forms as well. The Templars passed on the secrets of alchemy to the Freemasons, who utilized them in the creation of the U.S. monetary system.

It is not only on the present one-dollar-bill that the number 13 has been used. On the early forty-dollar note (designed by Freemason Francis Hopkinson, who also designed the American flag, and the final version of the Great Seal of the United States), there was an explicitly Masonic symbol: a blazing altar out of which shot thirteen rays, burning underneath the All-Seeing Eye. On the first fifty-dollar bill, which Hopkinson also designed, there was the unfinished pyramid of thirteen layers, much like on the Great Seal, but it was more of a Sumerian-style ziggurat, or stepped pyramid, rather than a smooth-sided Egyptian-style pyramid, and there was no All-Seeing Eye. I also mentioned previously that the first pennies issued by the United States featured thirteen circles linked in a chain, along with the words “We are one.” Coins minted by individual states included the symbolic number as well. Copper coins minted in Vermont in 1785 featured the All-Seeing Eye with twenty-six rays shooting out (thirteen long, and thirteen short), interspersed with thirteen stars. In 1787, copper coins made in New York and New Jersey featured the eagle, the motto E Pluribus Unum, and thirteen stars surrounding his head.

Incidentally, the use of the number 13 can be found not just on money itself, but throughout the very structure of the U.S. monetary system. For instance, there is the fact that there are exactly six types of coins, and seven denominations of paper money, currently in circulation in the U.S. 6 added to 7 equals 13. Then there is the fact that the Treasury Department was created in 1789, exactly thirteen years after the birth of the USA in 1776. They even made a point of putting the date 1789 on the Treasury Department Seal in 1966, almost 190 years after the fact. The Treasury Seal, by the way, as I mentioned before, contains thirteen stars in its chevron.

The Federal Reserve has adopted the conspicuous use of the number 13 as well. The Fed was created in 1913. It consists of one Board of Governors overseeing twelve Federal Reserve Districts, and one central bank controlling twelve district banks, which in turn then control all of the member banks. The Federal Open Market Committee consists of twelve voting members: the seven members of the Board of Governors and five of the twelve Federal Reserve Bank presidents. Even the digits of the zip code for the Fed's headquarters in Washington, D.C. – 20551 - add up to 13.

One final piece of evidence brings the number 13, the US dollar, and alchemy together. To understand it, we must first look at how the number "13" can itself be a glyph representing the Hermetic caduceus, and the concepts behind alchemy. Just visually, you can see that "13" resembles a single-serpent caduceus broken down into its component parts: the "1" is the pole, and the "3" is the twisting serpent. In its original Arabic form, the three looked even more serpentine. The two glyphs, when put together, bring to mind the idea of a pole with an electric current running through it – an appropriate symbol, perhaps, of the constant flow of energy involved in alchemical processes. Or it could be thought of as an alchemical marriage of the passive, masculine "1" and the active, feminine "3." It could also be thought of as representing the ancient three-in-one Trinity concept of God, the ultimate "E Pluribus Unum." The Templars most definitely were aware of Arabic numbers, so no doubt they were using "13" to express the idea of "thirteen" long before most others in Europe ever did.

However, everything that I just said about the symbol "13" in the above paragraph could also be said about the "$" dollar symbol. Taken in this context, they would both signify exactly the same thing. In an earlier chapter I discussed the fact that the dollar sign was thought to have derived from the design used on Spanish silver dollars circulated in the American colonies, which featured the Pillars of Hercules wrapped in banners that said "Plus Ultra." But an earlier prototype of this design comes from coins made on the Phoenician island of Tyre, which feature both the Pillars of Hercules, and a serpent coiled around a tree, ala the Tree of Knowledge in the Garden of Eden. Look at the illustration (see figure 12). There is no doubt in my mind that the design of this coin is the ultimate origin of both the design on the Spanish silver dollar, and the modern "$" symbol. Ignatius Donnelly agreed, writing of this ancient Phoenician coin that:

... we have the Pillars of Hercules, supposed to have been placed at the mouth of the Mediterranean, and the tree of life or knowledge, with the serpent twined around it, which appears in Genesis; and in the combination of the two pillars and the serpent we have, it is said, the original source of our dollar mark.

The Tyrians provided much of the coinage used in ancient Israel, so these coins may very well have been in Solomon's treasury, and may have been discovered by the Templars as well. Of course, the Templars could have found these coins when they occupied Tyre during the Crusades. Indeed, it was one of the most important cities in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, ruled over by the Templar Godfroi de Bouillon. Tyre was also was the site of some of the earliest Italian trading colonies, and thus was at the center of the rise of European mercantilism after the fall of the Templars. Tyre was a hub of global trade for literally thousands of years, and played a pivotal role in many of the most important economic developments throughout history. How fitting, then, that this Tyrian coin apparently became the inspiration for the symbol of the American dollar, which would do more to transform the global economy than perhaps any other currency the world has ever known.

PART IV

Chapter Twenty-Two: Spiritual Pyramid Schemes

So what exactly are the wise principles that have been passed down through the ages about how to create and grow wealth, or how to run an economy? Many of these principles are expressed in the Bible. The centerpiece of these teachings is the aforementioned concept of tithing. This idea is linked to a basic principle that has been around since ancient times - a principle dictating how blessings, either material or spiritual, can be multiplied by using an apparently effective although seemingly inexplicable spiritual law. This law states that a sacrifice made freely to any particular cause will be rewarded by God many times over. When applied to a priesthood, this means that the members of the congregation are rewarded for the tithes they give to the priests. The priests in turn give a portion of these tithes to the service of the god(s) they worship, and they in turn are rewarded for that, mostly with more tithes. They also give a portion of the tithes they receive to the service of the community, and are rewarded for that by God as well.

This principle purportedly works not only for financial donations, but for any gift or service contributed freely to a cause. Thus, priests are also rewarded for the spiritual services performed for their gods, such as prayers and rituals. It is a system in which any form of energy (of which money is certainly an example) can be fed into the system and multiplied exponentially. You could describe it as a spiritual pyramid scheme in which energy is channeled from the congregation to the priesthood, then from the priesthood to the god(s) in the spiritual realm, where it is multiplied, and then channeled back to the priests and the congregation. The rate of increase is often said to be times ten. Indeed, the word “tithe” means “tenth”, since traditionally members of the congregation give a tenth of their annual income, expecting a ten-fold return, thereby creating a plenteous reserve for more tithes. Moreover, the priesthood traditionally uses a portion of the tithes for charity and community outreach, and thereby the priesthood itself earns a ten times increase of stored-up karmic rewards. So although the priests themselves may have taken a vow of poverty, the organization they serve can expand infinitely in wealth and power.

Thus we have the “Poor Knights of Christ of the Temple of Solomon”, or the Knights Templar, who likewise took a vow of poverty, with the knights being required to give all of their property to the Order upon admittance. The Templars’ poverty was symbolized by the icon of two knights riding on one horse, which they often used, implying that they doubled up on horseback to save the Order on its budget. (In fact, they had more than enough horses for whatever they needed. Each knight had at least one horse when he showed up to join.) The Order took the wealth donated to them by their members and patrons, then used it in various ways to multiply their wealth and power. They loaned money to kings and nobles throughout Europe, and thus not only earned interest, but gained influence over the very powerful figures who were indebted to them. The Templars also built magnificent castles and cathedrals throughout Europe, opened hospitals, and performed charitable work, spreading scientific and philosophical enlightenment throughout the lands they traveled. These charitable acts earned exponential rewards for the organization from their patron deity, according to the tithing principle previously discussed.

The Catholic Church has used the tithes and spiritual energy of its followers to create a force that even today is the most powerful organization in the world, and once commanded an entire European empire. Like the Levites, Catholic priests take a vow of poverty, but the organization they serve is anything but poor. The Catholic Church's charitable activities remain unmatched, which undoubtedly earns them a great ongoing financial reward from God. This may be how the Church has been able to create one of the most successful spiritual pyramid schemes in history. The Church laity pays with their love, worship, and money. In exchange they receive, at least once a week, a spiritual boon in the form of bread and wine - the blood and body of the deity - as well as the prayers of the priest, and the relief from the burden of sin after Confession. This temporary boon must renewed again the following Sunday, for the same price. The laity's gifts are then channeled directly back to Vatican headquarters, and the spiritual gifts are ultimately given to the deity who heads that organization. The financial gifts support the organization first, its activities second, and thirdly its active servants, the priesthood.

Chapter Twenty-Three: The Law of the Harvest

The Protestant Reformation did not end the practice of tithing for the breakaway Christian churches, or for the newly-formed churches which came afterwards. The Judeo-Christian tradition of tithing, as well as Christ's teachings on how God rewards charity (that "as ye sow, so shall ye reap"), have been the inspiration for a belief system called "the Law of the Harvest" that is now touted by many modern Christian churches. Basically it states the ideas which I have already reviewed: that the more you give to your church, the more God will reward you, financially and otherwise. Deuteronomy 8:18 states: "…thou shalt remember the Lord thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth." Thus many churches solicit donations from their members by calling these gifts "seed money", from which not only the church, but also the giver's own bank account, will purportedly grow. Sometimes, in exchange for these donations, churches take "prayer requests", promising to pray specific prayers on behalf of the givers, which God, it is promised, will answer as a reward for their donation.

One of the churches which has used this concept most effectively, although perhaps most ruthlessly, is one that is arguably fictitious: St. Matthew's Church, started by Reverend James Eugene Ewing. It operates out of a post office box in Tulsa, Oklahoma, even though Ewing, who is apparently the church's only minister, lives in California. Ewing has built over many years a hugely successful bulk mail operation. He sends out booklets to strangers targeted as living in low-income neighborhoods. The booklets are thick (almost 200 pages), artfully written, and lavishly illustrated, obviously constituting a considerable investment on the church's behalf.

The booklets explain how God's Law of the Harvest can be used to solve all of the ills in your life, and encourage the reader to join the St. Matthew's Church "Seeds of Success Gold Book Harvest Bible Plan." In exchange for regular gifts (seeds sown) to his ministry, Ewing will honor your prayer requests, and arrange the deals with God that you apparently have not been able to arrange for yourself. You will receive a "Harvest Book of Seeds", which Ewing describes as an "unusual book" that you must keep next to "your important papers such as your electric, gas and water bills", and that you should "not fail to use it by sowing seeds to God towards your harvests out of each check." This book consists of coupons on which you write your prayer requests each time you "sow a seed" by giving Ewing a donation. Ewing also provides his church members with a magical "prayer rug" made of paper, and a "prayer coin" that is "a replica of those used in Bible days, featuring the head of Caesar." One might think that the purpose of this magical talisman is to remind you to "give unto Ewing that which is Ewing's", but he writes that its purpose is to "remind you that you have a financial partner, and that his name is Jehovah God!"

Ewing is understandably hated by such organizations as the Better Business Bureau, which only wishes that it had some legal basis for shutting his operation down. Although he references in his literature the "outreach work" that his church purportedly does, there is in fact no physical building that is St. Matthew's Church, only a post office box. The only official activity that the proceeds of his church are spent on is the printing and distributing of more literature about the "Harvest Plan." Ewing seems to have no shame, including in his booklet a prayer request form that you can fill out if you need a new automobile, complete with check boxes for the various brand options, ranging from Subaru to Rolls Royce. Despite his audacity, or perhaps because of it, Ewing's church has now earned tens of millions of dollars beyond its operating costs. Ewing is clearly a magus of the highest order, and seems to understand, in a very occult sense, the spiritual laws of financial success. His twelve-point outline of the Law of the Harvest is worth reviewing:

1. Your seed must be planted.

2. You must give your seed away to receive something.

3. You must plant what you expect to harvest.

4. Your harvest size is established when your seed is sown.

5. Your seed must be planted in good ground.

6. You must always wait a period of time between planting and harvesting.

7. You must maintain your crops for a proper harvest.

8. You must always sow to your harvest size, not from your harvest size.

9. Your expense is always highest at harvest time.

10. A part of your harvest is for sowing again.

11. A part of your harvest is for you to keep.

12. Your harvest is a miracle.

The essential Law of the Harvest has been, as I have explained, at the heart of religious traditions since ancient times. It has long been traditional for participants in a religious ritual to give a donation upon entering the church or ritual chamber. These donations not only serve to support the church or cult financially, but also serve as a reserve of spiritual energy donated by the participants to power the ritual. This concept is alluded to in the alchemical treatise The Chymical Wedding of Christian Rosenkreutz. In this story, the title character is invited to a royal wedding that is also an alchemical ritual. Before entering the castle in which the ceremony is held, he must purchase, and then surrender to the gatekeeper, a special gold coin that represents his donation to the household - the wedding gift. A plaque over the entrance to the castle reads “Date et dabitur vobis” - “Give and it will be given unto you.”

Chapter Twenty-Four: Alchemical Miracles

The principle of the exponential increase of money, or indeed of any form of energy, is similar to the idea of alchemy: of turning lead into gold, or changing the Prima Materia into the Philosopher's Stone. It means transforming the base into the lofty, by transforming energy from a lower form into a higher form. The alchemical stone can purportedly be made from any substance, even the most base, and then from it can be created anything which the heart desires, in inexhaustible abundance. This Philosopher's Stone is said to be so rare and valuable that one can use it to purchase anything in Heaven and Earth, even eternal life. As Christ taught, according to Matthew 13:45-46:

... the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it.

This symbolism links up with that of the Holy Grail in the Grail romances. Alternately described as either a cup or as a stone, the Grail is said to give abundantly whatever one wishes to receive. This it is able to do because, according to Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzival, every year on Good Friday:

... one can infallibly see a Dove wing its way down from Heaven. It brings a small white Wafer to the Stone and leaves it there. The Dove, all dazzling and white, then flies up to Heaven again. Every Good Friday, as I say, the Dove brings it to the Stone, from which the Stone receives all that is good on earth of food and drink, a paradisal excellence - I mean whatever the earth yields.

Here we have an example of an alchemical transformation of quantity (high volume from a small volume), rather than quality (lead into gold). This is based on an alchemical principle well-explained by Albert Pike in Morals and Dogma:

…to make gold, we must first have gold. Nothing is made out of nothing; we do not absolutely create wealth; we increase and multiply it.

Someone who evidently mastered the art of creating very much from very little, as well as transmuting the base into the high, was Jesus Christ. He demonstrated this aptitude in several of his miracles, including that of the loaves and the fishes (in which a single serving of food was multiplied by thousands), and when he transformed water into wine at the wedding at Cana. He also returned to the concept repeatedly in his parables. In Matthew 25:14-30, Jesus explained the importance of investing one's money (or in a larger sense, one's energy) into something fruitful, in order to multiply it, rather than keeping it saved up, stagnate, unable to increase. He told his disciples the following parable. (Note: the word "talents" used here refers to a standard measure used to weigh precious metals, and thus it is here used as a monetary term):

For the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.

Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two. But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.

After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them. And so he that had received five talents came and brought the other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: behold, I have gained beside them five talents more. His lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord. He also that had received two talents came and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: behold, I have gained two other talents beside them. His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed: And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed: Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.

It seems strange that the Catholic Church would discourage usury, when here Jesus is explicitly encouraging it. He explains how loaning one's money upon usury creates an exponential increase in wealth, and that it is not only righteous to do so, but slothful and wasteful not to.

In another biblical passage, Mark 4:30 - 4:32, Jesus used the imagery of a seed growing into a plant to demonstrate how something small can be multiplied into something great:

And he said, Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what comparison shall we compare it? It is like a grain of mustard seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth: But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches; so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it.

In Luke 17:6, Jesus turned the mustard seed parable into a statement on the power that faith (spiritual energy) can have, even in a small amount:

And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye might say unto this sycamine tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you.

Later, in Luke 21 1-4, Jesus explains how the worth (in spiritual value) of one's tithes is relative to the amount of wealth that one already possesses - in other words, that those who have much should give much. The text states:

And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all: For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had.

Chapter Twenty-Five: A Commerce of Souls

In many ways, Judeo-Christianity is rife with financial metaphors. The entire religious system is about debt and payment. Adam created a deficit by sinning in the Garden of Eden, for which his descendants, the whole of humanity, must pay eternally in hellfire. Jesus purportedly paid off this debt by sacrificing his life, and Christians believe that we can all basically use the payment Christ made as a voucher to compensate for the debt we owe to God. This imagery of debt and payment in the sacrifice of Christ is enhanced by the fact that Christ's betrayer, Judas (who was the official treasurer of Christ's ministry) sold him to his murderers for thirty pieces of silver.

However, at least in traditional Catholicism, one cannot simply rely on the sacrifice of Jesus as a blanket payment for all sin. The way they see it is as a sort of "matching funds" system. If a person sins, they have to confess their sins to a priest, which is like submitting your debts to God for payment. By making your confession "in the name of Jesus Christ", you are calling into account the payment which Christ has already made to alleviate your debt. But the bit that Christ chips in is not the full payment, for the confessor must also perform certain acts in order to earn absolution: "Hail Mary's", and the like.

In addition, the Catholic concept of Purgatory is linked to their idea of the "Treasury of Merit." In this view, there is a giant ledger in Heaven, kept by God, which keeps track of all of the liabilities created by the sins of Man. On the other side of the ledger are the assets earned by the good deeds of Man. At the top of this list is Christ's sacrifice, the largest deposit ever made into the Treasury of Merit. The Catholic Encyclopedia explains the concept of the Treasury as:

… the infinite riches obtained by the true merit of Christ's work on the cross. God freely grants us the privilege of contributing our own works to this Treasury. Catholics believe that the Holy Virgin Mary is the most important contributor next to Christ to the Treasury of Merit ... This treasury is left to the keeping, not of the individual Christian, but of the Church. Consequently, to make it available for the faithful, there is required an exercise of authority, which alone can determine in what way, on what terms, and to what extent, indulgences may be granted.

The Encyclopedia also defines the term "indulgence":

The word indulgence … originally meant kindness or favor; in post-classic Latin it came to mean the remission of a tax or debt. In Roman law and in the Vulgate of the Old Testament … it was used to express release from captivity or punishment. In theological language also the word is sometimes employed in its primary sense to signify the kindness and mercy of God. But in the special sense in which it is here considered, an indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishment due to sin, the guilt of which has been forgiven.

One of the most controversial practices that the Catholic Church ever engaged in was the sale of indulgences. They actually put the remission of sins on sale for specific prices, for which the buyer would receive a certificate stating that his sins had been absolved. But more than that, a person could even post bail for his deceased relatives and spring them out of Purgatory - that uniquely Catholic concept borrowed straight from the works of Dante Alighieri, where a person who died with a sin deficit (but who has not been condemned to eternal Hell) must pay penance in this “in-between zone” before entering Heaven. This became a very salable product with the congregation, and to push sales, the Church even came up with a catchy little jingle which went like this:

As soon as the coin in the coffer rings,
The soul from Purgatory springs.

It was this activity in particular which led Martin Luther to revolt against the Church and sparked what would eventually become the Protestant Reformation.

Chapter Twenty-Six: A Mason's Wages

Like the Levite priesthood, the Catholic Church, and the Knights Templar, Freemasonry is yet another spiritual pyramid scheme. While the members do not take a vow of poverty, they do pay very high dues to the organization, and the Order in turn uses part of this money to perform charitable works within the community. The idea of a vow of poverty is still symbolized, however, by the fact that Masonic initiates must present themselves divested of metal objects, especially coins, and barefoot, with their clothes disheveled. The emphasis in Freemasonry is not so much on the member's financial donations as it is on the member's contributions in the form of work. The primary symbolism used in their ritual is that of building, of putting one's skill and effort to work creating good things for God, Masonry, and the community. The members are then supposed to be rewarded for their work karmicly by the universe. Freemason Albert Pike wrote in Morals and Dogma that:

God is inexhaustible in his charity, as he is inexhaustible in his essence. That Infinite Omnipotence and Infinite Charity, which, by an admirable good-will, draws from the bosom of its immense love the favors which it incessantly bestows on the world and on humanity, teaches us that the more we give, the more we possess.

The reward that a Mason receives from God for his good works is referred to symbolically in Masonic ritual as "a Mason's wages." One Masonic ritual involves the initiate being paid his wages for working as a mason on the building of Solomon's Temple. Specifically they are paid the same wages –oil, wine, and corn (specifically the old use of the term "corn", which referred to wheat before the discovery of maize, now called "corn", in America). These are the same wages which Solomon paid the Masons sent by Hiram of Tyre to help with the Temple, according to the Bible.

Charity towards other Masons is emphasized in Masonic rituals, and thus it is rightly believed that a mason will always favor another Mason in business if given the choice. This brotherly exchange of services between the members obviously gains each Mason, as well as the organization as a whole, a great deal of money and influence. That is why the Freemasons at one time had a considerable presence at the top of every Western government.

Albert Pike went on at length in Morals and Dogma about the Masonic idea of "earning wages", and the Masonic attitude towards business in general. Pike warned against attempting to reap too much profit from any business deal, and against using any deceitful means in business, even if such means are lawful. Any work which brings you gain to another man's detriment is, in Pike's view, only earning you a spiritual deficit which you will eventually have to pay for one way or another. He writes:

In intercourse with others, do not do all which thou mayest lawfully do; but keep something within thy power; and, because there is a latitude of gain in buying and selling, take not thou the utmost penny that is lawful, or which thou thinkest so; for although it may be lawful, yet it is not safe; and he who gains all that he can gain lawfully, this year, will probably be tempted, next year, to gain something unlawfully.

Let no man, for his own poverty, become more oppressing and cruel in his bargain; but quietly, modestly, diligently, and patiently recommend his estate to God, and follow his interest, and leave the success to Him.

Mr. Pike admonished Masons not to nitpick or negotiate overmuch about paying an employees wages, and told them never to break a promise, or contract, even if making that agreement turns out to have been a mistake. He also warns against making a promise you cannot keep, and against making private use of public property. He says:

Detail not the wages of the hireling; for every degree of detention of it beyond the time, is injustice and uncharitableness, and grinds his face till tears and blood come out; but pay him exactly according to covenant, or according to his needs.

Religiously keep all promises and covenants, though made to your disadvantage, though afterward you perceive you might have done better; and let not any precedent act of yours be altered by any after-accident…

Let no man take wages or fees for a work that he cannot do, or cannot with probability undertake; or in some sense profitably, and with ease, or with advantage manage. Let no man appropriate to his own use, what God, by a special mercy, or the Republic, hath made common; for that is against both Justice and Charity.

That any man should be the worse for us, and for our direct act, and by our intention, is against the rule of equity, of justice, and of charity. We then do not that to others, which we would have done to ourselves; for we grow richer upon the ruins of their fortune…

Pike is quite open here about his view that we will all be called into account for our spiritual deficit after death, and thus, it is better to store up treasures in Heaven rather than here on Earth. As he tells it:

It should be the earnest desire of every Perfect Master so to live and deal and act, that when it comes to him to die, he may be able to say, and his conscience to adjudge, that no man on earth is poorer, because he is richer; that what he hath he has honestly earned, and no man can go before God, and claim that by the rules of equity administered in His great chancery, this house in which we die, this land we devise to our heirs, this money that encircles those who survive to bear our name, is his and not ours, and we in that forum are only his trustees. For it is most certain that God is just, and will sternly enforce every such trust; and that to all whom we despoil, to all whom we defraud, to all from whom we take or win anything whatever, without fair consideration and equivalent, He will decree a full and adequate compensation.

Be careful, then, that thou receive no wages, here or elsewhere, that are not thy due! For if thou dost, thou wrongst some one, by taking that which in God's chancery belongs to him; and whether that which thou takest thus be wealth, or rank, or influence, or reputation or affection, thou wilt surely be held to make full satisfaction."

The wages earned by the work of a Freemason, then, are ultimately spiritual in nature, and can only benefit the Mason who receives them fairly.

Chapter Twenty-Seven: The Mark of a Master Mason

The ceremony that goes along with the Masonic York Rite degree of "Mark Master" contains the most interesting details regarding the Masonic concept of "wages." In this ritual, the candidate is taught how to present his "mark" at the "warden's wicket" as proof of his worthiness to receive his wages. The "mark" is a personalized insignia, usually formed from the Mason's initials, which each candidate chooses for himself upon entering this degree. It must be unique to him, and he cannot alter it from that point on. The "warden's wicket" is a sort of bursar's window, through which the Mason to be paid thrusts his right hand, "with the thumb and first two fingers open, and the third and little fingers clenched, palm up", to quote Duncan's Ritual of Freemasonry, by Malcolm C. Duncan. With his clenched fingers he holds against his palm a small piece of paper on which is written his mark, face upward.

This serves as a secret code, a password, and only if the Mason presents his hand through the wicket in this way does the warden know that this man is truly a Mason, who has been "working in the Temple" and is thus deserving of a "wage." If the Mason presents his hand for payment without the mark, or without the secret hand signal, he is trying to commit fraud, the penalty for which is to have your hand cut off! At least, this is what the Mark Master candidate is told in the ritual when he first goes to the warden's wicket to receive payment, without having been told about the mark or how to present his hand.

After being threatened with amputation for doing it incorrectly, the candidate is scolded for his ignorance and told to choose a mark for himself. Once he does, the Senior Deacon comes towards him with a mallet and a chisel, purporting to engrave the mark onto the candidate's hand so that he will "carry it to the grave." Of course, in the end the mark is just written on a piece of paper and pressed against the palm of the hand. These sorts of empty threats of physical violence are as common to Masonic rituals are they are to college fraternity hazings.

When the initiate takes his oath for the degree, he is told to make a very peculiar promise. He says:

I promise and swear, that I will obey all regular signs and summonses given, handed, sent, or thrown to me from the hand of a brother Mark Master Mason, or from the body of a just and legally constituted Lodge of such, provided it be within the length of my cable-tow. Furthermore do I promise and swear, that I will not wrong this Lodge, or a brother of this Degree, to the value of his wages (or one penny), myself, knowingly, nor suffer it to be done by others, if in my power to prevent it. Furthermore do I promise and swear, that I will not sell, swap, barter, or exchange my mark, which I shall hereafter choose, after it has been recorded in the book of marks, for any other one, unless it be a dead mark, or one of an older date, nor will I pledge it a second time until it is lawfully redeemed from the first pledge. Furthermore do I promise and swear, that I will receive a brother's mark when offered to me requesting a favor, and grant him his request if in my power; and if it is not in my power to grant his request, I will return him his mark with the value thereof, which is half a shekel of silver, or quarter of a dollar.

In other words, the initiate is promising to loan his fellow brethren money, or assist him in any other way possible, when a brother specifically comes asking for help by presenting his mark. It is the Mason's duty to grant these requests if at all possible, but if it is not, he must return the mark to the other Mason, "along with the value thereof", which is "half a shekel of silver, or a quarter of a dollar." I suppose this means that if you cannot give the man exactly what he wants, you have to at least give him something. But the specific value of a mark as being half a shekel indicates that you are being charged a penalty for failing to meet your brother's needs.

If you are able to give him what he wants, then you are to retain his mark until such time as he is able to pay you back the amount loaned, or in some way return the favor. Some versions of the Mark Master oath even contain a stipulation in which the initiate swears not to grant that brother another favor until he has redeemed this mark. This means that each mason can only ask for one favor from one brother at a time, thus preventing abuse of the system. Of course, the new initiate learns that he too may use his mark to request a favor at any time in the future.

However, scarcely has the new Mark Master taken his oath when he is immediately presented with a mark and a request for 25 dollars from one of his brothers. This is all still part of the ritual. Having been divested of all cash, coins, and other "metal objects" before the rite, as is the tradition, the initiate has no money to give, and is prompted to say so, giving the presented mark back to the requesting brother, but with no form of compensation to go along with it. For this, he is severely chastised by the Right Worshipful Master, who says:

How is this? Do you return it without the price, and thus break your oath before you rise from the altar? Have you not sworn, that where you could not grant a brother's request you would return his mark, with the price thereof, viz.: half a Jewish shekel of silver, or the fourth of a dollar? …

Look further. Perhaps some good friend has, in pity to your destitute situation, supplied you with that amount, unknown to yourself: feel in all your pockets, and if you find, after a thorough search, that you have really none, we shall have less reason to think that you meant willfully to violate your obligation.

When the initiate searches his clothing, he indeed finds a quarter dollar coin there which one of the other brothers had placed there surreptitiously sometime during the rite. He then hands it over to the brother who has just presented him with a mark and a request. Upon doing this, he is given yet another lecture by the Right Worshipful Master:

Brother, let this scene be a striking lesson to you: should you ever hereafter have a mark presented you by a worthy brother, asking a favor, before you deny him make diligent search, and be quite sure of your inability to serve him; perhaps you will then find, as in the present instance, that some unknown person has befriended you, and you are really in a better situation than you thought yourself.

Later on in the same ritual, yet another lesson regarding Masonic wages is taught. The brothers in the room all pretend that they are workers in the building of Solomon's Temple again, and now it is "the sixth hour of the sixth day of the week." It is time to receive their pay for the week. But when they are each given a payment of one penny, the brethren erupt (as scripted) into vocal discontent, complaining that the new initiate is getting paid just as much as they, even though they have worked all week, and he has only just shown up. The Right Worshipful Master quiets the discontent by reiterating one of Jesus' parables, from The Gospel of Matthew, 20:1-16, which reads:

For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which went out early in the morning, to hire laborers into his vineyard. And when he had agreed with the laborers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard. And he went out about the third hour, and saw others standing idle in the market-place, and said unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, I will give you. And they went their way. And he again went out, about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise; and about the eleventh hour, he went out and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive. So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward. Call the laborers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first. And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny. But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more; and they likewise received every man a penny. And when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house, saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day. But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst thou not agree with me for a penny? Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good? So the last shall be first, and the first last; for many are called, but few chosen.

So the Mason is taught to accept his own proper wages rather then envying those of another. Finally, at the end of the ritual, the initiate is quizzed on certain "facts" regarding the Mark Master's degree. The quiz goes like this:

Q. By whom was this degree founded?

A. Our three Grand Masters - Solomon King of Israel, Hiram King of Tyre, and Hiram Abiff.

Q. For what purpose was it founded?

A. To be conferred upon all those who should be found worthy and well qualified, not only as an honorary reward for their zeal, fidelity and attachment to Masonry, but to render it impossible that any brother who should be found worthy of being advanced to this degree should ever be reduced to such extreme indigence as to suffer for the common necessities of life, when the price of his mark would procure the same.

Q. Who does a brother represent, presenting a mark and receiving assistance?

A. Our Grand Master, Hiram Abiff, who was a poor man, but for his regular and upright deportment, his great skill in architecture and the sciences, became eminently distinguished among the craftsmen.

Q. Who does a brother represent, receiving a mark and granting assistance?

A. Our Grand Master, Solomon, King of Israel, who was a rich man and eminently distinguished for his great liberality.

So here it is clearly states that the giving and receiving of charity and assistance within the lodge – the spiritual and monetary pyramid scheme of Freemasonry – is considered to be a continuation of a mutual benefit society created by King Solomon, Hiram of Tyre, and Hiram Abiff. The "wages" which Masonry deals in, then, are, in a metaphorical sense, riches from Solomon's treasury.

Chapter Twenty-Eight: The Shekel-to-Dollar Exchange Rate

The fact that in Freemasonry, one's mark is specifically worth "one half-shekel of silver, or a quarter of a dollar" is very important. You will recall me mentioning previously that in ancient times all Jews were required to pay a temple tax of exactly one half-shekel. The shekel and half-shekel coins circulated in ancient Israel were all designed in Tyre, and many were minted there as well. Some of the later ones were made especially for the Israelite temple tax, and featured Judaic themes, but early on they were the same coins found in Tyre, with the same designs.

I suggested earlier in this book that the Templars may have discovered, either while stationed on Tyre during the Crusades, or while excavating beneath the Temple Mount, the ancient Tyrian coins which depicted a serpent on a tree, the obvious origin of the dollar sign. It is even more likely that they became familiar with these Tyrian shekel and half-shekel coins also, each of which featured the bust of the god Melqart on one side, and an eagle on the other. These designs were strikingly similar to the designs found on modern American quarter-dollars, and on the large silver eagle dollars that used to be circulated in the US (see figure 28). Even more remarkable is the fact that Tyrian half-shekels were about the same size as American quarter-dollars. Considering that the Mark Master ritual clearly states that a half-shekel is equivalent to a quarter-dollar, the fact that the two coins are almost the same size, and carry almost the same design, is beyond coincidence.

Another observation I have made is that the size of the Tyrian full shekel coin, 31.5 millimeters, is almost the same size as each of the two roundels on the back of the US dollar bill which feature the front and reverse of the Great Seal. Using the Masonic formula of counting one quarter-dollar as a half-shekel, this means that there are (esoterically) two full shekels to the US dollar. I find it easy to believe that this formula, as a reference to the treasury of King Solomon, and the wages paid to the workers who built the Temple, was purposely incorporated into the US monetary system by the Freemasons involved in creating it. Hints about this secret principle are being given to us by the size, shape, and design of the US currency.

Chapter Twenty-Nine: Solomon's House: An Ongoing Project

It seems clear that the Freemasonic founders of the United States, as well as those who have helped to guide the development of the Republic well into the twentieth century, have organized the nation's institutions and operating systems along a pattern handed down, from one generation of initiates to another, at least from the time of King Solomon, if not further back in history. All of America's essential institutions, including, but not limited to, its economic institutions, are engineered in accord with the ancient spiritual principles that I have detailed in this book. The founding fathers of the U.S. may been so influenced by Enlightenment philosophy that they seemed "rationalist" and "humanist" in comparison to rabid Catholic and Protestant ideologues, but most of them were not materialists or atheists. They understood that everything which happens here on the physical plane has a corresponding effect in the spiritual realm, which in turn bounces back to affect the future of the physical plane, either positively or negatively, according to the original act. So the founders sought to create a Republic that would operate in such a way as to create maximum positive impact for both the citizens of the Republic, and the world abroad.

The principles of "spiritual pyramid scheme" - of an organization being used as an energy multiplier - apply to political states as well as churches and secret societies. The citizens of a nation give not only their taxes, but also their faith, good will, and service to the institution which governs them. When that faith, goodwill and service is lacking, the nation become weak, but when it is abundant, the wealth and power of the nation increases exponentially. The leader of the nation, as its figurehead, must inspire and channel this faith and goodwill. The institutions of government are often specifically crafted to help him do this. With this in mind, the state makes use of faith-inspiring messages, and religious, heraldic, or occult symbolism in government insignias, or in the architecture of government buildings. For instance, many people know that certain streets and landmarks in Washington, D.C. are purposely laid out in the shape of a pentagram, and the theme is echoed by the nearby Pentagon, the center of the nation's military command. This iconography is used as an energy amplifier for the nation's goodwill and patriotism, to strengthen the spiritual power which the government needs in order to function.

Above all, though, the "Law of the Harvest" is demonstrated most purely in the operation of our capitalist economy, in which the investment of money, assets, and work is multiplied exponentially to the investor, the recipient, and to the economy as a whole, creating a machine-like system in which wealth is constantly multiplied as it is traded around amongst individual components of the system. As long as money continues to flow back and forth within the economy, it grows exponentially. When the movement of the money slows down, the growth slows down. It is considered a recession if the growth rate of the economy gets smaller, not just when the economy actually shrinks. This is because the economy is based not on a finite amount of gold or silver, but on energy that is constantly moving and constantly multiplying. This idea of the constant flow of money is at the root of our word "currency", as Jack Weatherford explains in A History of Money:

The frequent melting and reissuing of coins kept the mints at the Temple of Juno Moneta [in Rome] in nearly continuous operation, whether the supply of gold and silver increased or not. The coins seem to have flowed out of the mint in a constant stream, and it is from the Latin word 'currere', meaning 'to run' or 'to flow', that the modern word 'currency' is derived, along with other, related words such as 'current' and 'courier.' The devalued coins gushed like a great river from Capitoline Hill through the entire empire.

The image of a river of money constantly flowing out of Rome's Capitoline Hill may also be a partial explanation for the development of the term "Capitalism." Although "capitol" and "capital" are spelled differently and have different meanings, they both come from the same root word, which, as I have said, means "of the head." This, I think, points to the true origin of "Capitalism", as I think it may be somehow tied in with the image of the head of Baphomet, which the Knights Templar believed "made them rich." As Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh said in The Temple and the Lodge, "No medieval institution did more for the rise of Capitalism" than the Templars, and when they faded from the scene, they passed the responsibility for the development of capitalism first to the Italian merchants, then to the Freemasons.

Those are the ideological and spiritual roots of Capitalism. But the economic seeds from which it sprouted – the "capital", if you will, used to fund the development of Capitalism itself – came from the gold and silver looted by the Spaniards from the Americas. Gold objects were taken from the temples of Aztec and Mayan cults and melted down to make coins for Europe, while the Natives were enslaved to work in silver mines, to create even more coins for Europe. As I said before, this sudden influx of coinage into Europe sparked the Great Price Revolution, influenced the creation of corporations, and ultimately ended up in the coffers of the companies whose ventures in the New World created the North American colonies that became the United States. From there, Americans used the principles of Capitalism, set down by Adam Smith in his book The Wealth of Nations in 1776 (the year of their nation's birth), to establish their own empire, and to transform the world. The fact that the American Capitalist system was ultimately built using gold taken from the temples of conquered natives is an example of the same spiritual principle used by Constantine when he funded Constantinople with gold looted from pagan Roman temples. It is taking something consecrated to another purpose and sacrificing it to create something new. Such foundations constitute "seeds" from which the new temple, or new institution, is expected to grow, according to the ancient spiritual world-view.

A similar "seed planting" occurred, purportedly, when Jacques De Molay arranged for the Order of the Temple to be continued through a newly-created Masonic order. According to The Occult Conspiracy: Secret Societies – Their Influence and Power in World History, by Michael Howard:

The survival of the Templar tradition was, according to historians, masterminded by the last Grand master, Jacques de Molay, while he was in prison. On the night before his execution de Molay sent a trusted confidant to the secret crypt in Paris where the bodies of the Order's Grand Masters were always entombed. This messenger took from the tomb various symbolic objects which were sacred to the Order, including the crown of the king of Jerusalem, a seven-branched candlestick from Solomon's temple and statues from the church which marked the site of the alleged burial place of Jesus.

De Molay told his trusted aide that the two pillars which stood at the entrance of the Templar tomb were hollow and contained large sums of money. He was told to use this wealth and the symbolic objects to recreate the Order so that its secrets would not be lost. The two pillars of the crypt's entrance were probably copies of the obelisks at the gateway of Solomon's temple. In addition to gold coin, the hollow pillars possibly contained manuscripts detailing the occult teachings of the Templar Order.

The idea of planting a spiritual seed and working to cultivate it with the assistance of God, is a concept also present in the tithing principles of the "Law of the Harvest" discussed earlier. When utilizing these principles during the foundation of something such as a new temple, it has long been customary to almost literally "plant a seed" in the foundation of the building, in the form of a cornerstone. As I have said, the cornerstone of Solomon's Temple was a sacred object used more than once in the Bible as a symbol of the divine, and it became a central emblem for the Freemasons as well. In the ancient Middle East, it was customary to consecrate new buildings by pouring a sacrifice to the building's patron deity onto the cornerstone – a sacrifice of oil, wine, and grain, the same set of items paid as wages to the masons who built Solomon's Temple. Again, these sacrifices were spiritual seeds of foundation. This is a tradition that the Freemasons have continued into the present time, as explained in a 1930 article called "Corn, Wine, and Oil" from the Short Talk Bulletin of the Masonic Service Association of the United States, where it says:

...corn, wine and oil - the produce of the land - are natural accompaniments to the dedication of a lodge which it is hoped will prosper, reap an abundance of the first fruits of Masonic cultivation and a rich harvest of ripe character from the seeds it plants.

...From earliest times consecration has been accompanied by sacrifice, a free-will offering of something of real value to those who thus worship. Hence the sacrifice of corn, wine and oil - the wealth of the land, the strength of the tribe, the comfort and well-being of the individual - at the consecration of any place of worship or service of God.

Like so much else in our ceremonies, the idea today is wholly symbolic. The Grand Master orders his Deputy (or whatever officer is customary) to pour the corn; the Senior Grand Warden to pour the wine, the Junior Grand Warden to pour the oil upon the 'Lodge' - usually a covered structure representing the original Ark of the Covenant.

At the founding of the American republic, there seems to have been no shyness at all about the fact that the country was being initiated as a Masonic institution. Many of the ceremonies which took place to consecrate the new nation, such as the swearing in of the first President, were openly Masonic rituals. George Washington took the Oath of Office dressed in Masonic regalia, with his hand resting on a Masonic Bible.

But the Masonic nature of these ceremonies was never more apparent than it was in the ritual installations of Masonically-consecrated cornerstones for the structures within the nation's new capitol, Washington, District of Columbia. The new city, named after the first President, was at once also a "district", named after the national goddess, Columbia. It was a truly Templar concept: the district was taken from the land mass of the states of Maryland and Virginia. But once consecrated as “Washington, D.C.”, it was no longer part of Maryland or Virginia. It became an autonomous region which is the seat of the sovereignty that governs the rest of the states.

Washington, D.C. was originally laid out as a perfect ten-be-ten mile square, oriented perpendicular to the compass. George Washington picked out the land himself, and we might surmise that by choosing bits of both Virginia and Maryland, he may have been making some allusion to the Virgin Mary. According to David Ovason’s The Secret Architecture of Our Nation’s Capitol, there are many allusions in the architecture and layout of Washington, D.C. to the constellation Virgo. This just confirms the idea that the nation was consecrated by its founders to the ancient protectress of the state, the goddess Ishtar, or Venus, under the name of “Columbia”, as both the image of Virgo and the image of the Virgin Mary are permutations of this same goddess concept.

The foundation of the 100-mile-square grid that was originally Washington, D.C. (before a chunk of it was conceded back to Virginia in 1848) made for a ceremony in itself, complete with the ritual laying of a cornerstone in the traditional Masonic fashion. This took place at the southern point of the grid - Jones Point, Virginia - in 1791, and was followed in 1792 by the laying of the cornerstone for the White House. This was a ceremony again officiated by George Washington himself, dressed up in his Masonic apron, and it actually took place on October 13, 1792 – the anniversary of the arrest of the Knights Templar. (It also took place on the same day that the dollar was adopted as America’s official currency.) A similar Masonic ceremony occurred with the laying of the cornerstone of the Capitol building in 1793, and with that of the Washington Monument in 1848.

In each of these consecration ceremonies, the symbolic sacrifice of oil, wine, and grain was poured upon the cornerstone. There can be no doubt that this was a sacrifice made to God for the benefit of the new Republic the Masons were creating. What better seeds to plant for the cultivation of what the founders saw as a "New Atlantis", a "New Jerusalem", and a "New Temple of Solomon"?

The United States as a whole appears to have been consecrated to three different spiritual entities simultaneously. On the one hand, there is the reverence clearly shown by America's founders to the God of the Bible, also called Zeus by the Greeks and Jupiter by the Romans. The founders made it obvious in their phrasing of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and in markings found on American currency, that they considered the sovereignty of the United States to be "under God", guided by divine Providence. But there is also a specific reverence shown by the founders to the goddess represented by the constellation Virgo and the planet Venus, the Ishtar of the Babylonians, personified as Columbia, or Lady Liberty. Then in addition to this, we have the subtle but identifiable acknowledgment the founders apparently gave to the figure of Baphomet, a Templar and Masonic symbol of the Universal Agent which, in its Hermaphroditism, can perhaps be seen to represent a union of these masculine and feminine divine essences. We see a nod to the Baphomet in the explicit use by the founders of the number thirteen as a symbol of the Republic. There even seems to have been an effort to portray President Washington as a personification of Baphomet.

I am referring specifically to two depictions of George Washington made well after his death. In 1831, Congress commissioned a statue of the first President to go inside the Rotunda of the Capitol building (underneath the giant dome). The result that the sculptor came up with received a very negative reaction from the public. He had chosen to copy the appearance of a well-known Greek statue of Zeus. Washington appeared bare-chested and muscular, enthroned in a god-like posture, with a sword in his left hand, held by the blade, with the pommel sticking out. The statue's posture also hinted at Eliphas Levi's depiction of Baphomet, for in this statue Washington's right hand pointed up toward the heavens, while the sword he held in his left hand pointed down toward the ground. I think the statue is great, but for some reason, it was universally scorned, and was finally removed from the Rotunda in 1962, consigned to the less conspicuous National Museum of American History.

It is claimed that the public bias against this statue stemmed from the sentiment that it was inappropriate to depict an American President as a god. That was supposed to be even worse than presenting him as a king. But if this were truly a widely-held viewpoint, why was the painter Constantino Brumidi permitted to depict Washington in the exact same pose, sword and all, when he was hired to produce a fresco for the Rotunda of the Capitol building in 1875 – the Rotunda in which the supposedly hated and sacrilegious statue was already sitting? The name of this fresco (which is still there, by the way) is Apotheosis of Washington. The word "apotheosis" means, according to Webster's Dictionary, "the elevation of a person to the rank of a god." George Washington is shown here aloft in the clouds of Heaven, with the goddesses "Liberty" and "Fame" on either side of him, as well as thirteen virgins surrounding him in a circle.

There can be no doubt, considering the evidence presented in this book, that the foundation of the United States was a religious act – one which emboldened the fledgling Republic to stand tall amongst the world's greatest powers, eventually exerting its own considerable influence upon them.

Chapter Thirty: A Final Thought

I have covered the subject of the symbolic ritual sacrifices that were made during the foundation of America's capitol, Washington, D.C. These were seeds planted in hopes that the nation would prosper. But as we all know, it was not only this symbolic sacrifice that has made the United States great, but also those sacrifices of time, money, toil, and human life that her citizens and public servants have made throughout the years.

As a nation, America has sacrificed a great deal for the benefit of the world at large, and on a spiritual level, this has probably earned the country some of the karmic rewards that its citizens have enjoyed. Often criticized for being "the world's policemen", and for using its economic power to influence the politics of other nations, the USA has been, next to Capitalism itself, the most successful instigator of positive change the world has seen. Although some may wish to concentrate on the negative effects of America's influence in various times and places throughout its history, an honest person would have to agree that, overall, the results have been good.

The US has given more aid to foreign countries than any other nation in history, and has used its military might to protect the weak from tyrants the world over. When it is necessary to destroy another nation in order to halt tyranny or to save the lives of others, the US always helps that nation to rebuild, and to create a better way of life than they had before. This is in stark contrast to the ancient tradition of pillaging, raping, and taking home the spoils of one's conquered enemy. Because of the military security that the United States is able to provide for many others abroad, these countries are then largely free from the burden of funding their own defense, and are often able to spend more money on social programs instead. The US tries to encourage freedom, equality, and prosperity everywhere that it can, and offers itself as a safe haven for the oppressed of the world. Some say America does too much. Others complain that she doesn't do enough. But America certainly does, at the present time, play a pivotal role in maintaining the world's relative stability.

Why is it, then, that so many citizens who live in the greatest country in the world, and others abroad who have benefited from it, wish to see it torn down – to see all of this hard work, sacrifice, and carefully-planned cultivation brought to naught? For so many of these people, their hatred of the United States is based on fear of the American dollar, and the power that it holds. I believe that this fear stems from ignorance of the way in which money, and especially American money, truly works.

We have seen in our examination of history that money is, in itself, a radical idea, one that has developed over time to transform the world for the better, bringing, to the nations who used it properly - prosperity, technological advancement, and intellectual enlightenment. The best things in life may be free, but only when you have enough money to live comfortably do you have the freedom to enjoy those things. People who think that money cannot bring happiness have either never had enough money, or have always had plenty of it, and either way have not experienced the positive transformations that it can bring to a person's life. It can also, obviously, transform our society, and our environment, with seemingly limitless potential. To fear this power is to reject the most useful tool available to eliminate the evils and ills of our world. Before we can "make poverty history", we have get outside of the mindset of poverty.

I certainly hope, for the sake of our society, that people will being to educate themselves about money, and learn to appreciate its magic.

APPENDICES

Appendix A: The Tessera Hospitalis

The word “tessera” was a Latin word which originally meant “cube”, and usually referred to small, square-shaped pebbles, marbles, or dice. It stems from the Greek word “tesseragonos”, which means “four-cornered” or “square.” A tessera hospitalis was a small token of friendship used in Roman antiquity, in which the item was broken in half, with one half being kept by each of the parties. If you met a new friend, especially while traveling, he might invite you to stay at his house for the evening. A tessera hospitalis would be broken between you before parting. If you ever passed that way again, or if your new friend came through your neck of the woods at some point, even if it was many years later and you both looked different with age, you could compare the two tessera and rest assured that the other person was indeed the old friend you met so many years ago. The token also served as a pledge of hospitality for the future, to remind you of the good turn your friend once did you in the past, and of your duty to return the favor. Such objects exist even today. Schoolchildren sometimes share a token or metal, broken in half, which, when put together, reads “Best Friends.”

Other tesserae were used for related purposes. A “tessera nummaria” was a voucher for a dole of money, used during the late Roman period when the government was giving out welfare money to its starving citizens. A “tessera theatratis” was a token used as a ticket to gain admission to a theater play. A “tessera militaris” was a token containing a password that was passed around amongst a division of an army. For this reason, the word “tessera” came to be a more general term meaning “password”, as William Smith explains in his 1875 book, A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities:

A watchword was used at night and it consisted of a word or phrase that someone must say to prove that he was a bona fide member of a Roman unit or, if the authorized password was not used, he was considered an enemy. In the Roman army, the watchword for the night was not communicated verbally, but by means of a small rectangular tablet of wood upon which it was written. One man was chosen out of each of those maniples (common soldiers) and turmae (troop of cavalry containing thirty men, a squadron) that were quartered at that extremity of the lines most remote from the Principia. Each of these individuals (tesserarius) went near sunset to the tent of the tribune, and received from him a tessera, on which the password and also a certain number or mark were inscribed. With this he returned to the maniple or turma to which he belonged, and taking witnesses, delivered it to the officer of the next adjoining maniple or turma, and to the next until it had passed along the whole line. Then it was returned by the person who received it last to the tribune. The regulation was that the whole of the tesserae should be restored before it was dark, and if any one was found not returning the tessera at the appointed time, the row to which it belonged could be quickly discovered by means of the number or mark at the top, and so an investigation took place as to the cause of the delay, and punishment was inflicted upon the parties found to be at fault.

We can see now how the word “tiler”, which originally referred to the person responsible for laying down tile floors in a medieval stonemason guild, came to refer to the officer in a Freemasonic lodge, whose job it is to admit people through the entrance, and to make sure that none but the appropriate lodge members enter. The words “tile”, or “tessera”, each could refer to both the tiles used on the floor, and the token or password presented to the tiler at the lodge as proof of membership. The fact that mosaics were made up of little tesserae, or tiles put together, is at the origin of the word “tessellation.”

It is funny, then, that while tesserae evolved into a form of money, the tessellated exchequer board became the common method of calculating money in medieval Europe. And along with the board, the exchequer would use small counting tokens, or tessera, called “tally chips” - “tally” being a word related to “tile”, and to the concept of the tessera hospitalis. “Tally” comes from the Latin “talea”, meaning “a cutting, rod, or stick”, but it later came to mean “a thing that matches another”, according to the Online Etymology Dictionary, etymonline.com. This source states that the first such usage of this word was in 1651, and that it came from “practice of splitting a tally lengthwise, the debtor and creditor each retaining one of the halves.” Also, the related word “till” came to refer to a cash box.

But perhaps most interesting in this family of words is “talisman”, which comes more directly from the Byzantine Greek word “telesma”, the latter meaning “religious rite or ceremony”, and also “payment or tax.” Clearly this word must have developed from the practice of making a monetary donation in coin, or paying with something else and receiving a token as proof of payment, at the beginning or end of each ritual. The word “talisman” now generally refers to an enchanted object, usually a stone, wooden, or metal token, often engraved with religious or occult symbols, and used to transport the spiritual power of a spell or blessing. The object is usually imbued with the spell through a magical rite, and then a person either carries it with them as a charm, or gives it to the person they wish to cast a spell onto. I stated earlier in this book that I think all American coins and bills are talismans. This is what I mean.

Returning to the concept of the tessera hospitalis, it would seem that this may have influenced the Templar creation of the chit, or cheque. When you broke the tessera hospitalis in half, you created a unique pattern along the edge of each of the two pieces that was not likely to be replicated for forgery. This was the purpose of the cipher-encoded cheque system used by the Templars, and it is the same idea behind the netting or spider web patterns often used on modern checks and money. They are patterns not likely to be replicated by those outside of the institution that created it. Like the tesserae hospitalis, modern checks and cash are essentially an "IOU" – a "promise to pay", made and accepted in good faith.

Appendix B: The Wedjat Eye

We will now examine the Masonic symbol of the All-Seeing Eye, which can be found floating above the Egyptian-style pyramid on the back of the Great Seal of the United States. It has its roots in the Egyptian symbol of the left eye of Horus.

According to the story, the god Horus, son of Osiris, had his left eye destroyed by his nemesis, his uncle Seth. Later, the pieces of the eye were recovered, and put back together by the magician Thoth (the Egyptian equivalent of the Greek Hermes, and the Templar Baphomet). There was actually one piece that was not recovered, and that was the pupil of the eye. But Thoth replaced this himself through magic arts. Horus' magical pupil was really the final piece which acted as the glue to hold all of the other pieces together. In this way, it was a bit like the keystone used in stonemasonry to hold together the pieces of an arch. The keystone takes on a great deal of symbolic significance in Masonic ritual, in which the rebuilding of Solomon's Temple is acted out, and there it is called "the stone that was rejected." It is ultimately a multi-layered symbol for the Philosopher's Stone, that hidden but nonetheless essential element which holds together physical reality.

The term "the stone that was rejected" is a line from the Gospels, in which Jesus is compared to a stone rejected from the building of Solomon's Temple that in the end becomes essential to the build. The fact that Masons use this term to refer to the keystone of Solomon's Temple is interesting, for in their own iconography, they show the keystone as holding together an arch which includes the pillars of Jachin and Boaz. Presumably, then, this arch is meant to represent the entrance to the Temple. And in the center of the keystone in this icon Masons sometimes place the All-Seeing Eye. This may connect on a metaphorical level with another symbolic eye - one which plays a significant role in Egyptian mythology, and which can definitely be said to have been "rejected." This is the eye of Ra, or "Atum-Re", their creator god. The story is explained by R.T. Rundle Clark in his book Myth and Symbol in Ancient Egypt, and it takes place in the Abyss, or the primeval waters of creation:

Initially God seems to have only one Eye – a mysterious entity which is separable from its owner and which is sent out as an envoy to seek She and Tefnut [the first two human beings], who have become separated from Atum and are lost in the immensity of the Abyss. The Eye finds them and brings them back to their father, who proceeds to regenerate them as the life and order of the universe….

….The first pair were therefore not really existent until the Eye could return them to their creator. The Eye is personified might, the essential violence that is used to protect the gods and kings against disintegration in the waters or spirit enemies in the created world… the sending out of the Eye is equated with the Divine Word [of creation].

However, when the Eye returned, it found that on the head of Atum-Re the creator god, another Eye had grown in its place. The original eye became enraged with jealousy. To sooth its anger, Atum-Re had the eye transformed into a cobra, and then placed it on his head as a symbol of his royalty. Clark writes:

When it returned, it found that it had been supplanted in the Great One's face by another – a surrogate eye – which we can interpret as the sun or moon. This was the primary cause for the wrath of the Eye and the great turning-point in the development of the universe, for the Eye can never be fully or permanently appeased. The High God…turned it into a rearing cobra, which he bound around his forehead to ward off his enemies. This is why, on the terrestrial plane, the eye denotes the kingship of the pharaohs in terms of sheer power, while cosmically it is the 'sovereign eye' and burning heat of the sun.

Thus the Egyptian cobra crown was born, while the Eye symbol came to be known by the epithet, "the Royal Eye of Gopta", the latter word being the original form of "Egypt."

In each of these myths, the eye seems to be a symbol of the restoration of order from chaos. The pieces of the eye of Horus get made whole by Thoth, and the eye of Ra leads God's creation back home from the waters of the Abyss. Indeed, the eye symbol did become part of an Egyptian hieroglyph which meant "order." It was formed by an eye over an arch with two pillars (see figure 35), just like in the Masonic icon previously described, and it stood for the word "Mayet", or "Maat", which meant "order", but also "wisdom", just as the "met" does in the name "Baphomet." According to Egyptologist E. Wallis Budge, a more simplified Egyptian eye hieroglyph meant "to create, to make, to fashion, or to produce."

However, the eye of Horus was a very particular symbol, and it had a very particular name: "udjat", or "wedjat." It was drawn in a very specific way, and it included a strange little curly-cue, seemingly shaped like a Fibonacci spiral, jutting out of it at the bottom right. But this is the most amazing part. Just as the eye was reassembled from its various parts, the symbol of the wedjat eye could be disassembled into its various parts, each of which then came to represent a mathematical fraction of the whole. These parts of the eye became in themselves little symbols that served as numbers representing fractions. Specifically, the whole eye was supposed to contain 63/64. One piece symbolized 1/2, another 3/4, then 1/8, 1/16/, 1/32, and 1/64. But there were only 63/64 in the whole eye. The missing 1/64 did not really exist in the physical realm. It represented the pupil of the eye made from the magic of Thoth, which held the rest of the eye together. It makes sense, then, that one could only take the eye apart and use the individual pieces for numbers if the pupil of the eye was not there holding the pieces together (see figure 34).

In Egypt, the wedjat symbol was the ultimate measurement from which all of their other forms of measurement were made, much like the dimensions of the perfectly cubic Holy of Holies of the Tabernacle, and later, Solomon's Temple, were used as the basis of measurement in Israel. For this reason, a system of weights was assigned based on the 63/64 of the wedjat eye. This became the method for not only weighing out bundles of wheat and other goods, but also for the weighing out precious metals, and the assigning of values to coins, especially silver ones. So the Egyptian monetary system (which was only used at short periods in its history) was based on the different parts of the wedjat eye too. The eye also became a symbol for the act of religious sacrifice, and tokens featuring the wedjat eye were used as vouchers for those who had made donations to the temple priesthood.

The different parts (and progressive fractions) of the wedjat eye are believed by anthropologists and historians to have been originally based on the phases on the moon.

This is part of the reason why Thoth, who put the eye back together, is thought to be a lunar deity. This is interesting, considering that the wedjat eye may be related to another item which involved lunar symbolism: the chessboard. Modern chessboards of course have 64 squares to them, just as the wedjat eye ultimately has 64 parts, and the chessboard is ringed by 28 squares, representing one lunar cycle, with the white and black squares implying alternating periods of day and night. With this in mind, it is quite significant that an Egyptian depiction of the wedjat eye floating over a chessboard-style tessellated pattern has been found. (See figure 36.)

We should also note that the number 64 is a cube of 4. The "perfect cube" is a symbol very important to Freemasons and other occult groups. Not only was the Holy of Holies in the Tabernacle (and later the Temple) perfectly cubic, as well as the "New Jerusalem" described in the Revelation of St. John the Divine, but so also is the Philosopher's Stone of the alchemists said to be cubic. The goat-headed Baphomet is often shown seated on a cubic stone. But more pertinent to our current examination is what the Templar offshoot group the Priory of Sion has to say about the "perfect cube." In one of their well-known published documents, called Le Serpent Rouge, the mysterious author refers to the process of reassembling the "scattered stones" of the "perfect cube", using the Masonic "square and compass." Interestingly, this poem is arranged in the form of a 13-house zodiac, implying a lunar calendar, and makes several reverences to the game of chess.

Because of its association with money in Egypt, I have often wondered if the word "wedjat" could be related to other monetary words like "chit", "check", "jack", or "shekel." It seems almost certain, though, to be related to the word "watch", which not only means “to see or observe”, but also “to measure” or “to check” (as in “watchword”, a term identical to “password”) It is probably also related to the Hindi word for “eye”, which is “ajna.” It could even be related to “agio”, a financial term that I will explain in Appendix D.

However, the name “udjat” was also, along with “Gopta”, at the root of the place-name “Egypt”, for according to E. Wallis Budge, the Egyptians sometimes called their own land “Utcha”, thus identifying, as Budge put it, “the name of Egypt as the country of the Eye of Ra.”

Appendix C: The Bohemian Connection

The examination in Appendix B of the word “wedjat” and its possible relationship to the word “check” brings to mind a tantalizing possibility. “Check” of course sounds identical to the word “Czech”, used to describe a person from Czechoslovakia, a land that used to be called “Bohemia.” Czechoslovakia is supposedly named after the man “Czek”, who, according to legend, founded the land. He was purportedly a nomadic wanderer and trader, who, at one point in his travels, rather haphazardly stopped on a hill and decided that he and his entourage would live there from then on. The people of the area gained a reputation for being nomadic and rather untrustworthy traders, so “Bohemian” became a slang term for such people (although it is now a more redeemed term for somebody who is eccentric). The word “Bohemia” is said to come from an ancient Celtic tribe called the “Boii” who once lived in the area.

But as for “Czech”, because of the Templar association with travel and commerce, I cannot help but wonder if the word “chit” used by the Templars may have influenced the name. I mentioned earlier in this book that the word “check” or “chit” was most probably related to the word “jetton”, a type of coin, also invented by the Knights Templar, used as a reckoning counter in conjunction with the exchequer board. Incidentally, the term “jetton” has sometimes been applied by chroniclers to another form of coin used during the medieval period. These coins were more properly called “abbey tokens.” Thomas Wright described their purpose in Worship of the Generative Powers:

Antiquaries have given the name of abbey tokens to a rather numerous class of such medals, the use of which is still very uncertain, although there appears to be little doubt of its being of a religious character. Some have supposed that they were distributed to those who attended at certain sacraments or rites of the Church, who could thus, when called up, prove by the number of their tokens, the greater or less regularity of their attendance.

A number of such "abbey tokens" minted by Templar preceptories have been found, bearing none other than the goat-headed, hermaphroditic image of the Baphomet. These were possibly used either as a reward token to prove a knight's attendance at a Templar ritual, or as a ticket proving his right to be at the ritual.

In his book The Arcane Schools, occultist John Yarker explains the employment of abbey tokens by certain Gnostic sects that venerated John the Baptist. These tokens would be used as an admission ticket for cult members attending a Gnostic mass. Yarker compares the tokens to the Roman tesserae, and acknowledges that some of them were minted by Templars. As he puts it:

The Gnostics adopted the Apostle John as their Patron; his symbol was the Eagle, or bird of the sun, which was the Sectarians' sacred emblem; it is found in Egypt at the foot of the tau cross, and now on the jewel of a Rosy-cross Mason. The Gnostic tokens were a sectarian version of the older pagan 'Tesserae hospitalis,' on which was the head of Zeus ... There can be no doubt that the Arcane Discipline had them as tokens of preparation for the Supper of the Lord; many, if not all, the Catholic confraternities present a token which is generally worn under the clothes from a ribbon. Some of the tokens yet preserved belonged to the Templars, and there are a quantity of Abbey tokens, which are struck in lead or pewter with the cross on one side, and on the obverse a variety of designs.

Very pertinent to our current discussion is the fact that, according to the eighteenth-century Austrian scholar Joseph, Baron von Hammer-Purgstall, Templar abbey tokens depicting the Baphomet have been found in the Bohemian (now Czech) towns of Mureau, Prague, and Egra. Indeed, the Templars had quite an influence in Bohemia, as well as the Teutonic Knights, and the "Knights of Johann", the local Knights Hospitaller, because Bohemia was the site from which the Third Crusade was initiated by Emperor Frederick Barbarossa. But it is hard to ignore the fact that the Czech flag and arms make use of the chequer pattern, perhaps an echo of the Templars. In addition, this area is host to the town of Janvov, which mean's "John's family", as well as Joachimstal in the Jachymov valley, where the first silver dollars were mined and minted. "Joachimstal", you will recall, means "Joachim's Valley." The name "Joachim" is just another way saying "Jachin" – the name of one of the pillars from Solomon's Temple. Also, given the apparent influence in the area of the cult of John, we should note again that "Jack" is a slang term for "John." We find names based on "John" or "Jack" all over the modern Czech Republic.

Just as the term "bohemian" became a generic term for a nomadic trader, a swindler, and a cheat, so too did the term "gypsy." Webster's Dictionary defines the word as, "a member of a traditionally itinerant people, originally of North India, now residing mostly in permanent communities in many countries of the world... [It stems from] gipcyan, variant of Egyptian, from the belief that Gypsies originally came from Egypt." Like the Bohemians, the Gypsies have a historical association with the Templars. In their book The Temple and the Lodge, Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh documented a protective relationship between the Knights Templar families resident in Scotland, and the Gypsies there, whom the Templar families saved from persecution on more than one occasion. They even organized esoteric mystery plays with a group of Gypsies that took place on the grounds near Rosslyn Chapel.

Gypsies were widely associated with their dishonest business deals, including the sale of bogus psychic readings, magical spells and herbal remedies, that the word "gyp" came to be slang for theft or fraud. Interestingly, there is yet one more group who, like the Bohemians and the Gypsies, became so associated with this behavior that their own group's name became an adjective for "nomadic swindler", and "stranger." I am speaking of the Chicanos, Mexican immigrants to the United States. This concept must be related to the word "chicanery", from the French seventeenth century term "chicanerie." According to Webster's Dictionary, this word means "the use of sly or evasive language, reasoning, etc., to trick or deceive"; and, "a tricky or deceitful maneuver, subterfuge." Note, again, that the root word "Chic" is much like "Czech." Perhaps these things are related to the fact that "jack" is a slang term for theft also.

One more thing that ties these groups together is this: the Templars, the Bohemians, and the Gypsies have all been credited by various historians with helping to import the deck of playing cards from the East to the West, and from there to have helped it developed into the Tarot deck, called by modern occultists the "Book of Thoth." The alchemist Papus even specifically referred to it as “the Tarot of the Bohemians.” And Masonic writer Albert Pike wrote that the alchemical Azoth was “the same as the Thoth of the Bohemians.”

Appendix D: Goat Money

Relevant to the facts and theories discussed in Appendix C, I note the following: The word "Gopta", which both "Egypt" and "Gypsy" derive from, is also, according to antiquities expert L.A. Waddell, at the root of the words "Gothic", "goetic" (which means "magical"), and "god." He ultimately traced it to the Sumerian word "kad", which means "lord" or "king." He also thought that "kad" was at the root of the word "goat", because the ancients had many gods that took the form of a goat. As we know, the Templar idol Baphomet had a half-goat form, as did the alleged Greek inventor of alchemy, Hermes.

The goat-headed drawing of Baphomet by Eliphas Levi has now morphed into our stereotypical depiction of Satan, and modern Satanists have adopted him as one of their symbols. The icon they use for him is an inverted pentagram with the details of a goat's face drawn into it – an image which is also based on a drawing by Eliphas Levi. They call this symbol the "Goat of Mendes", linking Baphomet to the goats that were used for fertility rites at the temple of Ammon, in the ancient Egyptian city of Mendes. In these rites, the goat copulated with the temple priestesses, an appropriately sinister heritage for a Satanic symbol.

In addition to being important to Templars and to modern Satanists, goat symbolism plays a peculiar role in the lore of Freemasonry. This subject was discussed in great detail by British Master Mason Eugene W. Plawiuk in his essay Liber Capricornus: The Symbol of the Goat, where he writes:

Our first experience upon entering the Lodge as apprentices is to be warned about the Goat. Even before we are informed of 'in whom we should put our trust', we are given knowing looks followed by such comments as; 'He's going to get the Goat', or 'You are going to ride the goat', or even 'Look out for the Goat.' It is a good thing that we are informed that we place our trust in God, since some poor unfortunate entered apprentice could understandably be forgiven for replying; 'In the Goat.'

The origin of this humorous initiatory jest about the Goat is shrouded by the veils of time. Several older brethren I have conferred with seem to have no idea of where or when it originated. It could have originally been imported from America by that practical joker and fellow Mason; Benjamin Franklin…

Mr. Plawiuk then goes on to describe how Masonic researchers have in the past equated the goat symbol with the idea of building temples, and that it can be connected to the Masonic term for God: "The Great Architect of the Universe", for which they use the anagram "G.A.O.T.U." As Plawiuk explains it:

What a better symbol to attribute to our own striving to understand the G.A.O.T.U. then a Goat? And here too we find an anagram for 'Goat.'

According to a research monograph on the Dionysian Artificers and Early Masonry edited by Manly P. Hall, the symbolism of the Goat relates to the pre-Christian God Pan, Dionysius. The Goat-God was accepted by the later Greek Mystery Schools as the symbol of the Temple Builders. …

Elsewhere, Mr. Plauwiuk analyzes similarities between the Scapegoat of Leviticus and the Masonic myth of Hiram Abiff, the architect of Solomon's Temple who, according to the legend, was murdered by his own apprentices for refusing to reveal to them the "secret" of the Temple.

I have already discussed the symbolism of Zeus' she-goat wet nurse, Amalthea, whose skin he made into his magical shield, the Aegis, while its horn became the Cornucopia. "Aegis" means "goat skin", as the root word "aeg" means "goat" in Greek. Goats were very important to the Greeks, for the Greeks ate goats' meat, made milk from their cheese, and used their skin for clothing. This is why the Aegean Sea, which lent its name to their entire civilization, has its roots in this syllable, "aeg."

Interestingly, goat skin is one of the earliest forms of money or currency, used long before coins were invented. Also, in ancient Rome, they had an abacus system for settling monetary accounts, in which discs carved from goats' horns were used, in a manner similar to the way jettons were used in the later European exchequer system. In modern times, the term "goat money" is used to refer to high-quality counterfeit bills. This term has apparently evolved from a more general usage in which it referred to any money earned by unusual means. Perhaps this explains the rarely-used word "agio", which refers to profit gained from currency exchange, or the difference between a coin's face value and the value of its metallic content.

Of even greater interest was the word "bucks", which is, of course, is a modern slang term for American money. But it originated as a gambling term used to denote poker chips. Webster's Dictionary defines it as "an object used by a poker player as a marker for who has the deal, for the ante, etc." It can also be used as a verb meaning "to gamble, play, or take a risk against", or "to strive or compete for." This is related to the term "to buck the odds", and also the act of bucking; that is, "to resist or oppose obstinately"; or "to force a way through or proceed against an obstacle"; or "to strike with the head, or butt." These definitions all describe the actions of animals, including goats, whose young are called "bucks." These animals often "buck", as in "to leap with arched back and land with head low and forelegs stiff." Also, the skin of these animals is tough enough to act as a "buckler", or shield. Indeed, Zeus' Aegis was a buckler, and it was literally made from buckskin. One of Webster's Dictionary's definitions of "buck" was simply "buckskin." The hide of a goat itself could be referred to as "buck."

Appendix E: The Jack in the Box

As an aside related to Appendix D, I would like to note that the word "bucks" could also have been influenced by the source of the word "box." This word ultimately comes from the Latin word "pyx", which originally was a general term for any square container. This is why there is a star constellation called "Pyxis", in the same cluster as Argo and Columba. In fact, Pyxis is the mariner's box inside the Argo ship. But over time, the word "box" took on a more general meaning, while "pyx" retained two very specific definitions.

The first definition of "pyx" is, according to Webster's Dictionary, "The box or vessel in which the reserved Eucharist or Host is kept" for Communion in a Catholic church. This practice of keeping the host inside of a pyx led in a strange way to the development of the term "jack-in-the-box." It was originally a term of derision used by Protestants to make fun of the idea that the Communion wafer actually contained the body of Christ. It implied that it was not Christ, but a "jack", or demonic spirit, which inhabited the wafer These associations are still present in the modern children's toy called the "jack-in-the-box", which expresses the idea of a magical imp living inside of a box, like a genie in a bottle.

Based on its association with the Protestant-perceived illusory nature of the Communion and Eucharist rites, the phrase "jack-in-the-box" evolved. As Robert Nares wrote in his 1905 Glossary of Words, Phrases, Names, and Allusions, by 1570, the term "jack-in-the-box" was used to refer to a thief "who deceived tradesmen by substituting empty boxes for others full of money." The term could also refer to substitute items placed in the box to fool the victim further. Thus, “jack” came to refer to counterfeit money, and also to the act of theft or fraud. This is yet more evidence of a relationship between the words “jack” and “check”, for in those times it was always necessary to “check” your money box after completing a deal, to make sure you had not gotten “jacked.”

This brings me to the second modern definition of the word “pyx”, again according to Webster’s Dictionary: “a chest or mint, in which specimen coins are reserved for trial by weight and assay.” This definition, referring to the testing of coins to see if they have been counterfeited or debased, stems from around 1350, the post-Templar era in which Italian mercantilism was beginning to spring up. The “Pyx Chamber” at Westminster Abbey in London was also built in the 1300s, for this very purpose. There the tools and records of the national Exchequer were kept, along with boxes of coins that awaited the “Trial of the Pyx”: a public demonstration of the purity of the metal content in the nation’s currency.

Appendix F: Casting a Fortune

Returning to the subject of gambling discussed in Appendix D, I find it peculiar that the term "casting a fortune" is always associated with divination, but the word "fortune" can also mean "luck" or "good chance." Yet the word "fortune", when used by itself, is associated with wealth. This is, in a sense, fitting, since chance, represented by the Wheel of Fortune, is the essential element in some forms of divination, as well as in gambling, which is always an attempt to gain wealth. Thus, many techniques used in divination are also used for gambling. Many of the same elements used in divination can also be used for conjuration, or casting a spell. Indeed, "casting a spell" and "casting a fortune" may at one time have meant the same thing.

I discussed previously that playing cards were the inspiration for the Tarot. Each card in the Minor Arcana of the Tarot corresponds to a playing card, and before Tarot was even invented, playing cards were used in a form of divination known as "cartomancy." Furthermore, both playing cards and chess are thought to have evolved from a game played in ancient India (now modern Afghanistan) that involved both a chessboard, and tokens made out of animal skin which resembled modern playing cards. The game was played mainly for gambling purposes. These things are discussed in greater detail in my article "Work with the Square and Compass", which was published in the book The Arcadian Mystique: The Best of Dagobert's Revenge Magazine (Dragon Key Press, 2004).

The Catholic Church has traditionally prohibited gambling games, mainly because, in the ancient world, the tokens used in the games often represented gods that were invoked for good luck, and the pieces were believed to be enchanted with Satanic spells. Playing cards in particular were anathema, due to their association with divination. Both Tarot and playing cards were referred to by the Church as "the Devil's picture books."

But long before the Roman Church banned gambling, the licentious and pagan Rome of antiquity did also, for the simple reason that the men of the city had become so obsessed with it that they could no longer be persuaded to engage in useful work. The practice was only allowed during the week-long festival known as Saturnalia, beginning on December 22, which is, interestingly, the onset of the astrological period of Capricorn – the House of the Goat. (I should note here that the Federal Reserve was created at the beginning of Saturnalia, on December 23, 1913.) During this festival, the participants would each wear a conical Phrygian hat, which they called a "liberty cap." This hat was traditionally worn by slaves who had been freed, but in this instance it symbolized a Roman citizen's freedom to indulge himself in gambling and other pleasures during Saturnalia. The liberty cap was later taken on as ritual garb by the Bavarian Illuminati, a politically radical French Masonic offshoot created in 1776 (the same year as the American Revolution), which is believed by historians to have influenced the French Revolution. "Liberty cap" is now also the name of a type of psychedelic mushroom

Although the Romans banned gambling except during Saturnalia, they did not succeed in curtailing it completely. Before these games had been played in the streets, but when they were banned, many players simply formed private men's clubs, and moved the gaming tables indoors. These clubs often had special passwords for admittance, and oaths of secrecy for the members. The association between gambling and secret societies has persisted throughout history. Gambling was a vice which the Knights Templar were known for. Even today, poker nights are one of the most commonly held events at Masonic lodges and other private men's clubs. It is also popularly associated with more sinister, underworld organizations like the Italian mafia, as mobsters often own or control gambling casinos.

Appendix G: The Root of All Evil

Pertaining to Appendix F, the truth, in part, is that gambling has historically been considered sinful because money itself has always had infernal connotations. Even in the pre-Christian era, before the love of money was declared "the root of all evil" by Jesus, the desire for much gold and silver was always thought to be the worst form of greed, a deadly sin. The concept of money has been associated since ancient times with figures which we would now consider to be synonymous with the Devil. The Roman god of the underworld, Plutus, was also the god of wealth, and was depicted on coins holding the Cornucopia. Also, recall the message of Freemason Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Faust, a play about a man who sells his soul to Satan in exchange for ultimate wisdom. One of the bits of wisdom which the Devil gave to the title character was the secret to alchemy, which in this instance turned out to be the printing of paper fiat currency.

Today, spells to acquire money make up the majority of the activities engaged in by modern Satanists and neo-pagans, and like Faust, people often attempt to sell their souls in order to gain it. Even the Queche Indians of the Bolivian Andes, who work in the silver mines there and were converted to Catholicism long ago, perform sacrificial offerings to the Devil and his wife, whom they call "El Tio" and "China Supay", in order to earn monetary rewards. They mainly sacrifice cigarettes, alcohol, and cocaine to their demonic idols, earning, they believe, small and random boons of cash from the universe. To get the big payoffs, they say, you have to sacrifice an animal or a human, and only the real Devil-worshippers do that. This, they believe, is how their corporate bosses got to own the silver mines that these Indians slave in every day. To them, the association between money and the Devil is intrinsic, for they see cash as still being tied to gold and silver, which are mined from the Earth's fiery nether regions – the Devil's domain.

In the Bible, the invention of metallurgy is credited early on in Genesis to the figure of Tubal-Cain. He was among the accursed race of Cainites, descended from the world's first murderer, Cain, who killed his own brother. Thereafter, he was cursed to be a "fugitive and a vagabond" for the rest of his days. Cain himself was the inventor of agriculture, described in Genesis as "a tiller of the ground." His name, which appears in the histories of many other ancient Semitic cultures besides the Hebrew, has contributed to the formation of words in English and other languages that mean "grain", "corn", "bread", or "cane." But in Hebrew, "Cain" meant "to acquire, to create, to fashion, to produce, or to accomplish" – much the same meaning that the Egyptians gave their wedjat eye symbol. When used as a noun, it meant "smith"; that is, "one who makes things." Thus it seems easy to say that "Cain" is at the root of the word "coin." For in addition to being a noun indicating a metallic token, "coin" can also be used as a verb, meaning "to invent." The noun "coin" is derived from the verb definition, for a coin is an object that has been "coined."

Both Cain and his descendant Tubal-Cain are portrayed in Judeo-Christian literature as evil geniuses, too smart for their own good. There is something sinister about their accomplishments (the invention of agriculture and metallurgy), and of their selfish desire to create things, no matter how wonderful those creations may be. This is fitting, for in the same Book of Genesis in which the story of Cain appears, we read about two other seemingly positive acts: the obtaining of ultimate wisdom from the Tree of Knowledge (Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden), and the building of a magnificent tower leading to Heaven (the Tower of Babel). Both of these acts were portrayed in the Bible as sins punishable by death. The message of Genesis (a word that means "creation") is that creating things is God's job, not Man's. Therefore mankind has no need to learn the principles of creation. This was a Judaic concept that the Catholic Church took and ran with, adding in its own new rules restricting free thought, science, and learning, which they considered to be threatening. In this world-view, at the extreme end of it, the invention of money could be seen as one of man's most audacious acts: creating something and declaring it to have a particular value, from which the value of everything else in the world can be measured. So it makes sense that money itself would seem inherently deviant in the traditional judgment of Catholicism. In a way, money is intrinsically a Faustian symbol of Man's rebellion against God in his quest for more knowledge of the world and control of his surroundings.

The other biblical passage which most clearly associates money with evil is found in The Revelation of St. John the Divine, 13:16-18, where this prophesy is made regarding the Antichrist:

And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads: And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Here is wisdom*. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is* Six hundred threescore and six*…..*

Curiously, 666 is the exact number of talents of gold that King Solomon gained in tribute every year, according to II Chronicles 9:13. It is strange that he would receive exactly this many talents every year, rather than different amounts each year. Also, why such an odd number? And why does the text make a point of mentioning this particular number? Finally, why does the passage in Revelation state, prior to giving the number 666, that "Here is wisdom"? And why, after explicitly saying that this is the "number of the beast", does it then immediately also state that it is the "number of a man"? Could it be referring to the wisdom which the man King Solomon used to expand his fabled treasury? Could the number 666 somehow be a key to this wisdom?

Either way, the description here of needing a mark on one's hand in order to conduct business certainly brings to mind the aforementioned "Mason's mark" which, in the degree of Mark Master, must be pressed against your palm (and is symbolically engraved there) before you can receive your wages for helping to build Solomon's Temple. (In the real world, historically, stonemasons have engraved such personalized marks onto each brick they crafted, to identify their work.)

Appendix H: The National Treasure

In the 2004 movie National Treasure, the proposition is put forth that the Freemasons who founded the United States possessed the treasure from Solomon's Temple, as well as a large number of other treasures from around the world, which they had inherited from the Knights Templar. Supposedly they secreted this vast cache, mostly of gold, in a gigantic underground vault beneath the Trinity Church on Wall Street in New York.

In the film, the protagonist, Benjamin Gates (played by Nicholas Cage) discovers the treasure, which is shown to include tons and tons of gold, worth billions of dollars. They find it by following clues left on the back of the Declaration of Independence, as well as other places. But the process necessitates that Gates break a number of U.S. laws along the way. By the time he finds the treasure vault, he has already been captured by the police, and must make a deal with them in order to avoid a prison sentence. The negotiation is led by a policemen named Sadusky (played by Harvey Keitel), who, like Gates, is a Freemason. They end up making a gentleman's arrangement in which Gates agrees to give ninety percent of the treasure to the world's museums, while keeping ten percent, or the value thereof, for himself. Sadusky suggests that this is what the Masonic founders of America would have wanted, in the spirit of Masonic charity. In the final scene of the film, it is revealed that the discoverers of the treasure have only accepted one percent of the treasure's total value in compensation, rather than ten percent. So they were even more charitable to the world than they were required to be.

Clearly, this film contains a morality tale regarding the Freemasonic ideals of charity, and the concept of "a Mason's wages." The tithing concept is implied by the suggestion that the protagonist should keep only ten percent of the treasure. Specifically, it was more of a "reverse tithe", encouraged in some protestant churches today when a person has been particularly blessed by the Lord, and they are so wealthy that they can afford to give ninety percent of their income to the church. In this case, the characters reverse-tithed to the world on behalf of the United States, using the treasure of the Knights Templar, which includes the treasure of Solomon's Temple. It is implied cryptically in the film that this treasure was the original capital, the seed money, upon which the wealth of America is based. Why else would the screenwriter choose to locate the fictional treasure in a vault beneath Wall Street – the nation's main financial district.

But don't steal, because only assholes steal -- and the karma you'll suffer will be intense and long-reaching.

Why I Wrote This Book

I am not trying to convince anyone of anything. This is a book of my thoughts along the trail of a personal family mystery with definite historical connections and big historical implications. If you do not like speculation, stop reading this book right now. If you want to be told what to think, put this book down and forget about it. I wrote this book for my own reasons.

Many years ago, my dad served in the United States Air Force. Forty years later, I did, too. When I was a kid hearing his stories, I didn't know that I would. However, the thought would be seriously entertained twice before my actual entry into the service. This book is as much because of this mutual experience of military service as it is an attempt to share and possibly explain one of the most fascinating tales I've ever heard from someone close to me.

Who was my father?

Charles Bryan Bosley was born on 14 June 1936 in Parkersburg, West Virginia. He had two brothers at the time of his birth and one followed after. His father died when he was fourteen years old, his mother passed before I was born, in the following decade. With the passing of his oldest brother earlier this year, they are now all gone, or elsewhere perhaps. That brother also served in the US Air Force, so it seems to run in the family. Military service has been a part of both sides of my family since the American Revolution. I am not the descendant of Johnny-come-latelies of the late 19th Century immigrant waves.

Before my dad was in the air force, he was a school kid, a Boy Scout, and a sports enthusiast. He would grow up to be the best natural athlete I've ever personally known and that isn't hyperbole. The man could master any sport.

The story goes that when my dad finished high school, he was offered a partial scholarship from the Cincinnati Reds organization, via their farm league, but there just wasn't the money in his family to match it so he had to turn it down. That's a big reason he joined the US Air Force. Thus I grew up around the ball field watching him pitch softball games because he was the team's best pitcher, always, on every team for which he played.

My dad was also an excellent golfer with several trophies for winning company tournaments when he worked for Union Oil, including a couple of hole-in-one awards for tourney play. I witnessed a few more of those watching him play over the years.

One of my favorite of my dad's sports moments was in the early 1980s when we hit the course with his then brother-in-law, a big burly outgoing guy named Steve whose bluster was part of his annoying charm. I liked Steve because he was the first nearly complete asshole I had experienced as a friend and it was, admittedly, funny. But Steve had taken to golf and one day suggested to my dad that they play a round or two.

We may have gone to the Sam Snead course over in Rialto, I don't exactly recall. What I recall was Steve and his two golf buddies joining my dad and I, followed by the pre-play banter. Steve had been golfing six days a week for a few months or so. He was in his late twenties, my dad nearly fifty. Steve would dominate, just ask him. The bluster was full power. Then I watched my dad step up to the tee, commenting how rusty he was having not picked up a club in three years, and proceed to embarrass the hell out of Steve and the other younger guys. It was hilarious and I had quietly expected it because I had seen my dad golf. He was a natural.

My dad also managed Little League teams, including those I played on, one of them undefeated. One of his players was Ronnie Lott who went on to play football for the 49ers. Unlike several managers back then, my dad played every kid on the team in every game. He never benched kids to play other kids who might better ensure a win because his philosophy didn't allow that. Kids were there to play baseball, their parents wanted to see them play. He managed several winning teams, sometimes to much frustration of other managers who played only their perceived stars. My dad emphasized the basics and fair play.

But sports was not his only talent. I likewise never knew a better natural salesman than my father. When he worked for Union Oil, my dad started as a truck driver and was quickly brought inside to the commercial sales department. That isn't the retail side. Commercial sales is the side of the house that sells to companies with large fleets of vehicles, especially heavy equipment and tractor trailer vehicles. Commercial sales also required that he keep those clients buying from Union Oil and this is what my dad did with ease. Am I exaggerating because I'm his son?

In the early 1970s, Union Oil ran an in-house program for their salesmen. The top salesman in each division would win a big gold ring. We still have this ring in the family. It came with the Union '76' logo in the center of an onyx stone. If a salesman repeated this feat, the company would add a diamond. My dad won the ring the first year and added two diamonds the second and third years in a row. His division was pretty big, covering a chunk of Southern California and a portion of Nevada. The only reason he didn't win any more diamonds was because he left the company. My dad wore that ring nearly until the day he died. Like in sports, he was an honest salesman, never relying upon anything but his knowledge of the product and its true value to the customer's application of it. Imagine that.

My dad did everything with the assumption that he would do his best to get it done right. He did the landscaping on two houses we lived in, designing patios and lawn irrigation layouts and fencing and such, then building and installing them himself, down to the cement finishing and planting shrubs and flowers. It all looked professionally done, too.

How the hell would I live up to that?

Yet my dad wasn't perfect. He screwed up a twenty year marriage to my mom with his philandering. I have two other sisters out there, one of whom I've talked to on the phone once many years ago and another whom I've never met. The first one is the reason we left West Virginia when I was just a couple of years old or so. My mom was understandably pissed off so we returned to California where my older sisters and I had been born. My dad was a solid provider but he liked side tail just enough to mess up a good thing. This might be a contributing factor to my opposite position on such matters; I don't cheat. One woman at a time is difficult enough to deal with (and no longer worth the trouble of a formal relationship, for me).

An issue with my dad that is most pertinent to this book was his moodiness. My childhood and youth involved days when the family had to walk on eggshells sometimes depending upon Dad's mood. Do not interpret this through the filter of an explosively violent father image, because it wasn't like that[1]. It was usually more of a pissy attitude and expecting everyone to do things the way he wanted it done, when he was in that mood. Or it was everyone subduing their good time because Dad was having a bad one. We could be at Disneyland, for Christ's sake, and my dad could suddenly be displeased with something. It was ridiculous, really.

But this didn't happen most of the time, it happened some of the time. They didn't call it that back then, but you could say my dad was likely bipolar.

He hit my mom a couple of times, only once that I can remember when I was a little kid but it happened two other times that I am aware of. He also went off on one of my sister's pretty hard when she was being a provocative pain in the ass (her nature then) and would have likely hurt her bad had not my uncle stepped in and stopped him. These are among the episodes that get unremembered or denied in my family but they happened. I am compelled to relate this private stuff to you the reader because the rest of this book may relate to this issue with my dad.

The reader is making a mistake if you think I excuse my dad's errant behavior. I am a former federal criminal investigator, able to remain objective at the flip of a switch. I'm also trained and experienced in the techniques and art of the 'subject interview'. In dealing with a criminal suspect, especially one you have an overwhelming preponderance of evidence on or have personally witnessed his crimes, you question in a manner which requires playing the role of the 'understanding guy'. It's called 'running a theme' and I truly enjoy it -- it's effective.

Running a theme on a perpetrator requires understanding the basic working of his or her mindset, i.e. their personal logic. I like doing that to someone, if I can get them across the table from me. It requires objective control of emotional responses to their misdeeds and is so satisfying when you've nailed them of their own accord.

More specifically, I was a counterintelligence agent and then a counterespionage case officer. Hunting and running spies requires an even deeper level of understanding the perp because these guys are usually much smarter than your average criminals, most of whom are simply stupid and sometimes brutal assholes. You have to set aside the emotion and judgment to do your job and that requires an objective look at the subject, if you hope to optimize your chance of nailing him or her.

This book requires I take an objective look at my dad. Of course, my father was not a criminal but he demonstrated asshole behavior at times. I can't let the fact that he was my dad cloud my analysis. I am taking the time to explain all this because there is something in this story directly relevant to his moods and behavior.

Still, I liked my dad. When my parents split up, I was the only one who had anything to do with him for a while, which earned me much ire at times from my mom and sisters. They conveniently forget and deny this, when asked. I didn't approve of his shenanigans but that was between he and my mom and wasn't my fault nor my burden. Besides, I had my mind on other things as, not long before they split up, I had experienced something of an enlightenment or awakening and it was life-changing at the time. The world had turned weird for me in a very personal way so my parents' drama seemed to have less impact than I might have expected.

That brings me back to the subject of this book. It was only a few years before my own strange experience that my dad first spoke to me and my sisters of the curious episode at the center of this book. My experience with synchronicity makes me wonder if there may have been a connection between the two events but that's another story. I recall his story being the most mystifying thing I had ever heard in my family, that and my mom's tales of ghosts and spook lights in Alabama and Georgia. Say what you will of folks from the South and Appalachia, there's some deliciously weird things going on there and I eat that stuff up. It's in my blood.

Which brings me to my dad's childhood and youth.

He was born in the Ohio Valley territory now known for Mothman[2] and the eerie presence of Indrid Cold. As I have written elsewhere, I have a personal connection to this lore. Shortly after I was born. we lived in this area for a few years around the time the Mothman stuff was first going on. We lived there again for two years in the early 1970s and by that time Indrid Cold was a delightfully prevalent bogeyman used by adults to make sure their kids were home from the woods before dark. That was in Mineral Wells and we lived in my uncle's trailer park, not far from where Mr Cold was first encountered. Some of my fondest memories are of this lore.

In light of what has been said, written and considered about the Mothman and Indrid Cold lore around Parkersburg and Mineral Wells, might something in my father's youth have played any role in the strange encounter featured in this book? There absolutely could be, I am convinced. Though you will see that there are differing ways of looking at my dad's episode, the high strangeness of the Ohio Valley area he grew up in reflects upon both of them.

I think my dad's story deserves to be told and shared. I grew up with it and, as I entered into service in various national defense agencies of the US intelligence community, learned more about it from other sources. It may also be useful to have other minds on the story to possibly see another perspective, or perhaps to illuminate further information. Something did indeed happen to my dad, but what exactly?

Many of my best memories of my dad seem to congregate around Sunday afternoons. This was usually when he had finished a weekend landscaping project and was admiring his work. To this day, I cannot walk into a hardware store and not be reminded of visits to lumber yards with my dad. The smell of a hardware store, especially the lumber, is heavenly to me and I love it. Relics also embody memories of my dad. Things like flat bladed shovels and leather work gloves remind me of him.

Baseball[3], Bonanza and beer in quart size bottles bring the memories back, too, along with small glass bottles of soda pop like those he would buy for me when I rode along with him on his job. Among the best are the horror movies at drive-in theaters, a lifelong love that I have passed down to my son who now writes and directs horror films. My dad loved spooky movies about the strange and mysterious, which now doesn't surprise me. All these things swirl around the edges of the thing that I have come to suspect was at the heart of what defined him, for better or worse. He tried but could only partially convey them.

It was before I was born when my father was in the United States Air Force. Military service brought him to California and my sisters and I would be born here. He was assigned to a tactical base in the desert outside of old Victorville and his unit was involved in the classified world of space science in its heady wonder days. To a young man from West Virginia, I imagine my dad driving along the dark desert highway toward the shimmering light ahead.

He had no idea what was coming.

Then she lit up a candle and she showed me the way,
There were voices down the corridor...

CHAPTER ONE

Up ahead in the distance
I saw a shimmering light
My head grew heavy and my sight grew dim...

-- Don Henley & Glenn Frey

I was told the story in segments over the course of four decades:

I recall the first discussion being in the spring or summer of 1974. My family was living in West Virginia and my dad had pulled out his old magazines which included the now classic Look and LIFE issues[4] on UFOs. I recall it was one of those Sunday afternoons mentioned previously because I have a memory of looking at the color funny pages that day and those were featured only in the Sunday newspaper.

During a discussion on what UFOs might be, he vaguely alluded to having learned about something that crashed in the New Mexico desert years before he was in the air force. He suggested that it might have been from another world. Imagine my intrigue.

The next time I recall it coming up was during a TV show about UFOs sometime in 1975, after we had returned to California. I had recently seen the Sun Classic Pictures' release of The Outer Space Connection[5]. Again, my father alluded to the possibility that something from another world had crashed in New Mexico. By this time, my sisters and I had many times heard his stories about his days at George AFB and of Chuck Yeager, Scott Crossfield, Iven Kincheloe and the altitude chamber.

When Columbia Pictures released Steven Speilberg's Close Encounters of the Third Kind[6] a couple of years later, I was hooked on the UFO mystery. Between the popularity of the film and the growing number of UFO related shows on television in the year or so leading up to it, our family could not avoid the discussion. Again my dad alluded to the crash in New Mexico and this time he said that what had crashed was a small craft, and there was an additional detail: He said the people aboard the craft were not like the aliens that had begun to appear in UFO stories, certainly not like the little beings in Spielberg's film.

How did he know? Because he had seen the bodies at Wright-Patterson AFB in the late 1950s, he said.

The next time we had a significant conversation about the subject was in 1980 when I discovered William Moore's and Charles Berlitz' book The Roswell Incident. I showed the book to my dad but he merely glanced through it, more insistent that the beings on the craft were not little aliens, rather they were like us and virtually hairless. He also said there was nothing to fear from these beings. And, he added, the 1947 incident in New Mexico was not the only time such a thing had happened.

Six years later, I was revisiting everything I had learned about the UFO phenomenon to that time. It was in the spring of 1986 when I sat down with all my UFO books and re-examined them, coming to a new and unexpected personal insight: There was something very earthly going on with this stuff. At the time, my suspicion was that secret military technology might indeed explain much of the reports. I was certainly not the first guy to consider that idea but for me it was eye-opening in its implications. I thought of my what my dad had been saying over the years about the Roswell case. He could very well have learned something about it while in the air force.

By this time, my mentor had begun to work with me and I was hearing things from him that augmented what my dad had been saying about the 1947 New Mexico incident. Within two years, I would be reporting for duty with the FBI[7], and just a few years after that would come the next major leap forward in my dad's tale.

Wilson

In 1991 my father was hospitalized for a blood clot. I was working in New York as a counterintelligence specialist for the FBI and flew out on short notice, that's how concerned we were for his life. Naturally, being the one who lived farthest away, by the time I could quickly get a flight to California, and drive directly from the airport, he had made it through the danger zone. He was still heavily sedated when I walked into his hospital room.

It was the next day when I was alone with him for a couple of hours that my dad started muttering about a 'crystal house' and a man getting killed. He seemed agitated. And then he mentioned the name for the first time: Wilson.

At the time I had no idea who this Wilson was or what his significance might have been. My sisters came into the room just moments after he was saying this stuff so I didn't press him and said nothing to them about it. I did call my mentor as soon as I got to a phone at my mom's house.

"Was there anyone else in the room when he was talking about Wilson?" he asked.

I told him there was not. The nurse was at the station and I was alone with my dad.

"Good," he said, "Keep him off that subject when anyone else is around, if you can."

I asked about Wilson.

"We'll talk about Wilson when I see you next time." That was how the conversation ended.

And we did. I will go into that later in this book. For now, the next time my dad and I discussed his tale at length was after I had become an officer in the air force and had been working at an even higher Top Secret clearance than I had carried while working for the FBI. By this time, I knew more about his tale than he realized I did. I had also been encouraged to get him to talk about it.

And so it was that in 2004 my dad told me in greater detail what he recalled about his strange experience in 1958.

The Time Has Come To Tell The Tale

My father was TDY in Alabama when he and two other guys, whom he never did identify to me, were selected for a project and boarded a military aircraft bound for a base in Texas.

Following departure from Montgomery, presumably from his assigned TDY location of Gunter AFB[8], the plane turned north somewhere over Mississippi or Louisiana. That's when an intelligence officer, whom my dad later identified as 'Major Knight', emerged from the forward cabin and informed the trio that they were actually headed to Wright-Patterson AFB in Ohio. My dad said they were told that documentation in their personnel files would backstop the cover story of a flight to Texas[9].

Shortly after arrival at WPAFB, the trio was briefed on what happened with the so called Roswell Incident of 1947. According to my father, the crash did not actually happen in Roswell and he insisted that it was not an extraterrestrial craft. The airmen were shown crash debris, including the now legendary foil-like material that could be balled-up and retain its original shape. As many have since, my dad also said this material could not even be marked by extreme heat. They were also shown bodies which they were told were recovered from the crash.

My dad said the bodies were human and did not have much if any hair. Neither did they have over-sized heads nor big eyes. My dad insisted they were not big but neither were they three feet tall. He was always amused when the popular 'greys' were associated with this crash, insisting the recovered bodies were not the little aliens so many others had claimed of them. My dad was told that these 'other' people meant us no harm. As he conveyed his story, he expressed concern that a cover story of extraterrestrials had been employed to serve some agenda other than national security.

According to my dad, in that classified 1958 briefing, they were told a Roswell type of incident had happened again.

Following the briefings and mission orientation period at WPAFB, my dad and the other guys were next sent to Arizona, specifically to an underground facility in the vicinity of Winslow. The trio of airmen were assigned to a special project being led by a scientist named Wilson who delegated them to an ongoing search-and-rescue operation because, they were told, this time there was a survivor.

According to my dad, at some point in his service he had been trained to fly small helicopters in unusual places, specifically in vast subterranean spaces and through large tunnels. This training played a role in the effort to retrieve the lost crewman of the downed craft -- which my dad insisted was not a spacecraft, i.e. not of extraterrestrial origin.

They were briefed that the occupant of the downed craft was lost and 'his people' wanted him back. This time US authorities had been contacted by these people -- the owners of said craft -- asking for assistance. My father said that he and other personnel were told that these people made it clear they were not interested in regular contact with our society but they did want assistance in this matter.

More specifically, they were told that the humans involved with this craft came from inside the planet, their civilization existing in expansive subterranean areas connected by tunnels, and that they went underground thousands of years ago due to some catastrophe. He also spoke of a group of blind people associated with this underground civilization, and these blind ones had developed their other senses very keenly. It was some of this group whom my father and his teammates unexpectedly encountered.

One member of my dad's team was killed during this particular incident. The man was neutralized by a tubular hand-held device which allegedly worked by the wielder using psi powers. It is at this part of the story that my dad would always display emotion, as he described a living man suddenly 'switched off' by the simple device, dead before he hit the ground. This appeared to truly distress my father and it is here the story always ended.

Until the year before he died.

In July of 2007, my father was brutally and senselessly attacked by a former employee. As usual, another unworthy human being who blaming drugs for his criminal misdeeds had assaulted the innocent. Beaten in his sleep, my dad went into a coma for a few weeks. He would never recover and spent the remaining eleven months of his life in hospitals. For a period of two months after waking from a coma, he was himself and able to communicate -- and that's when he began to tell me more.

I would visit my dad when my sisters couldn't be there so that he and I could discuss the underground project. He spoke of a technology transfer program in which we gave this other civilization a small craft he referred to as 'The Zipper', a small frame aircraft he said was designed by and for the US Air Force. But that moniker was also informally attached to the F-104 Starfighter[10] so I had to assume his injuries had scrambled things up by this time. He also told me more of Wilson and having met him before, specifically in 1957 in the Mojave Desert away from George AFB, where the scientist and his genius elder demonstrated large square remote-controlled platforms which utilized anti-gravity. What else he told me about Wilson bears no impact on this book.

What was I to do with this information my dad shared after the assault? Throw all of it in the trash? The problem with doing that is what I later learned about the Wilsons and their technology. I've decided to keep it in the mix with the caveat regarding the Zipper issue. I will let the reader decide for him or her self.

At any rate, it came to an end when a meddling family member convinced my dad that he did not need to talk to me and so he stopped. In fact, my dad said little more to me other than hello after that, ultimately slipping into another coma from which he did not wake. I have learned that ignorant fear runs deep. That was the sad state of affairs when my dad's life ended.

So let's go back to 1958 when, following his release from the Arizona assignment, my dad took my mom to California where they got married in Victorville and he returned to duty at George AFB. A few months later, my dad left active duty earlier than scheduled. My mom always thought his discharge was to get an early start on a GI Bill college education -- but she doesn't recall my dad ever enrolling in classes anywhere.

I was told by a source in the intelligence community that my dad was discharged from the air force early as a result of what happened during his experience underground, thus the early release to attend school was possibly the most likely administrative code that was used to cover the true reason.

And there you have it. Another strange story as so many others have told in the milieu of Roswell and weird America in the post WW2 era. Only this one does not involve extraterrestrials, at the insistence of the man telling it.

Whether it's true or not, or whether I can verify any of it, is why I wrote this book. I can tell you that between hearing that story and what you're reading here, my opinion has changed as to what the truth might more likely be. But before we get there, let's go back to what we know, take it apart and see what we find.

CHAPTER TWO

Souls of men dreaming of skies to conquer Gave us wings, ever to soar!
-- Robert MacArthur Crawford

A consideration of whether any of my dad's story is true must begin with his military service. Let's look at the facts of my father's claim to have been in the military.

Was Charles Bosley actually in the USAF?

My dad entered the United States Air Force in Fairmont, West Virginia on 4 March 1955 with the assigned rank of Airman Basic.[11]

What about Gunter AFB?

My dad was there.

According to the DD214 issued to Staff Sgt Charles B. Bosley, with an Honorable discharge date of 24 December 1958, he was twice sent to Gunter AFB: first in 13 June-9 August 1955 and again from 30 June-13 August 1958. I can not only place him there, I can also provide the purpose of his being there. The first time was for advanced training following basic, specifically attending the Apprentice Physiological Training Specialist course at the Gunter Branch of the School of Aviation Medicine. This was roughly two months after completion of his basic training, during which time he had reported to his duty station, George AFB in Victorville, California.

The second time of record that my dad was at Gunter AFB was for the Physiological Training Supervisor course also at the School of Aviation Medicine[12]. This was the 1958 period of 30 June-13 August and it also happens to be when he met my mother who was working across the way on Maxwell AFB at the time. What she has told me about that time has been quite valuable to this book and I'll get to that later. For now, let's continue with the basics.

The reader should understand something about the DD214 form. It is a post WW2 creation and every service member is issued one upon discharge. This document is vital to the veteran as it provides proof of military service and much pertinent data as regards rank, specialty, assignment locations, professional training and accomplishments. It also states whether the service member received a discharge that is Honorable or otherwise. As stated already, my dad received an Honorable discharge. However, the DD214 is by no means a complete record of service and should not be mistaken for one.

For example, if you were to look at my DD214, you would see the official title of my specialty, my training courses, decorations and base assignments. You would see very basic descriptors of deployments and awards. What you would not see are specific cases or operations, nor would you see any TDY trips not relative to training nor overseas deployments that I took to various bases or cities or countries in the course of my duties as a Special Agent of the US Air Force Office of Special Investigations. Most of that remains sensitive and much of it is still classified. In fact, you should not find my personnel record in St Louis and you could not likely obtain a copy of it through normal channels, unless something has changed drastically[13]. I bring this up to illustrate that my dad, like all service members, did things during his active duty time that will never be gleaned from a DD214.

What the DD214 provides here is verification of my father's enlistment in the US Air Force and that he was indeed at Gunter AFB as he said. Let's proceed.

Did My Dad Ever Go To Wright-Patterson AFB?

Is there any reason to believe that my dad would have been sent up to Wright-Patterson in Ohio while in training at Gunter AFB?

Indeed there is. Following the establishment of the USAF School of Aviation Medicine, it was decided that the research laboratory at Wright-Patterson would handle all equipment and materiel issues and the school at Gunter would provide all training and measurement of personnel, relative to aviation physiology and medicine[14]. Where aviation medicine was concerned, Gunter and Wright-Patterson required a close operational relationship, especially where my father's specialty was concerned.

As stated earlier, my dad was a Physiological Training Specialist and was training to be a supervisor in this specialty at the time he claimed to have been sent to Wright-Patterson in Ohio, during the pertinent second TDY period in Alabama. What exactly does a Physiological Training Specialist do?

SSgt Bosley's Specialty & Wright-Patterson AFB

According to my father's GAFB Form 101, he was assigned to the Physiological Training Unit of the 4452d USAF Hospital, George AFB. This form describes his duties as follows: operation of a high altitude chamber and conducting inspections of aircraft oxygen systems and personal equipment such as helmets and masks, and performing maintenance on these items. There is another interesting tidbit added later to his job description but we will get to that soon enough. For those who require numbers, his AFSC Primary was 90132 and Control was 90152.

Therein lies the explanation for why a trip up to Wright-Patterson from Gunter makes perfect sense. Wright-Patterson's Physiological Research Unit developed and maintained the equipment side of the aviation medicine house where it concerned physiological training and operations. My dad's specialty required up-to-date expertise with said equipment to perform his duties. It makes perfect sense that during a training course to become a supervisory Physiological Training Specialist he would have to go to Wright-Patterson at some point. This establishes a logical connection to this important base in Ohio and my dad's work.

But remember, when he got on the plane in Alabama, he thought they were going to Texas. This part of his story simply cannot be dismissed. Why might my father and his colleagues have possibly been going to Texas?

The Texas Leg of the Story

Between the World Wars, the School of Aviation Medicine was established in Texas at Randolph Air Field. Following the war, certain training elements were transferred to Gunter AFB, specifically the Physiological Training Officers Course and all enlisted courses[15]. In 1958, when my dad would have been going there, Randolph AFB had assumed all training programs for pilots and crews[16]. This included the USAF Helicopter School[17] which comes into play later in this book and may explain why my father was initially headed that direction (and may have actually been there at some point).

There is even more reason to suspect Brooks AFB was the Texas destination suggested by my dad. USAF aviation medicine training had a history at Brooks prior to Randolph and regained that element in 1957 when the Texas headquarters of the School of Aviation Medicine returned and became associated with NASA and specifically Project Mercury.[18]

Project Mercury actually began under the US Air Force, the earliest publicly identified date being 1958, the year NASA took control of the program[19]. Accelerated in aftermath of response to the launch of the satellite Sputnik by the Soviet Union, Project Mercury's practical mission under NASA was to put a man in orbit. Redstone Arsenal in Huntsville, Alabama, center of US Army missile and space operations, would play its role in Mercury, and so would members of my dad's specialty.

My understanding has always been that it was at George AFB where my dad and his colleagues conducted ground tests of the Mercury pressure suit in the altitude chamber. This was, according to my father and an intelligence community source, the same silver colored suit used in the eventual flights. I will name my source 'Colonel Lundy'[20]. What my dad didn't tell me, Colonel Lundy did; mainly that he and his buddies got into trouble for photographing each other wearing the Mercury spacesuits. The photos were allegedly confiscated and they got their asses sternly chewed. The point is, if my dad was involved in ground testing the Mercury spacesuit, he would have had a reason for going to Texas relative to NASA and USAF involvement in the manned space program.

And there is another point to consider. If my dad was indeed involved in USAF manned space program support operations, he would have certainly held a rather high security clearance. He claimed this himself, and even told me the level. I will not repeat that specific information but I will tell you that it certainly exceeded Top Secret SCI, if true. He also told me about having to watch captured German film footage of altitude chamber tests from the years prior to WW2 as part of his training, which in the 1950s would have been strictly classified. If your radar hasn't blipped yet, it should have now, Paperclip students.

I'll get to the Germans soon enough, the point is to emphasize the level at which my dad's duties required access to classified material and information.

SUMMARY

I have demonstrated the following, based upon an official notarized DD214:

My father was indeed enlisted in the US Air Force.

I have positively identified his specialty

He was at Gunter AFB in the summer of 1958.

His specialty had a direct affiliation with Wright-Patterson AFB.

My father's specialty confirms that he could have been sent to Texas during his training in Alabama. I have also demonstrated why my father going to Wright-Patterson during this training makes sense.

So what does this mean?

What I have demonstrated thus far is that my dad's military credentials are solid. There is enough credibility in these facts to continue with this analysis.

Admittedly, this weird episode of his life is impossible to prove and I am not going to try. That isn't the purpose of this book. My intent here is to examine what he said and see what we find upon closer inspection.

Was what happened in New Mexico, the thing that became known as 'Roswell', a real event? Could my dad have been briefed on this event, whatever it was? Why continue with this analysis?

Because I'm curious and that's a good enough reason. So let's continue...

CHAPTER THREE

Sweet dreams and flying machines
In pieces on the ground
-- James Taylor

My dad always said that Wright-Patterson AFB played a role in the crash mystery. The stream of Roswell literature since 1980 says the same. There must have been a good reason.

Wright-Patterson AFB is the home of the 88 Air Base Wing and Air Force Materiel Command. In existence as two separate Army air corps air fields since 1917, Wright-Patterson became a combined base in 1948 when the US Air Force was created by the National Security Act of 1947. The base had always been a research and development center for US military air power and also played a role in the development of the US manned space program prior to and during the establishment of NASA. It is the Air Force Materiel Command wherein the mysterious secrets can be found.[21]

With that in mind, let's go back to 1958 when my dad said he was sent to Wright-Patterson to be briefed on what happened in the infamous, legendary and notorious Roswell Incident.

I'm going to assume that the overwhelming majority of readers of this book are familiar with the generalities of that which is 'Roswell'. We are told all the time that 'the bodies' and the pieces of the craft were flown to Wright-Pat where they were studied and the craft was reverse-engineered. Since I was first hearing about some of this from my father before the 1980 book by Moore and Berlitz, I have always recognized my dad's tale basically jibes with the circumstantial facts and even more so with the popular legend.

Unless my dad knew Stanton Friedman or his work before telling me his version, and I have no reason nor evidence that he did, I will proceed under the assumption that he wasn't lying or merely confused with something he might have seen on a TV show or read in a magazine or obviously in any of the subsequent books on Roswell. Wright-Patterson was where the bodies and material were sent according to my dad's version and in all others, so let's look at this base within the Roswell context.

The Wright Place?

So which specific units at Wright-Patterson in the late 1950s might have logically had custodianship of recovered alien bodies and their craft?

The Air Technical Intelligence Center (ATIC) was indeed present at WPAFB in 1958, the year in question[22]. ATIC was a field unit of the Assistant Chief of Staff for Intelligence and is known for analyzing captured or recovered foreign aircraft. It became the National Air and Space Intelligence Center, a tenant organization at WPAFB today. As an arm of Air Force intelligence, ATIC was also attached to certain requirements of Air Material Control Department and that brings us right back to AFMC, a host command of the base. This strongly suggests that the facts support the inclusion of Wright-Patterson AFB in the Roswell story.

So why would my father, a mere staff sergeant, be briefed in on such an important piece of information such as allegedly recovered bodies and a craft of unknown origin?

Need To Know

The answer to the above question is my dad's job in the Air Force, as described earlier: He conducted inspections of aircraft oxygen systems and personal equipment such as helmets and masks, and performed maintenance on these items; he also ran pilots through the altitude chamber and briefed them on the procedures. Such briefings included related aerospace medicine aspects of pilot training and evaluation. This specialty and the ground testing of the Mercury spacesuits would have logically attached him to classified USAF and NASA space program research and development, and that would most certainly provide the all important 'need to know'[23]. My dad's specialty was at the heart of these things.

With his need-to-know established, it becomes credible that my father could indeed have observed and studied the remains of alleged otherworldly travelers because it would provide much data invaluable to doing his job. How the environment through the mysterious craft flew and the subsequent crash particulars affected the physiology of the recovered bodies would be data critical to my dad's specialty.

And then I found something truly delightful.

A Significant Discovery

There was a little nugget of gold among my dad's official paperwork that even better argues his need-to-know about the recovered bodies.

You will recall the previously mentioned GAFB Form 101 which describes his job, including equipment maintenance duties. In the job description box at the bottom was added at some point in his career the following task, worded simply 'Casualty Collection Team # I' ('I' being '1') followed by 'Bldg # 630'.[24]

This made the investigator in me very happy. It's called 'evidence' and among the best kind. But evidence of what?

The Retrieval Link

Being on a casualty collection team meant that my father was involved in the retrieval of materiel and specifically bodies from crashes. This means to me that it is indeed possible for my dad to have viewed bodies retrieved from whatever might have crashed in New Mexico sometime after WW2. If it was determined to be a USAF space science and aviation medicine matter, it would be logical for air force doctors and aviation medicine specialists to be keenly interested in the effects of the crash on the victims' physiology. Whether a human physiology or one allegedly not ours, useful scientific data could be collected if the craft were indeed 'alien' aka foreign and capable of space flight, extraterrestrial or not.

I propose that my father's assignment on a casualty collection team lends credibility to his claim to have seen the alleged 'Roswell' crash bodies.

Intrigued with the discovery on my dad's GAFB Form 101, I hoped to learn more about this casualty collection team. There was a building identifier, for starters. Locating Building 630 may be impossible if it was located at George AFB, now inactive and deteriorating. Incidentally, that building number does exist at WPAFB, presently as a child care center. If 630 was indeed a building at George, I can fairly presume that it was a medical facility, for obvious reasons related to my dad's assignment. But I just don't know. It could also have been a staging area in a hangar.

Did my dad ever speak of casualty collections?

Over the years, he told me stories of the pilots who had crashed, and specifically of the death of Iven C. Kincheloe, Korean War fighter ace and test pilot who was killed at Edwards AFB on 26 July 1958 while my dad was back east. He had run Kincheloe through the altitude chamber on a few occasions and was acquainted with him. Kincheloe was the first man known to fly above 100,000 feet, earning him the brief nickname 'America's No 1 Spaceman'. Selected for the X-15 program, Iven Kincheloe was killed while ejecting from a malfunctioning F-104 over Edwards, victim of the not so brilliant idea of downward ejection employed in that model of aircraft at the time.

The Kincheloe story was one my dad would tell of crash retrieval activities even though he was not at Edwards when it happened. However, he would go to Edwards AFB in the course of his duties at George, something my mom distinctly remembers about the remaining days my dad had in the air force, after they got married. He also told a story about one gruesome crash after which he saw the deceased pilot's favorite scarf blowing across the ground on the flight line. I can't recall which pilot that was.

With the GAFB Form 101 positively identifying my dad with a crash retrieval team at his base, it could also have qualified him to pull the same duty at any USAF location. I say in this piece of data on the form we have enough corroboration to his story in this regard, slight as it may still seem to some (and it will, I assure you).

So what do we have regarding Wright-Patterson AFB that suggests my father was telling the truth about being taken there to be briefed on an 'alien' craft and its occupants? That the base would be the place for such aerospace materiel and information, and that my dad's duties would provide a double 'need to know' about recovered pilot or flight crew bodies.

Yet there is even more.

Wright-Patterson and the Roswell Legend

Let's look at 'The Roswell Incident' and see what is useful, if anything.

In the lore surrounding Roswell, we have Berlitz and Moore's presentation of a memo written by Meade Layne of the Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, obtained prior to writing the the 1980 Roswell Incident book in which the problematic secondhand testimony of Grady Barnett, as filtered through a Dr. Weisberg, cites a 'Description of the Aliens'.

The Layne memo states the bodies were seared by intense heat inside the craft and that an alleged autopsy demonstrated the occupant resembled a normal human body 'except in size'. In another part of the Moore-Berlitz book, Barnett is claimed to have said the bodies were also without hair. It goes on to state that the bodies and wreckage were put on a train to California and transported to Muroc (the base that became Edwards) and was then transported through Fort Worth before ending up at Wright Field (WPAFB), specifically in Building 18-A, Area B.

There's a lot there. First we have what appears to be corroboration of my dad's claim that the bodies recovered from the Roswell wreckage were human, including a reference to their size (which my dad said was smaller than the average human though not as small as the popular depiction of ETs) -- and that they were hairless, another detail my dad alleged. Then we have the bodies and craft being sent by train to Muroc (Edwards AFB) where it's all put on a plane and flown to Wright Field in Ohio. There is mention of 'unusual wreckage' being sent to Fort Worth. Here we have Wright-Patterson solidly in the lore by 1980, plus Texas bases which corroborate what we know about USAF aviation medicine history and my dad's background. My question about this part of the Barnett story is why would the US Army Air Corps place such an important retrieval on a train?

My only explanation for placing the bodies and wreckage on a train is that perhaps the guys calling the shots felt it would be more physically secure, but was a train was less likely to wreck than a plane was to go down? I'm sure one concern was to protect such valuable materiel. Yet the air corps transporting via rail instead of on one of their own airplanes remains curious nonetheless. They ultimately put debris on a plane to Ohio anyway. Why the train?

Also cited in the Moore-Berlitz book is the Barry Goldwater incident in which the senator, a reserve USAF officer, supposedly visited WPAFB where he asked his pal, General Curtis LeMay, if he could see the legendary 'Blue Room'. This room allegedly housed the Roswell bodies and debris. LeMay responded gruffly and shut down Goldwater's inquiry by telling the senator to never ask again. The point here isn't whether this tale is true or not, but to point out yet another inclusion of Wright-Patterson in Roswell lore.

Probably the best corroboration in placing Wright-Patterson in the mix of whatever Roswell was or is can be found in the FBI teletype dated 8 July 1947[25] in which it is stated that a disc and a balloon retrieved from a crash site 'near Roswell' New Mexico were being transported to Wright Field. This teletype was apparently sent from the FBI office in Dallas to the SAC in Cincinnati, Ohio, the nearest field office and just a half hour or so drive from Wright Field (WPAFB).

It should be noted that the original newspaper articles that stood as the only public documentation about the so called Roswell incident did not mention Wright Field. Only a reference to the retrieved materiel being flown to a 'higher headquarters' was mentioned in print by these sources. We can certainly assume that this would likely have meant Wright Field but the exclusion of any identifier beyond 'higher headquarters' makes my dad's statement that it was Wright-Patterson (Wright Field in 1947) a valid corroboration. I remind the reader that he told me this prior to the release of the Moore-Berlitz book, the first book on the subject.

Following the Moore-Berlitz book, we have Kevin Randle and Don Schmitt in their 1991 book UFO Crash At Roswell and Stanton Friedman and Don Berliner presenting information in their 1992 book Crash at Corona furthering a Wright-Patterson association with the recovered bodies and materiel from Roswell. These authors cite the in-depth analyses of the debris by the 'Air Material Command' the early incarnation of the aforementioned AFMC located at WPAFB since the 1940s.

Corso

In the 1994 book The Truth About the UFO Crash at Roswell, authors Kevin Randle and Don Schmitt present many alleged Roswell witnesses, among them one who claimed the bodies and wreckage were flown aboard a C-54 to Wright Field. It is with the subsequent 1997 book, The Day After Roswell by Colonel Philip Corso, that the Roswell tale notches up and further corroborates a Wright-Patterson connection.

I will be going deeper into the Corso material later in this book because it does bear a major impact on my dad's story and my tentative conclusions -- regardless of the issues raised about Corso's credibility and the credibility of the entire Roswell milieu. There remains, in spite of all the revelations of lies and deceptions associated with the Roswell witnesses and legend, something quite valid -- and very unpopular -- in Corso's tale that resonates directly with my dad's account and his air force service. It will also return us to Wright-Patterson AFB.

In a final note to tie up the assertion that the famed Ohio base would serve as a center for government focus on the mystery of UFOs and who flies them, I share with you the words of Olavo Fontes of the Aerial Phenomena Research Organization in 1958:

"Only the persons who work on the problem know the real situation: intelligence officers in the Army, Navy, Air Force; some high ranking officers in the High Command; the National Security Council and a few scientists whose activities are connected with it; and a few members of certain civilian organizations doing research for military projects."

Intelligence officers, scientists, and military research: all at Wright Patterson for decades. And there's that year again:1958, the year my dad says the events examined in this book happened.

SUMMARY

In this chapter I have demonstrated that Wright-Patterson AFB is indeed the location where all things 'Roswell' would end up for analysis and exploitation: WPAFB has the pertinent intelligence and research units.

I have also demonstrated that my dad was assigned to a 'casualty collection team' which is another way to say crash retrieval and certainly could have included said function. Through casualty collection duties, my dad is further linked to the interests of Wright-Patterson in a case of 'foreign technology' crash retrieval.

Wright-Patterson is linked to the crash report in an FBI memo, not to mention the thirty years or so of Roswell lore and literature.

So with it reasonably demonstrated that my dad was what he said he was and likely might have had to go to Wright-Patterson AFB which is positively associated with the 'Roswell' issue, we can continue this analysis. We can proceed to the weirdest part of my dad's tale.

As we move on, consider next what Bruce Rux writes in Architects of the Underworld (Frog, 1996):

"The government began investigating the possibility that the race behind the unknown spacecraft was one parallel to our own, and connected to human life from antiquity, no later than 1958."

Again that year my dad claimed his encounter with the hidden 'lost race' occurred. Where is this idea coming from and why did they specifically begin to consider the idea of a parallel race in 1958?

Let us now follow the rabbit to the mysterious and exotic land called Arizona...

CHAPTER FOUR

A bolt of fear went through him
As they thundered through the sky...
-- Hughie Thomasson

Pinpointing exactly when my father would have been in Arizona, according to the specifics of his story, is difficult even as a simple exercise for the sake of this discussion.

My assumption, based on the order in which he told me the events happened, has been that he was sent to Arizona immediately following the briefings and revelations at Wright-Patterson AFB. However, that may not be the case.

When Could It Have Happened?

I spoke with my mother about this on numerous occasions because she met my dad while he was in Alabama in that summer he says this all happened for him. She worked at Maxwell AFB across town from Gunter. Montgomery was her birthplace, and home at that time. She provided more detail essential to my understanding of my dad's time there.

My parents met on the Fourth of July, 1958. After a whirlwind romance, they were married in Victorville, California, on 19 August. Since my dad did not finish the course at Gunter until 13 August, this left little time between the end of the training TDY and their wedding in California. My dad's car at the time was a 1957 Chevy Bel Air. My mom rode with him on the drive back to California in that car, as verified by her, which means he had driven it to Alabama in the first place. She verified that he had bought the car from his commander at George AFB. My dad always kept his cars in immaculate condition and my mom said it was a very comfortable drive even with the multiple passengers (her mother, my dad's colleague and his wife).

In that car, they departed Alabama on the 14th of August, driving at a reasonable yet steady pace that put them in Victorville on the 17th, according to my mom. She recalls they had a full day before the wedding which was on the 18th. With the six days accounting for the completion of the course in Alabama, the cross-country drive, and their wedding in California identified, we can now look at the days of the training course period.

The TDY at Gunter AFB

With 30 June being the start date, that means my dad likely checked in to Gunter AFB no later than 29 June, but he could have arrived earlier because we don't know when he left George AFB or where he may have stopped en route to Alabama -- and this may be very significant. For now, let's start with that arrival date.

If he was there for a training course, typically my dad would have had to attend lectures and likely participate in lab simulations. Knowing the dates of the apprentice course he took in 1955, we observe on his DD214 that the supervisory course period was forty five days, twelve days shorter than the prior course he also attended at Gunter. Based upon my experience with military training, the apprentice course more likely required daily attendance for the full period of fifty seven days because he was first learning the job. But the supervisory training offers some marginal wiggle room, in my opinion.

Clearly my father had been doing the physiological training specialist job for about three years by the time he arrived at Gunter for the second course[26]. He didn't need to learn that job all over again. What about being a supervisor required 45 days of training?

As a military officer, I was a supervisor. Having already received military management training as a 120-day wonder via OTS, my supervisor training when I took over the branch at my detachment at Wright-Patterson was being shown the forms we used in our specialty (and I had already been trained on those at the specialty training course). My point is, I did not attend a supervisory training course to become chief of the branch.

Not only was I the supervising officer, I was also a federal agent involved in running operations and espionage casework as it came up. The administrative tasks of running that branch were not so excessive, even with additional duties, that I could not be expected to be operational. I bring this up to illustrate a point: You could have fit a supervisory training course for that portion of my job into five days and I was the officer in charge of a sensitive and critical operations branch with plenty of reporting requirements aside from the field work.

However, I must acknowledge that my father was not an officer[27] and the USAF may administratively have considered me 'trained in management' by virtue of (snicker) Officer Training School.[28]

I doubt that my dad and his colleagues needed 45 days of endless instruction to be a supervisory specialist in a job they had already been doing for a few years. Taking my dad's story at face value, I propose two things: The briefing at Wright-Patterson and the alleged trip to Arizona took place during the training course period.

My mom does not recall my dad being away from Alabama between the day they met and the day they departed together for California. She recalls seeing him a lot during that time but she does acknowledge there could have been a period of a day or two when they might not have seen each other during the weekdays. We can still work with this, if her memory serves correctly. Keep in mind, though, that she worked at Maxwell and he was working at Gunter.

Briefing Trip to WPAFB: There And Back Again

The trip to Wright-Patterson from Gunter could easily have happened over the course of two days. They could have boarded the plane on a day he saw my mom prior to departure. He could have been in place in Ohio for the next two days and nights and then returned the following day and easily seen my mom that night. Though four days are involved, there are only two in this scenario that my mom would not have seen him, thus fitting her recollection. But was two days enough?

Recall that my dad claimed to have been briefed in on what really happened in New Mexico in 1947, i.e. events popularly associated with the Roswell incident. How long could that have reasonably taken?

The way these things work is that they bring you in, sit you down, make you sign papers and then they lay it on you. I can imagine being told that a hidden civilization of humans had crashed their strange craft in New Mexico takes all of an hour when you factor in what little background might have been known along with the details of the crash, retrieval, witness data and so forth. The next hour could easily suffice for looking at bodies in a SCIF type of vault. It would be the aerospace medicine analysis and intelligence assessment that might take up the lion's share of time. Factor in breaks and any transport across the base, plus an hour at the chow hall. Don't forget Q&A and discussion. That fills one day.

I make an educated guess that the entire next day could likely have been devoted to briefings on the situation that according to my dad had freshly happened in Arizona. Follow that with instructions on what their role would be in the retrieval. Once done, my dad and his colleagues would be on a plane the next morning and back in Alabama in time for lunch at Gunter.

This scenario I've proposed for the WPAFB leg of my dad's tale would account for all of four days, if we're going with my mom's best recollection that she did not see him for more than a couple of days at a time. Now consider the possibility that her memory is way off and he was actually gone for a week and we have plenty of time for the trip to Ohio.

Fitting Wright-Patterson into my dad's 1958 training period at Gunter AFB is easy, but not so much the Arizona trip. I can't help but see this as a longer period than just a few days. The logistics alone add up to more time.

Arizona

Let us say for conversation's sake that what my dad told me about the Arizona episode happened in the period of a week. Let's say that after Ohio he and his colleagues were flown to eastern Arizona. That flight and the arrival processing would suck up the better part of the first day. If a rescue operation, as my dad stated it was, time was of the essence and the operations involved would have been conducted with a sense of urgency. That could reasonably serve a short version though is admittedly pushing it.

The morning after arrival and check-in with briefings and the like would most certainly mean hitting the ground running. There was, after all, a lost pilot to recover. Based on what little my dad actually said about what happened, the fatal encounter with the underground people could have happened on the first day that he was involved with the operation. Not knowing exactly what happened after this, I am left to assume that he was put on a plane and sent back to Alabama.

As you have likely already guessed, issues emerge with just the timing aspect alone. The point, however, is that the Arizona episode could have happened in a period of a few days to a week and my mom simply doesn't recall not seeing him for that particular period of time.

This is a good point at which to acknowledge that the timing question serves another possibility which we'll explore later. For now, let us again continue with my dad's tale as he told it.

So with it being possible that my dad's 1958 adventure in Arizona on a UFO retrieval and rescue operation could have happened during the course of a week of his identified training period, let us now consider the extent of the operation apparently already in progress, per my father.

The Operation

The story is simple: The craft crashed just outside the border of the subterranean realm and the pilot was lost on the surface, essentially somewhere in the desert or canyons east of Winslow, Arizona.

We at least have a place to pin our examination.

Winslow started as a water stop for the railroad and grew into one of the many small towns along old Route 66. It sits in Navajo County and is roughly 40 miles east of the well known Meteor Crater impact site where the 1984 movie Starman was filmed. Meteor Crater is also where the Apollo astronauts conducted a portion of their training and this should be noted for it will be discussed again. Sixty miles east of Winslow lies the Painted Desert and the Petrified Forest and it is east we shall go as my dad's story says the operation was happening.

The Painted Desert was named such by the mid 16th Century Francisco Coronado expedition on a quest for the legendary Seven Cities of Cibola. Immediately we may suspect another reason for a US government operation in the subterranean strata of this region. The Spanish heard stories of vast amounts of gold here. If they believed it, might the US government have thrown their hat into the gold-hunting ring, albeit four centuries later? We'll discuss that later. For now we'll look at the Petrified Forest.

Characterized by striking landscapes of grassy plains and rocky mesa badlands, the Petrified Forest is home to countless fossils and some petroglyphs, along with being territory of both the mysterious cultures of the Hohokam and the Mogollon. It is essentially a perfect place for anything to happen without anyone knowing about it, especially back in 1958. Was the lost pilot wandering the canyons, trying to find his way back home to the underground world - which, by the way, the Hohokam believed in?[29]

According to my dad, that was the case. The pilot was lost on the surface but the greater focus of the operation was allegedly underground, should the pilot have wandered below to reach the passage back home. That's where my dad said that he and his colleague encountered the 'others'. What exactly was going on down there?

There have been stories in recent years about underground extraterrestrial bases and gun battles between aliens and military personnel. When I started hearing such tales about twenty or so years ago, I did cock an ear because of what my dad had been telling me. But these stories were even more sensational than what my dad offered and they were (and remain) questionable, as is my dad's story. The significant differences between those versions and what I heard over the years is that my dad always insisted the people 'down there' are not extraterrestrials and the unfortunate encounter resulting in the death of an airman was the result of the two parties startling each other, not an act of hostile aggression or war.

The Others

So who and what are these 'other people'?

My dad said they were human beings who went underground during a planetary cataclysm and chose to remain there, developing and expanding their own civilization and technology separate from that above. When one thinks of the legends and lore of an Atlantean or Lemurian civilization destroyed in the remote past, this scenario enters the realm of folklore and mythology. Even more to the point, when you look at Native American legends and mythology, my dad's scenario indeed resonates with the specific area where he claimed to have encountered the underground people.

In the wider context of both American continents, we find that some Native American lore tells of a world shaking disaster which sent their ancestors fleeing from their sinking homelands and landing by sea in the 'new world'. But ancient cultures of the southwestern United States tell a different story, one of the people fleeing catastrophe via descent into subterranean cavities. The Hopi tell us that we live in what they refer to as 'the fourth world', this being the fourth time mankind has lived on the surface following natural or other disasters[30].

Even more interestingly, the Hopi tell of mysterious 'Ant People' who helped them during said crisis. The Mandans also have such a legend, theirs about the 'Histoppa', a tattooed group of humans who were the first to attempt an emergence from the safety of the tunnels. They did not survive what they encountered above. The Apaches tell of ancient wanderings in tunnels, carrying their food with them in seeds and fruit plants to sustain themselves below, which implies an ecosystem one usually doesn't think of for down there. The Paiutes of Death Valley also speak of the underworld and we'll return to them momentarily. There is Cherokee lore of the subterranean 'moon-eyed' people who are blind in sunlight and pale are akin to what we find in these events discussed here, even though they were reported in Tennessee. [31]

Ancient North American mythologies are full of these legends and South America has them on steroids. The point is, there is an existing theme of a living underworld running through the centuries of mythology and folklore so one must consider this when looking at my dad's story.

After arriving in place in the Arizona underground, my dad and his colleagues would have been introduced to whomever supervised the rescue and retrieval operation, and this would likely have included an appearance by the man who was running it: the enigmatic Wilson.

As previously discussed, while in the hospital my dad was going on about a 'crystal house' and a man who was killed. He repeatedly referred to 'Wilson'. Fortunately I was the only visitor in the room at that moment and the nurses were busy elsewhere so no one else heard it. You will recall that my source and mentor, 'Colonel Lundy', instructed me to keep him off the subject when family members were around and that he would tell me about Wilson at another time.

I will return later to what I learned about Wilson but for now let's stay on the 1958 narrative.

After being briefed on specific tasks and likely receiving some sort of general instruction from Wilson, my dad and the other guys would likely be deployed to the section of the subterranean area for which they were responsible. Again, he didn't give any detail about what or how long anything had transpired between meeting Wilson and the moment they encountered the 'others'. He simply said they were making their way through the underground when they turned a corner and were startled by them.

According to my dad, they were confronted by a small group of pale humans who were blind but keenly adept with their other senses. My dad's air force teammate raised his weapon on reflex and that's when the leader of the other group raised his handheld object, leveling the simple tube at what he perceived a threat. My dad said that the air force team member suddenly dropped to the ground, as dead as if a switch had been flipped off. And that is it, the end of the story.

It is of keen interest to me that, whenever he told the part about the air force guy being killed by whatever the tube thing was, my dad became very emotional and couldn't continue. The story always ends there.

I didn't realize when first hearing it that my dad's tale not only reflects the native lore, it also deeply resonates with UFO reports. Within the context of Wright-Patterson briefings and Roswell, there is more reason to consider just where my dad's story fits into the picture. But is there anything like what my dad encountered to be found in the annals of UFO reports?

Indeed there is.

The Tube That Stings Like Cactus Needles

The events in my dad's story bear striking resemblance to accounts told by UFO witnesses through the years and for this we must turn to Jacques Vallee, aspects of whose work, though much lauded by many, is still too often rejected for a preferred extraterrestrial conclusion.

Vallee writes in Revelations: Alien Contact and Human Deception (Ballantine 1991) about meeting with a man named Robert Scott of the Defense Audi Visual Agency:

"Scott also told me that he had seen a UFO in 1959 while visiting some land seventy miles of north Phoenix in the company of a psychologist and a photographer. They saw the object for about one minute. Unfortunately, the photographer did not have his camera with him."

Isn't that interesting? Not only the issue of a photographer not having his camera with him but also the location of the sighting.

Seventy miles roughly due north of Phoenix is the experimental town of Arcosanti and beyond that you get into Sedona, and all which that implies. If you head seventy miles northwest out of Phoenix, you find yourself in desert terrain west of the Prescott National Forest; and the same distance northeast from the city takes you beyond the Mazatzal Mountains into the area where the Kaibab National Forest meets the Apache-Sitgreaves National Forest, about another seventy miles southwest from Winslow. I mention this case because it places a UFO sighting well within short flying proximity to Winslow and in 1959, the year after my dad claims he was there on a UFO rescue and retrieval operation.

But there are other UFO accounts to be considered within our context here. Most specifically the case of police officer Sgt Herbert Schirmer in December 1967.

A fairly standard account, Schirmer was patrolling a rural area around Ashland, Nebraska, when he noticed a bull exhibiting agitated behavior in a corral. While checking things out, Schirmer saw a UFO and encountered the occupants. Later, under hypnosis, Schirmer recalled one of the occupants pointing a 'rodlike' device at him and causing paralysis. Here we have a detail clearly similar to the tubular device that caused lethal paralysis as related in my dad's tale. And there's an even better example.

I previously referred to the Paiutes among those ancient American cultures with beliefs in an underground race. Paiute lore includes a mysterious civilization of 'Hav-musuvs' who fly in 'silvery sky canoes'. This provides another point of regional native history that could resonate with my dad's account, but it's the other device the Hav-Musuvs are known for which most definitely relates: a small hand-held tube that stuns enemies with a sensation likened to stinging cactus needles -- and it paralyzes them[32]

These incidents, and the lore to which they appear to relate, suggests that my dad's encounter as he told it was not an isolated experience. It clearly demonstrates that in Schirmer we have another reported encounter hundreds of miles away -- and almost a decade later -- in which the witness experienced the same detail of the tube or rod-like device that causes various levels of paralysis. Some might say that the Schirmer encounter validates my dad's story, and I recognize that logic. But there remains more to consider before going quite there and we'll return to it.

So what do we have here?

SUMMARY

I cannot exactly commit to my father having gone to the Arizona site during his TDY at Gunter AFB. Unless my mom is completely off, it appears he wasn't away from Montgomery long enough. The only remaining option is that Arizona happened after he returned to California and got married to my mom, sometime during his last few months of active duty. My mom recalls a period of several days after their wedding during which she stayed with family in Los Angeles while my dad was ostensibly up in Victorville.

My dad's encounter includes elements of local native lore suggesting that he was indeed there. The Schirmer UFO encounter featuring a UFO occupant wielding a tube that paralyzes is a compelling resonance.

But we can't leave Arizona just yet because we haven't looked at that enigmatic man behind the curtain.

It's time to get to know the mysterious Wilson...

CHAPTER FIVE

Ride, Captain, ride
Upon your mystery ship
On your way to a world
That others might have missed...

-- Mike Pinera & Frank Konte

Where to begin?

This chapter covers what is likely some of the most curious and outlandish material in this book, and possibly among the most critical to the situation. It will leave you wondering and it may even make you put the book down to dismiss the whole thing. However, one cannot look at my dad's story without dealing with the most mysterious character at the center this and much else of what I've written about for the past few years.

When my father muttered his name repeatedly while under heavy sedation in the hospital, I thought perhaps that Wilson was the man killed by the mysterious tube device. I was soon to learn otherwise. As mentioned before, as soon as I could get to a phone (this was 1991, remember), I called my closest source, 'Colonel Lundy', and told him what my dad had been saying. I asked, "Who is Wilson?"

The Smartest Man In The World

A few years passed and I finally got the question answered. After earning a commission in the US Air Force and upon completion of the investigations course, I commenced duty as a Special Agent of the AFOSI in April of 1994[33]. Within a few weeks, Col Lundy had made one of his many unannounced visits to California, where I was stationed in Los Angeles and the subject of Wilson was now appropriate for us to discuss. The colonel's answer to my initial question was this: "Wilson is the smartest man in the world who you've never heard of. He's a genius."

Naturally, I asked what he had to do with my dad, a 'crystal house' and the man who was killed. The Colonel waved me on to follow him and we went for one of our many 'walking talks', as I call them. These were more akin to briefings between intelligence agents.

"Wilson was in charge of a project your dad was on when he was in the air force. Yes, it relates to what he's told you regarding that event in New Mexico and what followed. The man who died was different man."

When I asked about the 'crystal house', he would not tell me. "You don't need to know that yet.[34]" He instead instructed me to get my dad to talk more about Wilson.

Those of you who have read my books Empire of the Wheel 2: Friends From Sonora and Origin: The Nineteenth Century Emergence of the 20th Century Breakaway Civilizations know that I have written about the Wilsons associated with the Sonora Aero Club and the 1890s airship mystery. The Wilson my father encountered is apparently in that family.

How can I claim such a thing? I've written previously on how the Wilson of my dad's tale relates to the Wilsons of the airship mysteries[35]. It is an interesting episode and I will share it here, though I can't yet place exactly when it happened.

My understanding has always been that my dad's first encounter with Wilson was in the underground operation in Arizona. However, I was told by Colonel Lundy that my dad and a couple other guys had been released from the operation because somehow they had pissed off the genius project manager. Looking at it one way, you would assume this would have been the last my dad ever worked on anything of Wilson's and it may have been. Still, there is another project in the mix which I haven't been able to place chronologically.

A Momentary Detour

Among the things my father told me when he was in the hospital the last year of his life was the experience with Wilson in California's Mojave Desert, not far from where I live now. He told me of witnessing a demonstration of an anti-gravity technology device designed by the Wilsons ostensibly for the US Air Force. Yes, that was plural. There were two Wilsons present on that day.

According to my dad, the demonstration was staged in an off-site location he would refer to only as 'Whisper Canyon'. The same Wilson who ran the Arizona recovery operation allegedly demonstrated the device with the participation of an older Wilson who my dad said was known as 'Professor' and described as 'the old man'. He also said the Professor's first name was 'Hiram'.

Clang! Do you hear that loud bell?

That name is certainly a bell ringer for anyone who has sincerely looked at the 1890s airship mystery because Hiram Wilson is among the Wilsons named by witnesses in the reports of the time. So let's look at the lineage of the airship Wilsons for a moment. Was it the same guy?

The first Wilson identified in the airship mysteries was Tosh Willson of the Sonora Aero Club. The spelling difference could have been an error by the German source of the legend, Charles Dellschau. This 'Willson' had been a member of the club in the mid 1850s. Following him were the 1890s Wilsons, spelled with one L, identified in that late chapter of airship mystery lore. The two are identified as Willard and Hiram and you can find my lengthier analysis of them in Chapter Nine of my last book, Origin:The Nineteenth Century Emergence of the 20th Century Breakaway Civilizations (Corvos 2015).

The Hiram my father referred to as 'the old man' or 'Professor Wilson' may likely have been related to these 1890s Wilsons if not possibly the Hiram of that duo. In my previous book I calculate how that is indeed possible.

While investigating the members of the Sonora Aero Club, Pete Navarro came across a report in the Galveston Daily News possibly of 22 April 1897[36] which discusses a letter allegedly written by someone who had witnessed one of the mystery airships and encountered the pilot and crew. The letter identified the pilot as named Wilson -- but the witness could not be further questioned as he had died in a drowning accident shortly after. The letter-writing witness was described as having studied physics and having a 'scientific turn of mind'. Might he actually have been recruited by Wilson of the airship and not really have died?

The names are not the only point of resonance between the airship mystery Wilsons and my dad's story. There are the specifics of the alleged technology.

A witness named Hopkins reports in April of 1897 that one of the airship Wilsons demonstrated how the anti-gravity apparatus of his airship was activated by the tapping of a 'finger of metal'[37]. This has particularly pertinent meaning to my dad's account in Whisper Canyon in the late 1950s.

If an airship mystery Wilson named 'Hiram' was in his twenties in the mid to late 1890s, by 1958 he would have been in his seventies. That could fit an 'old man' called the 'Professor'. Was it the same Hiram Wilson? Could it have been?

I think so. As demonstrated, he could certainly have still been alive fifty years after first coming on the scene in the 1890s airship mystery. And no matter how many Hirams the naysayers will point out, we're talking about a Hiram Wilson involved in a story of anti-gravity technology who shares the same exact name as another Hiram Wilson identified with a story about anti-gravity technology. Exactly how many Hiram Wilsons associated with anti-gravity tales are there, Mister Pissy?

Personally, my conclusion is that my dad was talking about either the same Hiram Wilson of the airship mystery or more likely that Hiram Wilson's son or nephew, if Hiram the First was actually older than his twenties in the 1890s. You get my point. To shave it finer, recall that Col Lundy told me in the mid 1990s that the Wilson my dad referred to, relative to the underground operation in Arizona, was the most brilliant man I had never heard of, both implying and subsequently stating that said Wilson was still alive. He could very well have been 'Professor' Hiram Wilson's son.

Put 'Professor' Hiram in his twenties in the mid-late 1890s and say he doesn't father a child for another ten years or more. That means Wilson the younger could have been born as late as 1910 or after, likely before 1920. Thus in 1958, he would have been just shy of fifty and by 1996 in his eighties but still alive. Here's the deal: I can't be much off on the early end of the younger Wilson's birth and if I'm wrong on the later end, that makes it even more possible that he was still alive in the 1990s.

And we haven't even yet considered the possibility that Wilson the younger was a nephew or even a grandson of the actual 1890s Wilson thus born later than proposed. You see where I'm going with this and I'll not belabor the point more than I already have. I don't know the exact relation but I'm convinced my dad's Wilson would logically be one of the 'airship' anti-gravity Wilson clan.

The Flying Squares

So there was my dad in 'Whisper Canyon', present for a demonstration of what he referred to as a 'flying square', a large platform that was equipped with some sort of anti-gravity technology that the Wilsons supposedly controlled via a hand-held box and a small hammer.

The 'flying square' was large but my dad didn't specify the exact dimensions, only that it was sufficiently sized for cargo and personnel. From one corner of this platform there protruded a metal tab, or 'finger', which when tapped by Wilson activated the platform. Sound familiar?

My dad said that when Wilson tapped the small metal tab on one corner of the square platform the platform then floated a few inches off the ground. In the 1890s account, the pilot Wilson demonstrates the airship propulsion mechanism and the tapping of a small finger (or tab) of metal activates the machinery. This is looking like the same basic technology so why not the same Wilson(s)?

Almost sixty years later, 'Professor' Hiram Wilson used controls on the hand-held box, specifically a sliding knob, to raise the platform up into the sky and bring it back down again. I kid you not, this is what my dad told me that he witnessed. He said the platform could be raised to high altitudes so that materiel and personnel could be transferred to or from aircraft or, presumably, spacecraft. My dad said he saw this himself. He did not say what subsequently happened with this technology.

What nags me is when did this demonstration happen? Prior to his 1958 TDY to Gunter AFB? Did it happen after his return with my mom, while she was in Los Angeles? If perhaps it happened priot to the alleged 'training' TDY to Gunter, then what exactly was my dad involved in and for how long? [38]

Another question that intrigues the hell out of me is where exactly is Whisper Canyon? My dad gave me a general location but I am not going to reveal that in this book as I am still pursuing it myself. Yes, it is in Southern California, in San Bernardino County. With what I've written about telluric current 'ley lines', you can imagine how I hope to find this canyon.

Interestingly, a few years ago in UFO Magazine, there was an article about flying platforms reported by UFO witnesses[39]. Could this be a later generation of the same technology demonstrated decades prior by the Wilsons?

That is all I know of the flying platform episode involving the Wilsons, so we'll now return to the Arizona operation in 1958.

Back Down The Rabbit Hole

I was told by Colonel Lundy that Wilson (the younger) was the man in charge of the recovery/retrieval operation deployed to assist the underground civilization to which the missing pilot belonged. I was not told whether Wilson was himself in the military but he certainly could have been. He didn't need to be, though. As a civilian in a top scientific position for the US government, Wilson could still very well have been running the operation.

I remember that the first time, other than with Colonel Lundy or my dad, that I spoke to anyone about Wilson was with Joseph P. Farrell.

It was very late one night in Kempton, Illinois, and we were staying at one of David Hatcher Childress' World Explorer Club houses during a conference weekend in 2004. Dorothy Murdoch was with us that night and we had been discussing stuff I can't entirely recall. It's the Wilson discussion I can't forget.

In a hushed tone I asked Joseph if he'd ever heard of Wilson. Dorothy noticed his somewhat piqued reaction to the question. His reply I will never forget: "In the morning, run -- don't walk -- to David's bookstore and get the novel Genesis by Harbinson. I believe there is only one copy remaining on the shelf."

Yes, Joseph had heard of Wilson. We talked briefly about him and then moved on to something else. I indeed purchased the final copy of Harbinson's novel from the AUP shelf, though I didn't read it until after returning home to California.

Harbinson's Wilson was certainly inspired by the airship mysteries of the 1890s, including the Iowa birthplace, though he is fictionalized 'legendary' person to begin with so I tend to greatly differ in opinion with the exact characterization. However, there Wilson is in the milieu of Nazi survival and saucer lore, a twentieth century mad genius who is certainly contemporary with the Wilson my dad said he encountered. This is what impresses me most with Harbinson's character because I'm left with the suspicion that the author (or someone he knew) had heard firsthand accounts of the same man. Or Harbinson's source possibly knew the real Wilson, though I still think Harbinson took wild creative license for the purpose of drama.[40]

But most intriguing about Harbinson's book to me are other subtle hints that my dad's story may have legs. Chapter One begins at 'Winslow Air Base' in Arizona. One character in the book who had worked with ATIC at Wright-Patterson cites a UFO sighting over Maxwell AFB in Montgomery and again refers to Maxwell in reference to Project Blue Book. Just as resonant with my dad's tale is when one of Harbinson's characters describes another character's reluctance: "...There's a point in his narrative beyond which he refuses to go. That point, obviously, is the actual incident that kicked him off, but he just doesn't want to face up to it."[41]

I have to wonder just what Harbinson learned about this whole thing.

SUMMARY

That a mysterious Wilson is on the stage of this story is one of its most significant points. I've tried identifying the Wilson of my dad's tale but the only possibility I turned up was the Wilson discussed in Origin, i.e. the mystery airship lore. I sincerely doubt that my father had ever read the airship mystery literature and learned of Wilson, certainly not prior to his 1991 hospitalization during which he first mentioned the man.

But was Wilson real?

Colonel Lundy said he was and his description of Wilson would essentially match what I would subsequently learn when a decade later I would read the airship mystery literature for the first time.

So that's what I know of this enigmatic fellow who stands just beyond the edge of light where a relative few have encountered him. Is there a younger Wilson waiting to emerge onto on the scene?

Let's press on...

CHAPTER SIX

Into the distance a ribbon of black Stretched to the point of no turning back...

-- David Gilmour, Anthony Moore
Bob Ezrin, Jon Carin

One element of my dad's adventure into weirdland involves his claim to have had flight training directly associated to the underground Arizona project. This raises a question of just how big the subterranean realm may be. Scientific authorities tell us there are no such places, at least not as referred to by my dad and other anecdotal witnesses. Later on I can better discuss in measurable means the subterranean construction that has gone on down there. For now, my dad said there were huge areas under the surface of the planet.

Were they big enough to fly aircraft down there?

Flight Training & Technology Transfer

I was told by my dad that the Arizona situation involved technology transfer. A small-frame aircraft that he called the 'Zipper' was, according to him, deployed underground to be exchanged with the other civilization for whatever their end of the agreement might have been. However, I have in a previous chapter already addressed the issue of the moniker 'Zipper' actually belonging to the F-104 so this mysterious little craft described by my dad will have to remain nameless.

According to my dad, this small craft was not the only thing flown around down below. He also stated that small helicopters were flown in the subterranean spaces that were apparently vast enough to accommodate the use of the small aircraft. My dad said he had been trained to fly these small helicopters and that was part of what he and some of his colleagues were doing on this deeply classified operation.

Here we come to a point that stuck with me during the analysis of the time line of events regarding my dad's TDY to Alabama.

Nothing in my dad's DD214 reveals flight training of any kind. But that does not necessarily mean it didn't happen. Nothing in his DD214 reveals any specific details of anything he did in his described duties, as nothing in my DD214 reveals the specifics of my cases or counterespionage operations, as nothing in anyone's DD214 reveals such specific details of what they did. You get the point. It's not the discharge paper that tells the whole story, even if you know how to read between the lines on it. However, the full personnel training record can be more useful in that regard if you can get your hands on it.

As of this moment, I am still waiting for a response to a request for my dad's personnel records file or at least a copy. I'm not holding my breath. My experience is that anything sufficiently classified will not be released in a personnel records request and, if my dad's story has any truth, it would have a need-to-know status. But we may yet have clues enough to speculate.

Because there is no available record of when my father departed George AFB to go to Gunter AFB, we have no idea what may have occurred along the way. Last I checked, when you drive from Victorville, California, to Montgomery, Alabama, along old Route 66, you go through a hunk of Texas. And in 1958, US Air Force helicopter flight training was conducted in Texas, at Randolph AFB.

That means simply that my dad could -- not necessarily did, but indeed could -- have received helicopter flight training prior to continuing on to Alabama. Thus the part of his story about flying those small helicopters while in Arizona could have some nugget of fact buried in there.

And what of those small helicopters?

The Huskie

Designed in 1947 by German engineer Anton Flettner, the HTK-1 'Huskie' first flew that same year as a US Navy prototype and was subsequently made operational[42]. The Huskie utilized a counter-rotating rotor arrangement and used servo flaps for control. It did not have a tail rotor. The small helicopter was only 25 feet long, 17 feet high, and weighed under 10,000lbs. It was known for its steady hovering capability. All of these specifications suggest ideal suitability in relatively small areas -- like subterranean cavities perhaps?

After 1954, the US Air Force employed the Huskie, version H-43A, as a search and rescue operation aircraft[43]. It seated two pilots and two rescue personnel. In the following decade, the USAF Huskies flew more search and rescue missions during the Vietnam war than all other aircraft combined because of its renowned hovering capability. In 1958, USAF Huskie pilots were trained at Randolph AFB in Texas until July when the training moved to Stead AFB in Reno, Nevada.

So do we have corroboration? My dad always said he had received some flight training and in the end identified it as small frame helicopter training. The Huskie fits that bill. My dad also linked this training -- as did my source Colonel Lundy -- to his mysterious Arizona episode, claiming to have flown the little helicopters in the subterranean regions. Again, the Huskie was suitable for that, certainly attributable to its hovering capability that would have been essential in tight quarters. The Huskie was used for search and rescue, again a bingo. Was my dad trained to fly the Huskie?

I cannot for certain answer that question but I can firmly say that it was indeed possible. Not expected in Montgomery until 30 June, that means helicopter flight training was still schooled at Randolph AFB in Texas, on the road between George AFB and Alabama. At the time, USAF helicopter pilots received 30 hours of flight training, plus whatever ground school was required. It should also be pointed that I have no idea what route my dad took to Alabama thus he could very well have taken a more direct route to Randolph AFB than 66[44]

Not knowing how long my dad was away from George AFB that summer of 1958, it must be considered possible that he indeed received helicopter pilot training but I must admit I have a remaining spot of difficulty with this part of his story.

That there is zero mention of this on his DD214 strongly points to a conclusion that it did not happen, my prior statement regarding what is and isn't specified on a DD214 notwithstanding. However, my dad was indeed involved in early USAF space science. If said training were directly associated with a space program classified sufficiently high enough, it is very possible that any such training would not be part of his public record, and certainly never on a DD214. If he did screw up somehow and got canned from the operation by its alleged executive, a special personnel training record would get buried if not destroyed. I remind the reader that the United States does not have a 50-year rule like other nations: classified information remains so until deemed otherwise by a proper authority.

Having illustrated that my father could have indeed received helicopter flight training on the way to Gunter AFB, especially on a helicopter uniquely suited to exactly what he described it was used for, we can return to the technology transfer question as it also allegedly involved a small aircraft[45]

What Could We Possibly Offer?

What exactly was this technology deal based on? My dad claimed it was arranged in exchange for our assistance with search and rescue of their lost pilot. That's what we offered in assistance but what could we have that the other civilization, presuming it was there and possessed whatever was so special about their downed craft, would want?

This is where many people make the hilariously ignorant mistake of assuming things about civilizations with advanced flying machines. It could be that this particular hidden civilization that presumably possessed advanced propulsion flying machines might not have been quite so comprehensively more advanced than us.

I laugh when I hear anyone say that an ET civilization possessed of advanced technology would no longer have an interest in war. I just recently heard a respected UFO researcher/author say essentially those exact words and I laughed out loud as I turned off the radio. This ridiculous assumption is repeatedly embraced by and parroted in the alternative research media community. It's one of the dumbest examples of wishful thinking I've ever heard. It is simply childish.

Personally, I'm convinced that whoever is out there is likely very little different from us. For the most part they may prefer to avoid war but are probably just as willing and ready to engage if necessary, and they certainly want to be prepared to deal with us 'lesser and hostile brutes' on our own 'unworthy' terms. Thus do I say that any argument for the mysterious hidden civilization living in the subterranean realm necessarily being more advanced than us in every way simply because they fly an anti-gravity craft (IF they do) is bullshit. And in a book like this, which for some people is itself going be considered bullshit, you know I must be serious.

It's quite possible they had something we would like and vice versa. That would explain any tech transfer aspect to the operation that I was told was involved. And if tech transfer was involved, then it makes sense if a member of the airship anti-gravity genius Wilson clan was there. Why not? He was allegedly our anti-gravity guy.

For the record, my duties as an AFOSI agent assigned to counterespionage operations required daily exposure to defense technology of the USAF. There is another section in the organization whose specific full time job is to protect the most advanced Air Force technology and they do a hell of a job. Any involvement with such stuff gives one a familiarity with the basics of how the secret technology world works, especially within a military context. It also exposes one to varying degrees of how advanced our defense technology actually is or may be.

In my professional experience, I can honestly say that nothing my dad told me about the technology he witnessed, or about the mysterious Wilson, is out of the realm of possibility -- at all.

SUMMARY

In this chapter I have probably put to rest my dad's 'Zipper' reference which was likely a result of his injuries prior to using the moniker.

However, I am confident that the 'Huskie' helicopter could have been used in a vast subterranean cavity per the specifications and capabilities of the H-43A -- and we know it is fact that the USAF was using this particular aircraft at the time my dad claimed to have received helicopter training and flew one underground. This is as important a point as is Wilson's presence in the story, maybe even more so. The Huskie is documented history and you can go see one in a museum somewhere.

I have also considered that the technology transfer aspect my dad told me about suggests something very down-to-earth about the mysterious underground people: That they would have entered into such an agreement to begin with implies some level of parity of limits with our own technology. If this was not the case, what did we have to meet our end of the obligation?

There is a disturbing possibility.

Some might say that this scenario could represent the rumored deal in which we received advanced technology and the Others were given license to abduct our people.

There may indeed be something to it...

CHAPTER SEVEN

We come from the land of the ice and snow
From the midnight sun where the hot springs flow
How soft your fields so green
Can whisper tales of gore
Of how we calmed the tides of war
We are your overlords...
-- Jimmy Page & Robert Plant

So who were these hidden people whose pilot crashed in eastern Arizona in 1958? Was it the blind ones who killed the man on the patrol with my father? The way my dad tells the story, it's difficult to determine, however UFO reports may offer clarification.

When I first read the works of Jacques Vallee several years ago, I could not dismiss the stunning likeness between some of the key incidents he presents and certain details of my father's tale.

In Dimensions: A Casebook of Alien Contact (1988), Revelations: Alien Contact and Human Deception (1991), and the classic book which preceded them, Passport To Magonia: On UFOs, Folklore, and Parallel Worlds (1969.1993), Jacques Vallee presents his initial observation and repeated findings that UFO encounters with supposed extraterrestrials were stunningly comparable to historical encounters with fairies and other interdimensional beings of popular folklore.

Many researchers refer to this category of being as 'ultraterrestrial' to distinguish them as cohabitants with us in this world, as opposed to beings from other planets. These cohabitants sometimes live hidden in the recesses of the Earth or sometimes they are thought to inhabit a parallel plane or even in our same space but on a different vibration of a common physical reality spectrum. Vallee, as of publication of those identified works, appeared to have preferred the suggestion of an ultraterrestrial explanation for the UFO cases he studied[46]. "Although I am among those who believe that UFOs are real physical objects, I do not think they are extraterrestrial in the ordinary sense of the term. In my view they present an exciting challenge to our concept of reality itself."[47]

In Passport To Magonia, Vallee makes a few propositions based upon certain commonly reported details. For the purpose of his analysis, Vallee refers to reports as 'rumors' and he says the following: "When the underlying archetypes are extracted from these rumors (reports), the saucer myth is seen to coincide to a remarkable degree with the fairy-faith of Celtic countries, the observations of the scholars of past ages, and the widespread belief among all peoples concerning entities whose physical and psychological descriptions place them in the same category as the present day ufonauts."

Vallee points out that in the reports prior to the popularization of the big headed grey alien, and in some since, the occupants or pilots could be classified into mostly two common groups, though not including the airship humans or Nordics: Dark hairy dwarfs virtually identical to gnomes, complete with deep gruff voices; or taller 'sylphs' with smooth 'silvery' voices. It should be noted that Vallee does report this latter group as having larger heads[48] but they are regarded as human in appearance and not described at all like the popular 'greys' that many people assume populate all UFO encounters of the third kind. How many people getting their information about UFOs from current ET-centric media have ever heard of these two types which Vallee identifies? Few to none.

Vallee writes: "Much can be accomplished, however, once it is realized that the observational material on hand since World War II -- the twenty thousand or so clear-cut, dated reports of UFOs in official and private files -- is nothing but a resurgence of a deep stream in human culture known in older times under various other names."[49]

It is a fascinating perspective from which to view UFO encounters and I strongly recommend the reader refer to all of Vallee's work. It also happens to resonate strongly with my dad's tale so let's look at some specific cases that reflect the 'fairy' folklore theme.

The Others

"The modern global belief in flying saucers and their occupants is identical to an earlier belief in the fairy faith. The entities described as the pilots of the craft are indistinguishable from the elves, sylphs and lutins of the Middle Ages. Through the observations of unidentified flying objects, we are concerned with an agency our ancestors knew well and regarded with terror: we are prying into the affairs of the Secret Commonwealth." says Jacques Vallee in Passport To Magonia.

First let us clarify that fairy beings were not always little winged sprites flitting around and enchanting everyone like a good-natured Tinkerbell. The fairy folk were taller yet otherwise basically indistinguishable from humans much of the time. They were also formidable in battle, reputed to be unforgiving combatants who vanquished resistance or, in some cases, were welcomed with open arms from the moment they arrived in our world. The image of glittery little butterfly people flitting around and giggling is the result of centuries of social conditioning specifically following the defeat of the Tuatha de Danann.

Who were the Tuatha de Danann? I have written about them before and will return to them here shortly. For now, let's look at a few cases, some which resemble details from my dad's encounter with the underground people, and then I'll share some details about this mysterious lost race of people which may raise your eyebrows.

In October of 1954, a miner working in France happened upon a strange fellow: small, of robustly solid stature, and quite hairy all over. The miner estimated this fellow's height to be about four feet. He had a big head, bulging eyes, a wide flat nose and thick red lips. This strange man seemed to have disappeared before the miner thought to engage him. About a week later, near Como, Italy, a similar man of four feet tall was encountered but this time the strange man was wearing a 'luminous suit' and when the witness attempted to approach him, the strange man rose from the ground and swiftly departed. The witness heard a distinct 'whirring' sound as the little being flew off.[50]

Then there is the vintage case of Joe Simonton, the Wisconsin chicken farmer who, in 1961, encountered a silver-colored saucer and the three occupants manning it.[51]

There were three of them and they wore black uniforms. Estimated to be a not so tall five feet, these men were clean shaven and swarthy, reportedly 'resembling Italians'. Simonton reported that one of the men requested water and another man was cooking on a grill of sorts. This man gave the farmer three cookies, often referred to as 'pancakes' in popular UFO literature and media. Subsequent analysis by the USAF showed the cookies, or pancakes, to be composed of simple buckwheat hulls, hydrogenated fat, starch, soy beans and wheat bran -- ordinary pancake ingredients. For all intents and purposes, Simonton's encounter seemed to be with humans and their very Earth-like technology. [52]

What makes the Simonton case so interesting here is its uncanny resemblance to fairy folklore. According to classic fairy literature and the research of W.A. Evans-Wentz, if a visitor or abductee to the fairy realm tastes their food while in their custody, he may not come back and might just become one of them[53]. Wentz also reported an Irish source who said the fairy folk eat fresh meat, drink pure water, and do not eat salt. Quite interesting when you recall Simonton being asked for water. And the cookies he was given? It is curious indeed that the USAF analysis did not find a trace of salt[54].

There is another interesting bit from the fairy lore casting a shimmering light on the Simonton case. It is the folk tale of the poor farming woman in France whose buckwheat field was ruined by the cow of the fairy folk who lived in a nearby cave. To make it up to her, the fairy folk began to supply her with endless amounts of buckwheat cakes[55], requiring only that she not tell anyone of their deal. Of course, human nature being what it is, the woman told someone and the deal was soon off when the fairy folk learned of her violation. No more buckwheat cakes for her. Joe Simonton was given three buckwheat cookies. Is there a connection?

There might very well be and we'll return to this later in the book. The obvious point is that we are left to suspect Joe Simonton had actually encountered the fairy folk, albeit described in a contemporary context. Is that the big secret of the UFOs? Were the fairy folk simply misinterpreted ETs? Or are the ETs misinterpreted fairy folk?

Let's look another UFO story reflective of fairy lore, this one with potentially dark implications and more.

Gerry Irwin

This is one of my favorites[56].

In February of 1959, Private First Class Gerry Irwin was en route to Fort Bliss in El Paso, Texas, after spending time on leave in Idaho. Just a few miles outside of Cedar City, Utah, PFC Irwin noticed a strange glow in the distance which he feared may have been an airplane crash.

Parking his car on the side of the road, with a note telling passing motorists what he was doing and requesting someone call the police, Irwin went off toward the light with the idea in mind that he could help any crash survivors, if need be. A game warden happened along and found Irwin's note scrawled on the car. A search party was gathered and an hour and a half later they found Private Irwin unconscious. No sign of any plane crash was found.

Irwin was taken to a local hospital and found to have normal vital signs -- the doctors just simply could not wake him. When he did finally wake up, Irwin said he felt fine. His only concern was that he had apparently lost his jacket. Irwin was flown to Fort Bliss, his car presumably transported by the army, and observed in the base hospital there for four days. Irwin was cleared and returned to duty, though his security clearance was revoked.

The mystery had only begun. Irwin passed out several days later while walking across the base. He fainted again in downtown El Paso just days after that episode and this time was taken immediately to a hospital. When Irwin woke up he asked if there were any survivors. Apparently he had to be told what the date was because he thought it was still the February night that he was found off the road in Utah looking for a plane crash[57].

Irwin was again put under psychiatric observation at the Army hospital on Fort Bliss, this time for an entire month, and was again found to be perfectly normal. He was released from the hospital on 17 April 1959.

On 18 April, PFC Irwin left Fort Bliss without leave and traveled via bus back to Cedar City, Utah. Returning to the same spot where he said he had seen the strange lighted object he thought might be a crashed plane, Irwin continued onward through the hills and came to the spot where his missing coat lay. Curiously, there was a pencil placed in one of the buttonholes and slip of paper wound tightly around it. For some unknown reason, Irwin burned the paper and immediately emerged from the trance which had led him back to the spot. He turned himself in to the local sheriff and was taken back to Fort Bliss and again put under observation.

What was written on the slip of paper? The case details do not answer that question.

Once again, Irwin was found to be perfectly normal, but this time the Inspector General ordered yet another examination and Irwin was readmitted to the Army hospital on base in July of that year. And yet again they found nothing wrong with him. What were the Army psychiatrists so keen on finding?

They might never have found it and we may never know what exactly they were looking for because on 1 August 1959, PFC Gerry Irwin went AWOL.

He was never seen again.

What exactly was going on in the Irwin case?

I have some ideas but I'm saving that for a later chapter. I'll just say for now that a few things in this case stand out to me, things that were not likely considered through the usual ET UFO filter.

What, you ask, does the Gerry Irwin case have to do with fairy lore?

A lot.

The strange lights that first drew Irwin from his path, his repeated passing out and falling into a deep but otherwise uneventful sleep, and his ultimate disappearance. Each one of these facts of the Irwin case can be found in encounters between humans and fairy folk.

Who might PFC Irwin have met on that Utah highway that first night?

The Tuatha de Danann

Considered a divine race of beings, the Tuatha came from the sky in some versions of the legend, though some merely insinuate an unnamed homeland from which they fled. Still others claim they came from cities they had built in South America[58]. The Tuatha-back-from-the-Americas theory suggests the lore of the mysterious Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha who reportedly arrived in the ancient Americas from an eastern point across the sea and eventually returned to their homeland. Their exact origin remains a mystery.

With the Tuatha de Danann, according to Christopher Knight and Robert Lomas in Uriel's Machine: Uncovering the Secrets of Stonehenge, Noah's Flood and the Dawn of Civilization (Fair Winds, 1999/2001), came advanced knowledge and a major step forward in technology for those who embraced them and even those conquered by them. It is said that they brought four great treasures from their four greatest cities: the Sword, the Spear, the Magic Cauldron and the Stone of Destiny. Who were these people and why are we discussing them?

'Tuatha de Danann' is interpreted to mean 'Children of the Goddess Anu'. Sometimes called 'Ana' or 'Danu', she is also known as 'Saint Brigit', for those who like their deities syncretized. Anu has also been interpreted to mean 'the waters of heaven or space' which is what the Book of the Dun Cow says about the original homeland location of the Tuatha. It is interesting to note that their rivals, the Fomorians, were reputed to have also come from the heavens and were described as terrible misshapen giants associated with being under the sea after their arrival on Earth.[59]

Readers of my Empire of the Wheel 3: The Nameless Ones and Origin should see the NYMZA fingerprint in the Fomorians. Let us proceed with the Tuatha as their lore hints a presence in my father's story.

It is the Tuatha de Danann about whom most of the fairy lore has been documented. It is within this lore we begin to see a direct association in some of the details of my father's strange encounter beginning with the subterranean aspect. When the Tuatha were defeated, according to the literature, they fled to the underworld, literally going underground.

Bruce Rux, in Architects of the Underworld: Unriddling Atlantis, Anomalies of Mars and the Mystery of the Sphinx (Frog, Ltd; 1996) hits the pertinent points: "They have their sacred spaces and expect to be left alone there -- any wayfarer into their territory may be harassed or toyed with for their amusement, but they almost always leave their visitors with some benefit or present for their trouble, provided they accept their 'initiation' with a modicum of good grace." (Pgs 351-352)

This is very interesting for here we have in the Tuatha almost exactly what my dad said about the 'hidden race' that he encountered: he said they wanted nothing to do with us, preferred to be left alone in their underground civilization. The aspect of being harassed or toyed with may be seen in the many quirky aspects of UFO encounters discussed in the works of Vallee and the reward 'for their trouble' might explain the pancakes Joe Simonton received or the exchange of knowledge my dad claimed to have occurred with the US Air Force.

It is what Rux writes of the Tuatha after the above that also eerily resonates with our discussion thus far: "They reserve the rarely exercised right to take mortals of their choosing away with them -- permanently." (Rux, PG 352).

Rux points out: "Abduction is a constant element in all tales of the Fairy Folk" They switch our newborn infants for their own and their women abduct our men to be their mates. Again we have here an obvious resonance with our modern stories of ETs stealing babies and abducted males enjoying sexual trysts with alien vixens. But Rux points out another little aspect of encounters with the underworld folk that starkly resembles both the aforementioned Gerry Irwin case, as well as an aspect of my dad's experience.

According to Rux, the underground Tuatha 'fairy folk' have the power to erase the memories of those who have visited their realm. "No one who returns from Fairyland can remember what happened there."

If they return.

Recall that Gerry Irwin would pass out and lose time, never describing where he ended up while he was missing. Irwin would wake and think it was the moment prior to passing out but we have no explanation for where he was exactly or what he was doing while missing -- because he could not remember it himself. And then came his final disappearance.

'They reserve the rarely exercised right to take mortals of their choosing away with them -- permanently...'

And of my father?

Recall what I've said about his story ending with the encounter in which another man was killed by the person with the tube. My dad would become very emotional and go no further -- as if he couldn't remember anything further, perhaps?

"The mind of a person coming out of Fairy Land is usually blank as to what has been seen and done there." wrote Walter Evans-Wentz in The Fairy Faith in Celtic Countries.

What of that tube?

According to lore, a 'magical' rod was a talisman used to effect transport back and forth between our world and the 'fairy realm'. Hermes carries a rod in one hand which he uses to 'spellbind' humans[60]. Might this 'magical rod' be the same device as the tube my dad reported in his story?

Let us not dismiss the native Paiute legend of the American Southwest about the mysterious Hav-Musuvs who flew 'sky canoes' and wielded the tube that paralyzes[61] -- placing this device in the ancient mythology of the region where events discussed in this book are supposed to have happened.

At this point in the analysis, we can reasonably suggest there is evidence for mysterious tube-wielding 'others' in subterranean Arizona in 1958, if we choose.

With the Hav-Musuvs in mind, was the underground search and rescue project my father described actually a venture into the subterranean realm of the long ago Tuatha de Danann? Might it have been the result of an approach by our government to establish diplomatic and practical alliance relations with the Tuatha? How nutty is it that I'm actually entertaining that question?

I will return to a previously quoted statement by Rux because of its significant resonance with my dad's story: "The government began investigating the possibility that the race behind the unknown spacecraft was one parallel to our own*, and* connected to human life from antiquity, no later than 1958*."* (Rux, Pg 418)

Rux is saying that the by 1958 the US government was considering the possibility that another group of beings linked to us in antiquity was the origin of the 'unknown' spaceraft, i.e. Roswell.

Says Jacques Vallee of the whole phenomenon of UFOS and their occupants: "It may have been with us, in one form or another, as long as the human race has existed on this planet."[62]

Are they human? Are they possessed of a technology so asymmetrical to our own that they appeared as magical beings? Are they the Tuatha de Danann?

In the very year of my dad claims his encounter with humans from a civilization that parted from our own in ancient times, and who are supposedly the answer to the Roswell crash mystery, Rux says was indeed the case.

I can't find what Rux is referring to in his intriguing statement about 1958, other than a loosely interpreted reference to the Robertson Panel and the Brookings Report which acknowledge a possibility of ancient relics on the Moon and Mars. The latter report is dated 1960 so perhaps this is what Rux means.

Rux published his book in 1996. My dad was telling me his story as far back as the 1970s with the most resonant of details starting five years before Rux' book. Could my father have read the material from Rux' book elsewhere and been pulling my leg for decades? Yes, he could have, but I have nothing to point to in his life or known reading habits to suggest it.

It may be that what my dad claimed about his subterranean experience in 1958 is the event, or is among events in that year, which motivated said investigation to which Rux refers.

I don't think my father read the Rux book or got the details of his story from Rux' sources. There is another possibility which the patient reader will learn in the second part of this book. Is there any evidence that anyone associated with the US military ever even hinted at a scenario such as my dad or author Rux claimed?

We Have Had Help

Hermann Oberth, German astronautics expert who became instrumental in American space technology, is quoted as saying in 1974 the following: "We cannot take the credit for our record advancement in certain scientific fields alone; we have had help."[63]

When Oberth was asked from whom the help came, he replied: "The people from other worlds."

Then there is Werner von Braun who we are told said -- in 1959: "We find ourselves faced by powers which are far stronger than we had hitherto assumed, and whose base is at present unknown to us. More I cannot say at present. We are now engaged in entering into closer contact with those powers, and in six or nine months' time it may be possible to speak with more precision on the matter."[64]

Is what Von Braun said in 1959 a clue to what Rux refers to?

Oberth is quoted that we had help and just the year after my dad's story happened, Von Braun is quoted likewise, so much as saying that we are in some sort of diplomatic type situation with another party more powerful than us. These quotes are usually repeated as pretty compelling evidence of some sort of agreement between the US government and an extraterrestrial civilization, though it is rarely (if ever) pointed out that Von Braun's statement may not necessarily mean extraterrestrial and Oberth's comment could just as easily mean the hidden civilization, their subterranean realm being the 'other world'.

The question is did Oberth and Von Braun really say this?

I haven't yet found the evidence that they did not. That Von Braun's statement was supposedly made in 1959 cannot be dismissed within the context of discussion in this book. My dad claimed we made contact with the 'other world' by 1958 and just the following year the leading scientist of the US space program is making a statement about an unidentified party more powerful than us. What are we supposed to think?

Could the Tuatha de Danann, the Children of the Goddess Anu, be that powerful force from the 'other world' that Oberth and Von Braun referred to?

Of course they could. What is more certain, based on everything we've considered so far, is that something appears to have been going on in the late 1950s that has left people with a bunch of curious reasons to wonder if the US military had indeed made contact with people from another world.

SUMMARY

I have demonstrated that material from human folklore and modern UFO history resonates with my father's story and suggests an alternative but no less astonishing possibility than the popular ET assumption. Respected scientist and scholar Jacques Vallee has made multiple statements over the years in support of this alternative.

We have taken specific notice of the Tuatha de Danann, a race of mysterious people spoken of in folklore yet showing no apparent sign of being among us today.

The Tuatha de Danann are associated with objects and abilities and an abode suspiciously similar to native mythology in the very region where my father says he encountered like people.

Some of the specifics of my father's encounter with the underground people are identical to the folklore, as are independent UFO reports like Schirmer and the mysterious case of Gerry Irwin.

One of the very talents of the mysterious folkloric beings is blocking or erasing the memory of anyone who visits their realm. This is reflected in my father's tale in how he told it. There are conspicuous gaps in his telling.

Is This All There Is?

I could have ended this book here, concluding that enough circumstantial evidence exists to claim my father's story inarguable and somewhat ironically make my contribution to the popular and prevailing general theory of ufology, that the answer must indeed be not of this world.

Up to this point, I have introduced the reader to my dad's strange episode and we have looked at some extraordinary (even fantastic) data that would appear to confirm the story as told. We have also considered historical and documented facts. However, I have yet to present all that there is relative to this situation because I wanted to present my dad's story in the only way I knew and interpreted it up until now.

Before you read further, I will reconfirm that I do not reject the existence of extraterrestrials. On the contrary, I think the foolish position is to expect irrefutable proof before seriously considering that they likely exist. My personal opinion is that extraterrestrials do exist, have often come to this planet and probably still do.

But extraterrestrials do not satisfactorily explain my dad's story. I am even more intrigued with the idea of the lost race of the Secret Commonwealth discussed by Jacques Vallee and Walter Evans-Wentz before him. I am also personally convinced that, like ETs, they do exist, in one way or another.

In the background of my father's story -- and much of UFO related lore since WW2 -- there lurks a giant shadow over everything discussed so far in this book (and in my others). Because what casts this shadow bears direct and definitive impact upon my dad's story, it cannot be dismissed as it usually is by the true believers of that other popular paradigm.

As intriguing and thrilling as the strange tale of Staff Sgt Charles Bosley may indeed be, the time has come to tell the rest of the tale...

CHAPTER EIGHT

Fly me to the Moon
Let me play among the stars
Let me see what spring is like
On Jupiter and Mars
In other words, hold my hand...
-- Bart Howard

It really begins with the story of aviation medicine for therein lie the deepest secrets of the military industrial complex which emerged following World War Two.

I'll forego the usual romanticized narrative about man and flight, the romance of aviation. We've all heard it ad nauseum and Tom Wolfe did it best anyway. Suffice it to say that in the years leading up to the Second World War, all the leading nations of the world were striving to go higher and faster than anyone else. In the background of this effort was a somewhat veiled pursuit of manned spaceflight. The United States was very much involved in this pursuit especially where military air power was concerned, in spite of early misgivings between military branches.

Now one might react to the subject of aviation medicine with a yawning disinterest. After all, pilots in screaming jets racing to the stars are a much more exciting image than military personnel in white coats with needles and enema probes. However, as I learned while working on this book, aviation medicine was at the heart of some mad pursuits of dark science and appears to have been driving one of the most notorious government programs in history.

For America, it began with Major General Harry Armstrong, USAF.

Born in South Dakota in 1899, Harry Armstong served in the Marine Corps during WW1 before earning his medical degree from the University of Louisville. During the war, the US Army had established the Air Service Medical Research Laboratory at Hazelhurst, Long Island, which was eventually combined with the School for Flight Surgeons. Armstrong had already been attending the joint programs of these schools for over a year by the time they combined to form the School of Aviation Medicine in November, 1922.[65]

Following assignment as a US Army Air Corps flight surgeon in 1931, Armstrong would establish the Aero-Medical Laboratory at Wright Field in Ohio four years later. During his five-year assignment running the Laboratory, he earned his master of science degree at the University of Cincinnati and a master of arts from the University of Toronto. After a short assignment in London, Armstrong went to Randolph Field in Texas to establish a research laboratory for the School of Aviation Medicine until war broke out again and he was sent to the European theater to eventually become chief flight surgeon of the Eighth Army. That was how he ended up chief surgeon in the Air Division in the office of the Military Government for Germany in Berlin after the war. [66]

But Harry Armstrong was more than his official US Air Force biography. He was a dedicated research scientist who published 105 scientific papers in aerospace medicine. He is known for discovering the 'Armstrong Limit', the altitude at which water begins to boil at the temperature of the human body. He led America's scientific accomplishments in protecting air crews from the extremes of high altitude, as well as the development of improved oxygen delivery during his time running the Laboratory. Armstrong was renowned for being the first flight surgeon to have made a free fall parachute jump but it was what he did while at Wright Field in 1934 that bears first impact on our story.[67]

Harry Armstrong was appointed director of the Physiological Research Unit and here he commandeered the single old US Army iron low pressure chamber from which he developed the Air Corps first altitude chambers. Armstrong was essentially the creator of the physiological training division of the USAF which my father would be assigned.[68] Certain significant events would occur between Armstrong's pioneer trailblazing at Wright Field and my dad's enlistment.

In 1937, then Captain Armstrong attended the first international convention of the Aero Medical Association hosted in at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York. It was at this conference Armstrong would meet Dr. Hubertus Strughold, his counterpart in Germany for the Luftwaffe. The two doctors admired each other's work and became friendly from the start.[69]

There was much for Armstrong to admire in Strughold, for the German doctor had accomplished his own exploits in aviation medical science as well. From the lifelong impact that seeing Halley's Comet had on him to his daring exploits strapped into nosediving biplanes so that he and the pilot could blackout and provide valuable research data, Strughold was every bit Armstrong's match. The German aviation scientist would earn a Rockefeller Fellowship and attend the University of Chicago where he would test the effects of oxygen deficiency on live dogs smuggled in from Canada, which might have been a red flag but instead went ignored.[70]

Before meeting Armstrong, Hubertus Strughold had been appointed director of the Aviation Medical Research Institute of the Reich Air Ministry in Berlin through his friendship with the pilot who flew the crazy blackout experiments, Robert Ritter von Greim who was tight with the inner circle of the Nazi party. In fact, Von Greim had been requested personally by Hermann Goring to thumb their collective noses at the Treaty of Versailles and rebuild the German air force, that's how highly regarded he was by the Nazis. His buddy Strughold benefited from the association, ending up directly subordinate to Erich Hippke, chief of the Luftwaffe medical corps who himself reported to Goring. Strughold eventually became one of the most powerful medical scientists in the Third Reich.[71]

Among Strughold's contributions to aviation medicine, on behalf of the Luftwaffe, was his research using early German altitude chambers. At first, prior to the war, Strughold used himself and his staff assistants in experiments and tests, but things became murky once the war started and his association with Theodore Benziger and Siegfried Ruff.[72]

Dr Theodore Benziger was assigned to the Experimental Station of the Air Force (Luftwaffe) Research Center in Rechlin and Dr Siegfried Ruff worked out of the German Experimental Station for Aviation Medicine in the Aero Medical division in Berlin. Benziger, who was a Luftwaffe officer during the war, also experimented on himself and colleagues, one of whom died in the pursuit of understanding the effects of oxygen deprivation. Among Benziger's risky exploits involved investigating explosive decompression. Benziger won the Iron Cross as a combat pilot.[73]

Siegfried Ruff had been assigned by Strughold to conduct research on the effects of g-forces on pilots and air crews. An enthusiastic Nazi party member, Ruff supervised gruesome medical experiments at Dachau, the notorious high-altitude studies in Experimental Cell Block Five among them. Ruff and Strughold co-authored scientific articles together, considered quite the collaboration by the US Army Air Corps who used one of their wartime articles to gather intelligence on German scientists and what they were accomplishing for the Luftwaffe.[74]

Following the war, now Colonel Armstrong would assign Strughold to be a director of the Army Air Force Aero Medical lab in Heidelberg. This was a classified facility and Strughold brought his friends Benziger and Ruff into the fold into the newly established American facility that had once been the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Medical Research. Classified 'Top Secret', their mission statement may have said it all: "The exploitation of certain uncompleted German aviation medical research projects."[75]

Thus was the true impetus for Operation Paperclip conceived.

Annie Jacobsen, in her book Operation Paperclip: The Secret Intelligence Program That Brought Nazis To America, cites the amazement of US Army Air Corps commanders and scientists at the advanced wonders of German technology: "There was equipment here that American physicians had never seen before: esoteric items including a Nagel Anomaloscope, a Zeiss-made interferometer, an Engelking-Hartung adaptometer, a Schmidt-Haensch photometer, and a precision-built Siemens electron microscope -- with which to study night vision, blood circulation, g-forces and the bends."[76]

This was nothing short of magic to the US Army scientists and they had to have some to play with, too.

During the last months of the war in Europe, Allied forces were scrambling to capture the various weapons technologies developed by the Germans[77]. Not to be left out, the US Army Air Forces were being directed from Wright Field to gather as much Luftwaffe equipment and engineers as they could capture[78]. Sometimes this effort involved working with Ian Fleming's legendary 30 Assault Unit, itself gathering goodies on classified operations for British Intelligence[79]. It was during the aftermath of a raid of the slave tunnels of the Nordhausen rocket manufacturing facility and more specifically with the discovery of massive wind tunnels used for advanced aeronautic research at Volkenrode that a US Army Air Force commander, Major General Hugh Knerr made a suggestion: Why not fly German scientists along with the Luftwaffe equipment directly to the United States?[80]

Citing the need for using German technology to defeat Japan, Maj General Knerr kicked off the paper trail to the War Department that would lead to US Army contracts for captured German scientists.[81]

Where were these first captured German scientists bound for?

Wright Field, of course. With the US Army Air Force up to its flight scarf in Operation Paperclip's origins, the next stage of development in USAF aviation medicine history would commence.

Enter Otis Benson.

To The Stars

America's manned space exploration may have really been put into practical reality because of the vision of Otis Otto Benson, a Minnesota native who earned his MD at the University of Chicago's Rush Medical College in 1930.

Earning a commission in the Medical Reserve Corps in 1931, Benson graduated from the School of Aviation Medicine in 1932. Following various assignments, Benson went to the Mayo Foundation in 1939 to study aviation physiology and medicine. In 1940, he took command of the Aeromedical Research Unit at Wright Field. It is Otis Benson who would push the United States Air Force into outer space.[82]

Benson would take Armstrong's research and advancements of oxygen delivery systems into the stratosphere and beyond. He would separate the Aeromedical laboratory from the equipment development lab and expand its physiological, biophysical and clinical research functions. Benson would also propel Armstrong's altitude chambers forward, overseeing the development of the Anti-G suit. By the time of America's involvement in WW2, Benson was designing the next generation of oxygen delivery systems that would benefit our high-altitude bomber crews. Otis Benson pushed the air force higher and farther thus providing the aircraft engineers inspiration to take humans higher and reach for the stars.[83]

Reaching for the stars is exactly what Otis Benson was doing with the United States air forces.

After serving in North Africa and Italy with the Fifteenth Air Force and then as chief surgeon of the US Army Air Force in the Mediterranean, for which he earned a Bronze Star among other decorations, Benson returned to the States following the war. In November, 1945 Benson was assigned Chief of the Medical Research Division in the Office of the Air Surgeon in Washington DC. This put under his direct supervision all American air force aviation science.[84]

Benson was now in command of the Aeromedical Laboratory at Wright Field, the School of Aviation Medicine at Randolph Field in Texas, and the Aeromedical Center in Heidelberg, Germany. There was nothing happening at these facilities and units that Benson did not know about and much had his hand in it. This also put Benson into the Operation Paperclip mix as it was happening.[85]

There is no way Benson, as commander of the Aeromedical Center, would not have known about the employment of German scientists and doctors brought under the wing of the American air force during this time, especially via Heidelberg. The facts show that not only was he aware, Benson was a proponent of Paperclip scientists assigned to his mission and units.[86]

To understand Benson's role in USAF involvement with Operation Paperclip, you have to know what motivated him. All this focus on high altitude and oxygen delivery systems and pressure suit development indeed served wartime needs, but Benson was working on these technologies years prior to the war.[87]

Long before his American peers, Otis Benson was pursuing the understanding of human physiology in outer space. What the war did was provide Benson with the opportunity to gather everything the Germans had done on aerospace research between 1939 and 1945 and use it to expand the US air forces program. By 1950, Benson had the US Air Force studying planetary atmospheres and weightlessness and the School of Aviation Medicine under his supervision designed and built a spacecraft cabin simulator. You could say Benson did more than any other commander to push America into space.[88]

In 1951, Otis Benson planned and sponsored the first international symposium on space medicine,a and then published a book titled Physics and Medicine of the Upper Atmosphere co-authored with C.S.White. Following an assignment in DC as chief of USAF medical staffing, Benson returned as commander of aviation medicine in September of 1956, eighteen months after my father entered the air force. By 1958, the year of events of concern to this book, Benson had expanded his Department of Space Medicine and focused its mission on all physiological aspects of manned space travel.[89]

This means that Otis Benson was not only aware of whatever the US Air Force was doing in space in the 1950s, he was one of the architects of its manned space program. This means that Otis Benson supervised whatever the USAF was developing under its stewardship of the pre-NASA Mercury program, in particular the pressure suit upon which my father's unit at George AFB conducted the ground tests in the altitude chamber. My dad spent nearly all of his service time under space-minded Otis Benson driving American aviation medicine and physiological training units.

I first learned about Otis Benson while doing research for this book, specifically where Operation Paperclip was concerned. As supervisor of US Army Air Corps aviation science facilities in Heidelberg, Benson was involved with Harry Armstrong in bringing 58 captured Germans into the American fold. This included Hubertus Strughold, Benziger, Ruff and others. Benson would also bring controversial Major General Dr Walter Schreiber to the School of Aviation Medicine.[90]

Walter Schreiber was the Third Reich's highest ranking doctor at his rank level and served as Commanding Officer of the Scientific Section of the Military Medical Academy in Berlin, essentially the Nazi Surgeon General. He came to the United States following capture by the Russians in 1945 and, after sixteen months in Soviet custody, Schreiber emerged as a witness in the Nurmeburg Trials, ratting out colleagues whose deeds he had supervised. In 1948, after more than three years 'captivity', Schreiber showed up in the west claiming to have escaped the Russians. In spite of being on the US Army Central Registry of War Criminals and Security Suspects list, Walter Schreiber was brought into the Paperclip program.[91]

The fact is that, two weeks prior to his public emergence following 'escape' from the Soviets, Schreiber had been in the protective custody of the US Counter Intelligence Corps. Initially brought in under Paperclip to work at Camp King in Germany, where his duties involved early OSS/CIA research into advanced interrogation methods, which will be discussed further in this book. With

Wright Field pushing for German scientists, Schreiber would soon be assigned to the School of Aviation Medicine in Texas.[92]

Schreiber was not the only Nazi scientist embraced by the USAF via Operation Paperclip, of course. History shows there were several but we will concern ourselves with those whose work for the USAF have impact upon my dad's strange account.

One of these was the aforementioned Dr Benziger who hosted a 1942 gathering with Heinrich Himmler in which Dr Sigmund Rascher presented motion picture footage of Nazi medical experiments on human subjects from concentration camps. My father had told me of watching old German films on altitude chamber tests during the war years, gruesome films demonstrating the effects of decompression on human subjects.[93]

In spite of Benziger's murky past and direct involvement with Nazi war criminals, he was inexplicably released from the Nuremburg trials and released to US Army Air Force custody to contribute to their research work. Wright Field quickly took advantage Benziger's paper on pilot physiology in extremely high altitudes of stratospheric aircraft. Thus did Benziger end up on the coveted Paperclip list and in the United States, courtesy of the US Army Air Force.[94]

Ultimately, with their pasts catching up to them, some Paperclip scientists would fall under scrutiny of the press and an appalled American public. By that time, the fairly young US Air Force would as discreetly as it could release certain German scientists from their contracts, among them was Walter Schreiber whose story the readers of my book Origin will find particularly interesting.

With the truth about his involvement in war crimes being exposed, Schreiber's days in America were numbered. Armstrong committed to documentation the instruction that a severance between Schreiber and the USAF be affected within six months. There was a perception that the US Air Force was working to keep its Nazi scientists in spite of wartime criminal activities that had been previously swept under the rug, not assuaged by the fact that Otis Benson had tried and failed to secure a university job for Schreiber to stay in the US. There was nothing for the former Nazi Surgeon General to do but 'get out of Dodge', so to speak. He requested his daughter who lived in Buenos Aires assist him with quickly obtaining a visa to Argentina but the FBI was listening an intercepted his efforts.[95]

With the decision by the Joint Chiefs that Schreiber was after all not actually useful to the School of Aviation Medicine anymore, US Army Intelligence agent D.A. Roe, G-2, contacted a high ranking Argentine military official and asked if Schreiber could be of any use to them. Thus was Schrieber and his ardent Nazi wife (she had actually joined the party without hesitation in 1931) flown by the USAF to New Orleans where they boarded a ship for Buenos Aires, the US government paying for personal protection throughout the immigration process and providing a 'travel allowance' the amount of which remains unknown today. What happened after that is interesting indeed.[96]

Dr Walter Schrieber and his wife spent the remainder of their lives living comfortably on an estate in that legendary Nazi refuge called San Carlos de Bariloche, on an estate named after the summer palace of Frederick the Great. Schrieber would subsequently be allowed to add 'von' to his name, and be recognized by unidentified German officials as a descendant of Prussian royalty. This little epilogue in Schrieber's life should ring familiar to readers of Origin.[97]

I have demonstrated that upon closer inspection it was the US Army Air Force, soon to become the independent US Air Force, that was most adamantly behind the push for Operation Paperclip.

Manned space exploration was the primary enthusiasm of Otis Benson and the German scientists who had done the most to push humankind to the stars in the first half of the 20th Century were brought over to greatly aid Benson's vision.

Otis Benson's command of USAF aviation medicine research did more to push America into space than any other US program for over a decade after the war -- and this is the milieu in which my father was assigned and worked throughout his entire four-year enlistment.

The Operation Paperclip impact on American aviation medicine and my dad's story by no means ended with Schrieber's departure, for the US Air Force kept the most useful Nazis and expanded its pursuits into stranger waters with dedicated effort to cloak the fruits of that relationship. The USAF adventure into outer space was about to get weirder.

But before we venture much further into that, I must again address the maddening mess known as Roswell...

CHAPTER NINE

Don't believe the church and state
And everything they tell you Believe in me, I'm with the High Command...

-- Mike Rutherford & B. A. Robertson

One cannot go too far into our context and anything USAF relative to UFOs without addressing what we have come to call, in a word, 'Roswell'.

Roswell has proven the most laborious of any chapter in this book. So why, after all the years of stuff published on the subject, a little good and a lot bad, would I venture into the Roswell mire? Because my first exposure to the whole thing was through my father and his strange tale. Roswell is at the heart of what my dad claimed happened to him.

So here we must go.

There has been such a volume of stuff written, produced, surmised, claimed and presented on this subject that I had to remind myself what the scope of this book is: An attempt to explain my dad's story, not to do another book on Roswell. Therefore I will do my best to keep that aim true.

After years of much thought and studied analysis on this issue, it is my conclusion that the very existence of the US Air Force is directly related to whatever the 'Roswell incident' might actually have been. But don't get too excited about that just yet.

My argument begins simply with the National Security Act of 1947 which created the Central Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency and the independent United States Air Force[98]. Signed by President Truman on July 26, 1947, this act had been introduced to the US Senate by John Gurney, Republican senator from South Dakota, on 3 March of that same year[99] -- pretty much exactly four months to the day prior to the infamous occurrence near Roswell, New Mexico, as popularly reported. Is this mere coincidence?

I don't think so. The reader may choose to dismiss any correlation between the National Security Act and Roswell but, to be honest, the juxtaposition of the two events is too suspicious to dismiss the idea so hastily. The key to this particular perspective is acknowledging that Roswell could have been anything, not solely something from another world. It could have been an early Russian satellite. It could have been an advanced Russian aircraft. It could have been something that our real world cold war foes managed to put into our skies over our most advanced military installations. Those options alone could reasonably have placed Senate Bill 758[100] on the fast track to the President's desk.

For the record, I don't think it was a Russian anything that crashed in July 1947, if indeed something crashed 'that day'[101], whatever day it actually may have been. I can't tell you what it was for certain and no one likely can unless they have access to whatever classified file exists on the issue.

If you expected me to spend valuable space and time restating all the details both known and alleged about Roswell, you haven't read my other books. On this subject, do your homework. I don't write for the person who 'just dropped onto the planet from the turnip truck'. If you have really never ever heard anything about Roswell then I doubt you'd be reading this book in the first place.

Essentially, 'Roswell' refers to the report of something unidentified that crashed in the desert near the town of that name in New Mexico during the first week of July, 1947. It blew up into a big UFO flying saucer mystery over the years until the popular scenario imploded under the weight of foolishness and lies.

The USAF made attempts to pass it off as weather balloon technology but few people believe that explanation (including those without foil on their head), even if a weather balloon did happen to have gone down relative to the identified dates. I have issues with the weather balloon story myself.

I'm an inactive USAF reserve officer. During my active duty time, I served as an AFOSI agent, which the reader likely knows by now. I don't buy the weather balloon story and I have been professionally acquainted with Colonel Richard Weaver whom I respect and have no doubt was doing exactly what was determined to be done as regards Roswell and the public demand for information. So why do I not accept the weak Air Force dog-and-pony hoo-ha in the so called 'Weaver Report'? Because I think there's something big enough to keep secret for fifty years -- at the time of the report and nearly seventy years as of this writing.

What could that possibly be?

To begin with, you must understand that we don't have a fifty year rule in this country. Our classified information and technology does not automatically get declassified fifty years after classification. There is no expiration date, no 'statute of limitations' on such national defense secrets. Suck it up and enjoy every bite because that's just the way it is and ought to be. If the Department of Defense and the USAF are keeping Roswell close to vest it's because the secret is still considered vital. Period.[102]

So what could Roswell possibly have been, in my learned opinion, to remain so highly classified?

I say it was something so paradigm changing that it expedited a restructuring of how we did everything as regards national defense. A Russian satellite or aircraft did not qualify, even in those early tentative and somewhat paranoid days of a growing cold war. I argue this because any Russian satellite, no matter how 'space age', and especially any Russian jet aircraft, would have been recognizable as such -- because we each had Germans designing this stuff for us too and we knew their engineering repertoire.

What crashed in New Mexico had to have been something not just more advanced than what history tells us we had at the time, it had to have been something our War Department and President did not want anyone outside the event to even suspect existed.

What could have been so secretive and paradigm-changing about something that would have specifically crashed in New Mexico in 1947, particularly within the context of the time?

In my opinion, it had to have been either something of our own doing or from a source which the War Department might have had a hard time explaining so soon after supposedly becoming the dominant military power on Earth following WW2 victory.

Why do I think this?

The concern about the Soviet Union wasn't much of a secret. There was already a growing cold war, very much stoked by War Department assessments, one of which we shall discuss later in this book. There was already an awareness about the Russians and other communist agents in the public awareness. In actuality, the military industrial complex of the west could have used a Russian sourced event to make great hay in support of gaining public support for budgetary demands and operations.

But I don't think the Soviets were behind the crash in New Mexico for one very good reason: A Russian source of whatever crashed would have been the best Christmas gift the Soviets could have given the US military in 1947. See what those bastard commies are up to?!

Clearly whatever crashed at Roswell must have ignited the need to restructure our War Department and defense apparatus into a new juggernaut of agencies and a shiny new and quite powerful US Air Force, right? We suddenly learned that They were out there and coming here, right?

Not necessarily. In fact, the National Security Act was already in the works before that which is Roswell happened.

In January 1947, JCS 1779 was enacted, essentially stating that the best defense of western Europe against the growing Soviet threat would be a strong rebuilt Germany[103]. On 12 March 1947, the President delivered what is called the Truman Doctrine in which he pledged that the US would contain Soviet communist influence in Greece and Turkey and soon in various other hot spots around the world[104].

Note the date on the Truman Doctrine, just nine days after Senate Bill 758, the National Security Act, was introduced to Congress.

The impetus for the National Security Act of 1947 was not ETs crashing at Roswell. It was drafted and proposed against a backdrop of civil war in China between Chiang Kai-shek's national forces and the communist aggression of Mao Zedong's collectivist horde[105]. Communism was on the rise and the West was nervous. It was a time when any public support in opposition to communism would be highly valued, to say the least, and in particular any public rally specifically against the Soviets.

So I ask the reader: If what crashed at Roswell had been Soviet, do you really think a seventy year lid would have been clamped down on it? Even after a few decades of the Cold War? After the fall of the USSR? No matter how advanced their technology could have been, a Soviet UFO crashing in 1947 would have been revealed long before now, one way or another. That's why I'm of the opinion that Roswell was not a Russian incident.

So what was it?

Options

If 'Roswell' happened, I personally do not think it was extraterrestrial.

The evidence and the facts of Roswell do not actually support the popular ET theory very well. Neither anymore does the Roswell literature over the past several years effectively convince in favor of ET because too many alleged witnesses proved to be full of crap and only a handful of what you could call legitimate witnesses were ever actually interviewed (or had their testimony presented). Essentially, the ET hypothesis for Roswell is presently what we might call 'a pile of horseshit'. It just doesn't work to explain the situation anymore, if it ever truly did, beyond wishful thinking.

For starters, let's go back to what my father told me he was briefed: a craft that crashed in New Mexico was of primary interest to the US Army Air Force and was taken to Wright Field to be assessed by top aerospace technology experts of the day.

As to the crew, my dad said they were as human as us, though virtually hairless. He also said they were no threat, which may prove a problem for at least one of the below categories, if true. However, as we shall see in a coming chapter, there may be good reason to question aspects of my father's memories of this experience, and there remains too much evidence to dismiss said category, which the ET faithful will lament (to my never-ending amusement).

Basically, my conclusion is, if something crashed there around the time in question, what crashed at Roswell was likely a product of one of four categories:

a. An early US attempt at manned spaceflight,

b. A postwar Nazi technology

c. A group separate from publicly known civilization, inclusive of a 'breakaway' option, but not necessarily so.

d. A US experiment with exotic technology originally captured from the Germans and expanded upon by our Paperclip scientists.

Please note that I argue the sources of the first three were all essentially human. These three make the most sense to me and especially so within the context of my dad's experience. The fourth is in a different category yet relative to all we have discussed already.

I place my categories of possibility in a specific order for a reason. There are too many German aerospace engineers in the mix in 1947 to ignore in favor of an extraterrestrial assumption. Let's look at the first one: the possibility of an early manned US spaceflight.

Dream Come True?

Werner von Braun, Hermann Oberth, Werner Dahm, Konrad Dannenberg, Krafft Arnold Ehricke, Walter Riedel, and others were all known to have been obsessed with manned space exploration from their youth and well before any Reich employment during WW2. According to one Operation Paperclip interviewer, Riedel in particular was obsessed with outer space vehicles and told the army officer of about forty other scientists equally dedicated to this objective of manned space flight[106]. These captured German rocket scientists, aerospace engineers and aviation medicine specialists were more than anxious to put their knowledge into venturing man to the stars because it's what they wanted to do in the first place, before Hitler came along in their lives.

So, do you still think that the only American attempts to put man into space are those publicly documented exploits of NASA since the 1960s?

You honestly find it hard to entertain that the possibility the western world's foremost rocket scientists, obsessed with going into space their entire lives, and given the resources and license by the United States government to spread their wings, would not have proposed and could not have convinced a postwar American air force -- staffed with plenty of its own space travel fanboys -- to even attempt to put men into space at least once?

You seriously find it hard to believe that this was tried?

Really?

I must point out a statement made by Kevin Randle and Donald Schmitt in The Truth About The UFO Crash at Roswell: "Reviewing the records of the time, there was nothing that was happening then that was so highly classified it couldn't be discovered today." Pg 145.

Unless it indeed remains so highly classified to this day!

No disrespect intended, but that was spoken like someone not read into a particular program and who isn't aware that they don't know what they are talking about. There are exceptions to declassification rules and things can and do remain classified indefinitely.[107]

Only the willful mind in stubborn denial would so easily dismiss the idea of a secret USAF space program and I am certain some readers will still take this curious and amusing position. For me, I think putting men into space was likely among the first things they thought of doing the day they were installed at Ft Bliss and the various sites next door in New Mexico, regardless of their contracted duties as regards missile technology, etc etc etc. The right guys were in the right place at the right time.

Oh, golly. What was that? Space travel obsessed Paperclip Nazi rocket scientists and aerospace engineers in New Mexico in the late 1940s? That couldn't have been the source of the Roswell incident. Don't even consider it!

I find any flat out denial of the possibility that Roswell was a classified American attempt at manned space travel to be foolish. There were too many of the right people and too many of the requisite resources on hand for it to not have been attempted at least once. That's why I propose that the answer to Roswell could have been just that, first manned venture into space by the United States[108].

So what about what my dad said? Well, an Army Air Corps crew would have been human, so that fits. And the hairless descriptor? Again, we will be examining my dad's memory of the briefing he claimed to receive, but for now the hairless aspect might have been because the hair was simply burned or radiated off[109]. Might the Van Allen radiation belts have been responsible for that? Just a wild ass guess to consider.

The object that crashed at Roswell having possibly been a deeply classified American attempt at manned spaceflight also fits my dad's statements over the years that what crashed was not a threat to our national security. If it was ours, it was not a threat, plain and simple.

So why might such an attempt have remain classified (and lied about and covered up) for seventy years?

That is where the trouble lies for this early American space mission theory because any historical US air forces attempt at going into space would not have been such a shocker to Apollo era Americans. Certainly by 1995, the USAF would not have egg on its face for admitting it had valiantly attempted manned spaceflight in those heady postwar days of 'Right Stuff'[110] exploits. The American people would have dug that. But we didn't get that particular press conference so, if it happened, why the secrecy?

What comes to my mind are two possible reasons, both of them controversial.

First: the attempt might not have had full approval.

The German scientists and the US Army Air Force might have privately committed to the flight and cleverly cloaked it within a standing order to pursue rocket technology, coyly embedding the presence of a human crew under an aviation medicine mandate.

Putting a human crew aboard a mandated rocket test flight would have been a logical way to test the ceiling and operations of aerospace technology while also gathering vital real world data -- not lab simulations -- of the effects of 'high altitude' on human physiology. What better way to be frugal with taxpayer dollars? Imagine if it had worked!

I will not be surprised if we ultimately learn that a secret attempt at manned space flight is the secret of Roswell.

But I also suspect we should have learned such a thing by now -- unless the other possibility for secrecy is valid: This hypothetical first manned American spaceflight kicked off a secret air force space program.

If the Roswell object was associated with a secret US military-industrial complex space program that still exists today, therein lies the reason why it might remain classified, denied and covered up seventy years later.

The aforementioned Harry Armstrong and Otis Benson provide the reason to suspect a secret US air forces space program. Both men were dedicated to aviation medicine and most specifically within a context of high altitude. Benson especially pushed toward space travel.

Armstrong and Benson were in command of the very S&T units which determined the focus of aerospace technology pursuits where human physiological limits were the focus and the units relative to advanced flight technology. Everything they did resulted in what would have been required to know to keep humans alive in space. Do you really think neither one of these men would have been enticed by the proposal that they attempt a manned flight beyond the bonds of the planet?

Look again at what Armstrong and Benson pioneered for the United States Army Air Force: altitude chambers, pressure suits, oxygen delivery systems, long term flight cabin simulation tests. Sure, these served the development of the high altitude aircraft of the Strategic Air Command, but that wasn't the actual endgame of this research.

We will, in the next chapter, get into exactly what Otis Benson pushed for in the pursuit of space travel, the point is that Armstrong and Benson's work, coupled with what the Paperclip space scientists and rocket engineers brought to the launchpad. All led to the Mercury manned space effort -- and that was originally a USAF program, before NASA even existed.[111]

Now that's interesting. The USAF officially started America's manned space program. But we shouldn't get too excited about that because NASA quickly took that pursuit all to itself, right?

What makes you think the USAF stopped developing manned space programs after NASA was created? Because you didn't see it on TV or didn't learn about it in school or it's not in the history books? Excuse me while I laugh my ass off. To outright deny the possibility of a deeply classified USAF manned space program would be the height of foolish cocksurety that might impress children and pretty girls, but it makes you look like an idiot, to me. And pay close attention that I say I could be wrong, of course, but to dismiss the possibility is what's foolish.

The point here is that what happened in New Mexico in 1947 could have been a crash of a classified US Army Air Force manned spacecraft and, if not exactly approved as such at a higher level, might have been a potential disaster for the commanders who were involved, thus the secrecy and the apparent tomfoolery serving to confuse future investigators. I think this security lid would definitely have tightened significantly if this craft actually represented the first flight of a secret space program, especially in the early years of the Cold War.

How does this reflect on what my dad told me?

The passing years and other factors -- factors we will be getting into in the remainder of this book -- may have served to confuse my dad's recall, i.e. he could have attached a murky recollection to the easiest anchor available: public interest in the Roswell incident. In other words, my dad may have been briefed on the above proposed crash of a secret USAF craft and years later connected it with Roswell. There are specific reasons I suggest this and we will explore them in future chapters.

So on to the next category: a postwar player who shouldn't have been.

Those Pesky Nazis

This is the one the ET crowd absolutely despises.

This possibility offers some decent evidence, i.e. technologies documented in the known Nazi S&T record of accomplishment or research. This possibility also comes with a very good reason for keeping it a secret: We were supposed to have vanquished these guys -- and thoroughly. If the folks learned that not only did a bunch of them escape capture but they were developing their own whiz-bang stuff that outdid ours, there would be outcry and hell to pay.

Let's take a look at the technology. This will require much consideration of the most hated book by Joseph P Farrell, Roswell and the Reich: The Nazi Connection. Talk about inconvenient! I won't name names but some of the people I know who despise this book have never even read it. They take the easy road and invariably resort to ad homonym attacks on the author. We know what that usually means: They cannot legitimately argue his theory down.

According to Farrell's review of the Corso material, and the legend in general, the following technologies found in the Roswell crash debris that show correlation to Nazi technology are:

Super strong metal or other material
Fiber optics
Kevlar
Night vision
Lasers and particle accelerators
Transistors and integrated circuits
Portable atomic power for air and space craft[112]

'What?!' you say 'The Nazis had that stuff?!'

Let's see what Farrell says about that:

Super strong metal. Author researcher Henry Stevens reports that in British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report #142, an informant reported German advances in metallurgy that British scientists didn't want to accept, so they subsequently discredited their own source!

Stevens found what looks for all the world like Allied interviewers reporting stuff they cite as untrustworthy but are reporting it anyway, in detail. In the case of BIOS Report 142, the informant said the Germans had by 1936 discovered a way to harden steel and aluminum beyond currently known limits. He said it was called 'Impervium', identified the inventor and the details of the process and even named the city where the foundry doing it was located. Stevens even found that TRW had acknowledged the German advances and used the process themselves.[113]

Farrell concedes the problem with this is that we would have seen invincible German military machinery and clearly we were able to shoot down their planes, destroy their tanks and so forth. His point -- and it is a solid one -- is that Nazi Germany was indeed working on and making great strides in super strong metals over ten years before Roswell.

Fiber optics. The basic concepts leading to fiber optics dates back to Alexander Graham Bell in the 19th Century. In the following century, the Nazis are known to have been researching what they called 'optical telephony' -- prior to the end of the war per German documents captured in 1945, more than two years before Roswell.[114]

Farrell admits that this was specifically undefined but analyze the term and the implication is there. 'Optical' refers to the visual realm, as is light. 'Telephony' refers to the transmission of the medium, sound in the most familiar case, light being the optical option. Farrell correctly suggests that the Nazis even looking into whatever this was implies that fiber optics might not have been far beyond them. They were within the realms of the concept years before Roswell happened.

Kevlar. Farrell concedes that he knows of no specific Nazi documentation that reveals their pursuit of a material specifically such as Kevlar, but he points out that I.G.Farben, a major element of the Nazi military-industrial complex was indeed working on advanced fibers and materials.[115]

Farrell points out waterproof material that Farben had developed before the end of the war and suggests, again, that the Nazis were known to be working on super strong metals. Their industrial machine was indeed pursuing endurance-property materials like waterproofing. This reasonably suggests that super strong fabrics, thus an early Kevlar, would not likely have been beyond them either.

Night vision. To show a possible Nazi development trail of something like our night vision of today, Farrell provides photographs of two Nazi German devices deployed during WW2: German infrared equipment deployed on Panzer Medium Tanks and the infrared device deployed on German naval vessels. Again, manufactured and used during the war, thus years prior to Roswell. Infrared puts the Nazis within the realm of night vision technology pursuits.[116]

Lasers and particle accelerators. Farrell offers a Nazi document dated May of 1944 which specifically discusses the 'Cascade Principle' in conjunction with the need of a facility for the manufacture of high-voltage and large current intensity. Farrell writes: "The Cascade Principle is the very principle that lasers employ to cohere light into non-diverging beam." The cited Nazi German document alone precedes Roswell by three years.[117]

Transistors and integrated circuits. Farrell again presents photograph evidence, in this case of Nazi

German history with transistors, by showing Klystron tubes developed and produced by Telefunken between 1940 and 1941. That's not all: He also presents a photo of German semi-conductor chips captured by the Allies during the war. All of this was, again, over five years prior to Roswell.[118]

Portable atomic power for air and space craft. Presented as evidence for Nazi precedent to Roswell on this technology is Dr. Franz Josef Neugebauer himself, cleared for 'urgent' work with the US Army Air Force because of his specialty in thermal systems for aircraft nuclear propulsion. It turns out that Allied postwar review of the Skoda factory and documents revealed the atomic pursuits were quite a bit more accomplished than we have been led to believe in the hubris of victory. And once again, this was years before Roswell.[119]

I could go on and on with the numerous pages of examples and evidence, and there are 515 pages in the book. Farrell makes his point and that is this: What the Nazis are proven to have been developing or pursuing before and during the war precedes the same specific or developmentally similar technological items claimed to have been harvested from the Roswell crash debris. This plainly suggests that the alleged Roswell technological items which Corso and others have claimed were retrieved from the crash could have been of human manufacture.

If they could have been human, specifically Nazi German, then it renders the popular assumption that these items must have been exclusively of extraterrestrial manufacture null and void. The known German items pointed out by Farrell do not need to be exact matches for his theory to be valid, in spite of what the naysayers will cry (and they will).

Of course this does not eliminate the non-human possibility entirely, it merely demonstrates that another more earthly origin is indeed valid. This possibility should consequently alter perspectives on Roswell.

Perhaps that was the point of Corso's book. We should ask what was the Colonel up to exactly?

If what crashed at Roswell was postwar Nazi technology -- and the reason for secrecy is because the US military knew this -- then what are we now to wonder about Colonel Corso apparently letting the cat out of the bag in his book? If Farrell can so easily demonstrate a correlation between said recovered Roswell crash technology, why reveal it at all if it's such a big secret? Or is there another possibility?

Corso was in fact assigned to the Foreign Technology Division of US Army Intelligence. If anyone had on file the Nazi developments that Farrell cites, it would have been this unit. Corso may have simply applied what he learned of these Nazi technologies to his account of involvement with Roswell. But by the time his book was published, this was already in the public realm so why would Corso do that if he wanted the reader to believe in the narrative he presents, that it was alien, not in the human technology repertoire until after Roswell?

What was the true objective of Corso's book?

Karl T. Pflock, among others, suggested there never was a crash of anything but a weather balloon array at Roswell in the summer of 1947. In his investigations and analyses of Roswell over the course of several years, Pflock ultimately found what many others had to finally concede, that the heretofore 'witnesses' were either exaggerating on faint and fading memories, or repeating stories told by deceased alleged witnesses (kind of like I am doing with this book), or they were flat out full of crap and lying to get attention and maybe make a buck. What Pflock discovered was that Roswell as we have known it has likely been a wishful fantasy.[120]

What could be trouble for Joseph Farrell's theory is Lt Colonel Philip Corso himself.

It's primarily Corso's book from which the Roswell technology harvest story was drawn. However, Corso's book, written with William J. Birnes, is troubled with erroneous statements of historical record thus the book itself is questionable as a reliable source, to some. Pflock also pointed out that Corso seems to draw from the conflicting versions of the Roswell incident itself and that doesn't help his case.[121]

In Roswell: Inconvenient Facts And The Will to Believe, Pflock says of Corso: "My mind boggled. If Corso's egoistic fever dreams were taken as fact, he was responsible for nothing short of making possible the cornerstones of the technological revolution of the second half of the Twentieth Century."

Pflock is speaking of Corso's assignment with the FTD of US Army Intelligence, specifically Corso's claims of having been ordered to seed the 'alien' Roswell technologies out to the military-industrial complex for development. But Corso gets missile programs mixed up when he shouldn't and, more damning, speaks of his 1961 CIA rivals being at Langley when the Agency was still in multiple Washington DC offices around the district before moving to Virginia. These are just a couple examples of why Corso's credibility comes under fire and therefore must also his Roswell claims. [122]

Pflock says further: "Recently longtime ufologist Larry Bryant obtained Corso's FBI files through a Freedom of Information Act request. This reveals a man continually trying to advance his personal agenda...through lies and exploitation..." [Pg 208]

Clearly Pflock found Corso useless as a source. However, there is another possibility that Pflock should and perhaps might have considered or suspected because Pflock was himself a CIA agent[123]: Philip Corso's book on Roswell could have been the final assignment of a 'good soldier'.

Corso's Swan Song?

The Day After Roswell could have been an operation itself. More specifically, the book and Corso's claims could have been designed and provided to him, certain select information carefully embedded within true details of his career. If said information was intended as disinformation, it would serve to lead UFO researchers far astray.

The book could also have been used to discredit the existing field of Roswell research via damning errors sure to be eventually discovered (and they were) thus making anyone who accepted it at face value look like a fool.

But there is a problem with this scenario: Why would Corso agree to ultimately look like the asshole Pflock paints him to be?

That Karl Pflock worked for the CIA at one time must be considered. This does not mean my suggestion is fact. It does not mean Pflock was for a fact involved in such operations as I suggest Corso's book could have been. What I am suggesting simply means that because it is possible that Corso's book was an operation, I wonder if Pflock's damning assessment was part of the objective to discredit the messenger -- and thus any researcher who took Corso's claims seriously. Yes, it suggests that Pflock and Corso were on the same team.

The reader might ask why a long retired military officer would agree to be made out an opportunistic fraud? Why would a UFO researcher agree to alienate (no pun intended) half his audience or more?

Here comes yet another speculative possibility in this festival of supposition: It might be that putting an end to then prevailing view of Roswell and ufology in general was the objective.

If wiping the Roswell slate clean of ET was the primary objective, then what might the desired replacement have been? In a book of blatant historical errors and wild claims, what could said operators have hoped to accomplish with damaged credibility?

The Gold Nugget In A 'Turd'?

Being personally experienced in humint operations for the USAF and others in the US intelligence community, I assure you that not everything passed operationally is a complete lie. So consider Corso's book from my perspective and ask yourself if some of the information conveyed in the book might be true.

More specifically, if an operation, Corso's book might still have revealed factual information where the technology is concerned and that could very well have hint at the real message of the book. This possibility means that Joseph Farrell's theory still has legs.

How, you ask?

If Corso's book is the load of crap that Pflock and others say it is, then we must again ask where did Corso come up with the harvested technology list? Army Intelligence technology analysis, specifically FTD analysis, is the identified source.[124]

As convoluted as I know some of you are bitching that this may be, in this bit of fact we may have found the secret to Corso's book. He could actually have been instructed to use what the US Army FTD knew was advanced Nazi technology and dress it in extraterrestrial terms to serve a perception management operation ultimately damaging to popular ufology's prevailing ET theory -- while also providing a time bomb.

Corso's book may actually have revealed, without anyone seeing it at the time, what Joseph Farrell eventually points out in Roswell and the Reich. It reveals, in my opinion, more truth about Roswell than anyone realized at the time. Perhaps a stretch but Farrell has demonstrated a Nazi thread in the mix, so it is possible and must be seriously considered by any serious investigator of Roswell.

Where the alleged Roswell technology is concerned, and even the crash itself, Joseph Farrell's theory remains the best and most thoroughly presented theory of the Roswell crash hardware so far. Why do I say this and what does it have to do with my dad's story?

Because, like it or not, there were Germans and their technology everywhere in this Roswell landscape in 1947 and these same Germans populated the world of aviation medicine to which my father was assigned and through which was exposed to the elements of his story.

And yet there remains even another fine twist of this theoretical knob. What if the popular Roswell legend indeed came from our previously discussed scenario of a first US attempt at manned spaceflight -- and the technology was indeed so Nazi German in its signature (should Farrell be right) because the craft was designed by our captured Nazi Germans scientists?

The previously discussed possibility of a secret American manned spaceflight using US built components of originally Nazi German design, courtesy of our Paperclip Germans, could quite neatly explain all the secrecy surrounding Roswell. It could explain the subsequent willingness of the USAF to let people think it was ET as long as they could get away with it and even encourage commitment to that belief by releasing the weak target balloon array story that they knew would be questioned. Except for a naive insistence that it 'must goddamnit be ET!', this scenario of an American-Nazi crash could very well 'explain' Roswell and again we can still validate Farrell's postwar Nazi suggestion.

Because of all the Germans we know were in New Mexico in 1947 and in my dad's story, it was necessary to spend some pages acknowledging the very strong possibilities (some would say probability) that the answer to Roswell is the Nazi solution.

And yet, by golly, there remains the aforementioned third suggested possibility.

Someone Else

The secret of Roswell may be that a separate human civilization generally unknown to us was the origin of whatever crashed circa 1947. This is what my dad said is the case, after all.

But what evidence speaks to this suggestion?

The secrecy, for one. The revelation of a hidden civilization of humans possessed of advanced technology might certainly be something the government would desire to keep tightly classified[125]. It might even be that said civilization, now exposed to our government, itself demanded the secrecy.

OK, but again what else is there?

How about the idea of a technology so 'alien' to our own, that it startled the US military, the force that led the Allies to defeat the mighty Third Reich and their formidable Japanese buddies. Imagine the befuddlement over how to approach this new player on the scene. How do you explain to the people of the world that an entire human civilization exists on our world and we didn't know about it until they crashed one of their amazing flying machines?

But is the shock of discovery that we have unknown 'cousins' with amazing gizmos still be enough to clamp such a tight and convoluted lid on this thing called 'Roswell'?

Perhaps but I'm not certain. In fact, I suspect for this 'other human civilization' scenario to work, we likely need to dispense with the idea that our government and others did not know about them.

A scenario in which a separate human civilization coexisting with us could work, essentially unknown as such to the masses, might involve a breakaway civilization.

The Breakaway Option

If what crashed in New Mexico was an air (or space) craft of a breakaway human civilization that particularly wanted to remain unknown to the masses, then seventy years of secrecy and wacky balloon antics make sense if said breakaway made it clear that their existence should remain generally unknown.

Such a civilization, if truly possessed of technology advanced anywhere near the level proposed by Roswell harvest proponents, would certainly be in the position to secure their continued anonymity via the combined advantages of technology transfer and the ability to back up a secrecy agreement with spectacular and resolute force.

Readers of my other works will be familiar with how such a civilization could even have happened. I recommend readers of this book refer to Origin and Empire of the Wheel 2: Friends From Sonora, as well as the breakaway subject as covered by Joseph Farrell, Richard Dolan and Olav Phillips among others. These works lay out a reasonable argument to the question of how, so let us continue with who.

Generally, I argue that two breakaway human civilizations possibly exist, each emerging from 19th Century airship milieus. One was a breakaway from an already existing independent organization. That organization was called NYMZA and was supposedly created by Prussians who I have proposed were dedicated to the creation of a unified Germany, which was indeed achieved. The group that broke off from them was American and I have suggested was first organized under a black project in the post Civil War era. In my other works I provide my analysis and theory about how these groups philosophically opposed one another and took technological leaps and bounds into the 20th Century.

Again, we must ask what author W.A. Harbinson might know, for in his novel Genesis we have his villainous take on Wilson telling another character the following: "How naive you are, Stanford. The world out there is part of the conspiracy, and has been for years. The United States knows about us. The Soviet Union knows about us. The British and the Germans know about us, and all of them deal with us."[126]

In my opinion, if the breakaway possibility is the secret behind the Roswell situation, then the breakaway whose craft crashed in July 1947 was of the NYMZA.

Why them? Because of NYMZA's German origins and Joseph Farrell's Nazi theory regarding the technology harvest -- should that part of Corso's book be true. My readers will be familiar with the direct trail I have proposed between the Prussian NYMZA and Nazi Germany. Because in my analysis the Nazis would have received some technological nudging and a lot of philosophical inspiration from NYMZA sources, it could be that what Farrell's analysis demonstrates is that Nazi Germany was producing their own version of NYMZA technology. This means that a NYMZA craft crashing at Roswell might suggest a revelation of where the Nazis got their knowledge instead of the craft being necessarily a postwar Nazi group's craft as Farrell specifically suggests.

But a NYMZA scenario has issues where my dad's claims are concerned. He insisted that what crashed was not a threat to our national security, specifically that the civilization from which it came was not a threat.

I firmly stand by my position that NYMZA is a threat and has been for a long time. I'm convinced they were in the milieu that created the Nazis. If I am correct, NYMZA would especially be considered a threat right after WW2. Therefore if my dad's version of the story is accurate and a non-threatening breakaway or separate human civilization was responsible for Roswell, it would not be NYMZA.

But if not NYMZA or, by association, not Nazis per se, why did I spent so many pages on the Nazi possibility?

Because the NYMZA inherited their knowledge from ancient information in the first place, according to my theory, the craft of a hidden civilization with ancient pedigree would logically possess that ancestral technology resembling what Nazi Germany would subsequently have been developing, if indeed guided by NYMZA.

Anyone Else?

Could the source of the craft in my dad's story have been the American group that I call the 1903?

That is possible but I decline to suggest this based upon the whole of the details my dad shared which strongly suggest someone else, not the least of which is that he was told their civilization was founded thousands of years ago. I date the 1903 roughly to an 1865 origin and an early 20th Century formal foundation.

What if we might indeed actually be dealing with a civilization that lives mainly under our feet in subterranean regions, as described by my father?

Those elusive Tuatha de Danann could be the answer. Bruce Rux proposes they are simply a spacefaring civilization that originally came from Mars[127] and Robert Charroux paints them as a civilization that made its way to the Americas where it advanced civilization there coincidentally at around the time of Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha[128]. Defeat and retreat into the subterranean realm followed.

The Fourth Suggested Possibility

I proposed earlier that a fourth option to explain Roswell might involve an experiment with exotic technology. This could have some foundation of truth.

With this option, I must go into more esoteric territory, though you will see that it is as pertinent to this book as any of the previous scenarios presented. In the midst of all this stuff in the Roswell milieu, there is an intriguing theory that what happened at Roswell was actually the opening of a portal and the craft which crashed, along with its crew, were beings from another dimension.

Essentially, the story goes that Aleister Crowley's protege, the infamous and legendary would be sorcerer and practicing alchemist Jack Parsons, whom we will discuss in a later chapter, opened a metaphysical doorway through which came the race of beings responsible for the modern UFO wave.

One may choose to simply pass on by the Parsons option but for one thing that sticks in my mind: Nazi technology, specifically 'Die Glocke', that mysterious object shrouded in secrets. Yes, the Nazi Bell[129].

Credited with amazing powers of levitation and manipulation of the space-time continuum, the Nazi Bell has a connection to our story through the Operation Paperclip scientist so vital to USAF aviation medicine and American manned space travel: Hubertus Strughold.

Joseph P Farrell points out that Strughold had worked at Castle Furstenstein during the war and that this linked him to the Kammler project known as the Die Glocke -- The Bell[130]. How interesting that Strughold would then work for USAF aviation medicine with this in his background for the mysterious Bell being associated with stories of anti-gravity. It has been suggested in recent years that NASA may have employed such technology in the Apollo program, and Farrell even suggests the technology may have aided the astronauts in passing safely through the Van Allen belts[131], something Strughold working in aviation medicine would be keen on knowing about.

Hubertus Strughold, rumored to be connected with Die Glocke was indeed considered vital to NASA. Might he have been among Paperclip Germans who possibly convinced US Army Air Force commanders to reconstruct their own bell -- or perhaps reactivated a captured bell -- and this opened a portal in time and space, allowing in whatever crashed? He was in the right place at the right time.

We will return to this option, and Jack Parsons. Admittedly, this last option is too far out on a limb for many readers. Yet, it haunts.

There are some, Karl Pflock for example, who say nothing substantial crashed at Roswell in July 1947. There are many more who would say there is no such thing as these mysterious Children of Anu. I have already stated that I think something substantial did happen in New Mexico in 1947, some sort of Roswell incident. My dad said it happened and this book is about his story.

My dad told me he was briefed on and shown bodies and debris from the incident we know as 'Roswell'. I do not think he was making this up. Everything about his body language and in his voice when he spoke of these events tells me he was speaking the truth as he remembered it -- as he believed it to be so.

But it doesn't mean that it was exactly true.

As fun as it is to consider secret American spaceflight or postwar cosmic Nazi adventurers or even the mysterious hidden or breakaway civilizations, it turns out that something I had never considered presented itself the moment I began to investigate the details of my dad's military service.

It may be that none of what my dad was told about the crash in New Mexico, or even what he said he learned at Wright-Patterson, ever happened. At least. maybe not the version he recalled. That may have been fabrication.

For what, you may ask? The answer to that question proved to be much less disappointing than I first assumed because it does not necessarily eliminate the fantastic.

I won't summarize this chapter because what you accept about Roswell is subjective. What I think is that something happened, but the word 'something' covers a wide spectrum, half of which is on the side of little to nothing. What I will offer that is pertinent to my dad's story is that Roswell's hall of mirrors is the spinning disco ball at the center of something that was done in 1947, was exploited again in the late 1950s, and remains in the bag of official tricks even today.

Let's follow the rabbit into the hall of mirrors and see what we find...

CHAPTER TEN

Things I've never seen before
Behind bolted doors
Talent and Imagination...
-- Danny Elfman

With Roswell and the National Security Act of 1947 behind us, we must return to the USAF of Otis Benson as aviation medicine turns out to have played a more prominent role in this story than I ever imagined.

The 1950s was a curious time for the US Air Force. It appears that embedded within Cold War era responsibilities was an outer space agenda, very specifically a manned space exploration objective. This bold pursuit was actually what one might expect of a brand new independent air force established at the dawn of our space age. In fact, the US Air Force was likely responsible for that birth. The outer space agenda was certainly the driving force of the work my dad was involved with back then.

The other USAF fascination of the period was curious indeed and sleeps deeply in the shadowed past of the otherwise most conservative and shy branch of the US armed forces. I'm speaking of the US Air Force interest in the frontiers of the human mind, the previously untrod landscapes of the psyche.

But first let us address further how my dad might have indeed seen Nazi experiment films, as he claimed he did, during his training in the physiology of high altitude flight.

As discussed earlier, the origin of American aerospace medicine dates back to World War 1 and the US Army Air Corps. Established to conduct research into the physiological and medical aspects of human flight, the program was mainly a training and research function of the US flight surgeon corps. The Air Service Medical Research Laboratory stood up in January 1918 at Hazelhurst Field, at Mineola on Long Island. My father's specialty of decades later had its beginnings here as the Hazelhurst Laboratory employed a small decompression chamber in which US research was begun on human tolerance to high altitudes.[132]

An Aviation Medical Research Board was established to determine conditions that would adversely affect pilot performance in flight, identify who could and who could not perform satisfactorily in high altitudes, seek to develop oxygen delivery systems for pilots and air crews, and provide oversight for all medical and physiological matters related to pilots. It was the Board that established and administrated the laboratory at Hazelhurst. In 1922, the Air Service Medical Research Laboratory and the School for Flight Surgeons, which had been combined during the war, were absorbed into a single School of Aviation Medicine. Four years later, the school was moved to Texas, as noted earlier.[133]

Brooks Field in San Antonio became the home of the School of Aviation Medicine in the summer of 1926 and remained there until late 1931 when it was moved to Randolph Field. Just a few years after that, Wright Field entered the picture.[134]

We know, of course, that Wright Field had actually been in the background of aviation medicine for a while. Though the Physiological Research Unit, Material Division, had a primary charter to develop and provide equipment, some of their physiological research work was overlapping with that of the School of Aviation Medicine. In 1934 it was decided that Wright Field would continue its focus on development and maintenance of the technology vital to the selection, classification and maintenance of the flyer, while the School would assume responsibility for those actual functions.[135]

Among the branches established within the School of Aviation Medicine's Research Department there were what you might expect. Along with physiology, biochemistry, pharmacology, opthalmology, biophysics, dentistry and the like, there was also included a branch dedicated to psychiatry and psychology. These two disciplines are at the heart of my dad's experience and that this branch was established during World War 2 will prove significant, in my opinion.[136]

With the establishment of an independent United States Air Force in shortly after, per the National Security Act of 1947, the demands of the School of Aviation Medicine in Texas increased significantly enough that all enlisted flight medicine courses, the Flight Nurse Course and Physiological Training Officers Course were transferred to the 3882nd School Group of a new branch at Gunter AFB in Alabama. Officially, the primary and advanced courses of aviation medicine, along with the research department, would stay at Randolph Field. It was 1950, just five years before my dad entered the service.[137]

During this period, Brigadier General Otis Benson was commander of the School. He would go to another command in 1953, but by 1956 Benson was back in command of the School and remained so until 1960. My dad spent his second six week TDY at the Gunter Branch of the School in 1958, during Benson's tenure.[138]

Benson was a dedicated and strong-willed figure and we can credit him with taking Harry Armstrong's aviation medicine advancements to their logical next leap forward -- with a little help from the debris of WW2.

Already holding a BA in biology and an MS in biochemistry, Otis Otto Benson Jr earned his MD in 1930 from Rush Medical College and that same year was commissioned into the US Army Medical Reserve Corps as a first lieutenant. In 1932, Benson graduated from the School of Aviation Medicine and followed this with the Army School of Tropical and Preventive Medicine as well as the Medical Field Service School in 1933. Following assignments in Hawaii and the Mayo Foundation, Benson attended Harvard where he further studied aviation physiology. Clearly an outstanding and inquisitive young officer, Benson's next assignment would send him to Wright Field.[139]

It was late 1940 when Benson took command of the Aeromedical Research Unit at Wright Field.

Here his story becomes very interesting, in my opinion, for in spite of the 1934 decision to cease the overlap in aviation medicine research between Wright Field and the School of Aviation Medicine, Benson pulled Aeromedical Research from its assigned Equipment Laboratory and put it back into the business of research into the physiological and biochemical aspects of flight medicine. He even established a clinical research branch.

This new Aeromedical Laboratory employed nationally known scientists and worked with the Mayo Clinic. Its research pursuits led to the development of pressure suit technology that my father would become involved with in the 1950s. Benson's new unit even got its own building at Wright Field and its research continued through the subsequent war.[140]

I find it indicative of what might really be going on at Wright-Patterson throughout US Air Force history that Benson was free to stand up his Aeromedical Laboratory when just six years prior it was determined that the school at Randolph would manage the same research pursuits. Why double the effort? What was so special about what Benson's unit was doing that separated it from the School of Aviation Medicine?

Could Benson's actual mandate at Wright Field have been to develop a US Air Force manned space program?

Looking at the accomplishments under his leadership, Benson's lab did establish a centrifugal studies unit that developed an Anti-G suit and he also personally designed an oxygen delivery system for high altitude bomber crews. Though these developments were clearly within the 1934 decision to focus the Wright Field unit on equipment, the extent to which Benson was allowed to take the Aeromedical Laboratory is nagging. What exactly was going on?

It so happens that Benson was indeed aiming his units at Wright Field to pursue data and technology for human space travel -- years before an official program was thought to have been activated by the Air Force and long before other American medical investigators took an interest.[141]

Benson's units studied the possible effects of space travel on the human body, artificial cycles of day and night, planetary atmospheres, weightlessness, human physiology above 63,000 feet, and the design of space cabin simulators were begun at the School of Aviation Medicine during General Benson's tour as commandant. Clearly these pursuits would produce the equipment necessary for the Strategic Air Command's flight crew operations. However, possibly reflective of the previously suggested secret manned spaceflight attempt, it appears Benson might actually have been chasing the stars in a literal sense.[142]

In November 1951, Benson planned and sponsored the first international symposium on space medicine, which resulted in his book, Physics and Medicine of the Upper Atmosphere, with C.S. White, which became a standard reference text for work in this field.[143]

What This Means

It is my opinion that Benson's focus on space while at Wright Field very possibly led to an operational USAF manned space program, and may also have been mandated by a prior US interest in human exploration of space. I suspect a classified US Air Force manned space program exists to this day.

But let's return to Benson and the US Air Force of the 1950s for a while as much remains where my father's story is concerned.

The USAF and Operation Paperclip

In 1943, Benson shipped off to North Africa for wartime duty with the Fifteenth Air Force. He next served in Italy and was ultimately assigned as top US Army air force surgeon in the Mediterranean. Having received the Legion of Merit, with an oak leaf cluster, and a Bronze Star, Benson returned to the US after the war ended and was made chief of the Medical Research Division. This made him supervisory commander of all technical activities of his Aeromedical Lab at Wright Field, the School of Aviation Medicine and, probably most pertinent to the rest of this book, Benson was the technical supervisor of the German scientists at the Aeromedical Center in Heidelberg, Germany.[144]

American military aviation medicine was about to become more interesting.

With receipt of his new command in late 1945, Otis Benson was now in charge of an important aerospace medical center in occupied Germany. The future of American military aviation science and the soon to be founded US Air Force would benefit in great leaps from a murky association with the notorious Operation Paperclip.

Among those Paperclip Germans discussed in a previous chapter was that physiologist and prominent research scientist Dr Hubertus Strughold, MD, PhD, who headed Aeromedical Research for the Luftwaffe from 1935 until the end of the war. Strughold also served in high-ranking medical positions for the US Air Force (and eventually NASA) becoming known as the 'Father of Space Medicine' for his work in the physiological and psychological effects of space travel, interests he had pursued since 1928.[145]

I would note to the reader two points: Strughold began his career in space medicine research in 1928, and his accomplishments include studying the psychological effects of space travel on the human mind[146]. These are very important points as one lends credibility to the possibility of an attempt at manned space travel decades prior than is usually accepted, and the other offers a clue to my dad's experience.

Especially as a result of Operation Paperclip, both the classified elements of US military space exploration technology and subsequent USAF involvement in psychological research programs have their impact on my dad's experience, courtesy of the influence and contributions of Dr Strughold.

Born in the Prussian province of Westphalia, Hubertus Strughold studied at Munich, Gottingen, Munster, and Wurzburg. His growing interest in aviation medicine led him to a Rockefeller Foundation Fellowship for a term in the United States, studying at Case University in Ohio and the University of Chicago. Strughold returned to Germany in 1933 where he became a professor at the Wurzburg Physiological Institute. Two years later, he was working for the Nazis.[147]

Selected to head up the Research Institute for Aviation Medicine in Berlin, under Hermann Goring's Ministry of Aviation, Strughold turned the organization into Germany's premier aeromedical research establishment. Though a civilian, Strughold's work was financed by the Luftwaffe and was dedicated to German re-armament. The Institute pioneered the study of medical effects of supersonic speeds and also high-altitude, which led to landmark experiments with altitude chambers.[148] You might already see where this is headed.

Strughold would not remain a civilian, his organization being absorbed into the Luftwaffe Medical Service would come with a commission. Strughold achieved the rank of Colonel and served in the newly renamed Air Force Institute for Aviation Medicine, under the command of General Erich

Hippke. In this capacity he would enter a dark association with human experimentation of an atrocious nature.[149]

While attending the conference in Nuremburg in October of 1942, Strughold and Hippke learned of the medical research conducted by their colleague Dr. Sigmund Rascher of the SS, who presented a lecture on his experiments in medical physiology using prisoners of the Dachau concentration camp[150]. Rascher's experiments on human subjects included immersion in freezing water, surgery without anesthetic, and being placed in air pressure chambers. In Rascher's work, we have some confirmation of my dad's claims, as you shall see.

Many of the human subjects died and after the war several of Strughold's close associates mentioned previously were put on trial for war crimes, but the good doctor convinced US authorities that there was nothing he could have done had he 'known' -- in spite of admitting attendance at the conference in which Rascher laid out the details in his presentation.[151]

After the war, Strughold came under suspicion when his name was listed with twelve individuals and organizations that were identified as having committed atrocities during the war. In late 1945, while he was working for the US as chief scientist at the Aeromedical Center, (which, incidentally, was located at the former Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Medical Research), Strughold was tagged for Operation Paperclip and the US Army whisked him away to Randolph Field and the School of Aviation Medicine. His assignment was Otis Benson's pet subject: space travel research.[152]

As a Paperclip scientist working in the United States, Strughold pursued the first landmark studies in atmosphere control, weightlessness, and disruption of time cycles. These all scream 'manned space travel'. Along with the obvious physiological aspects of the research, there was always present the psychological focus.[153]

There are logical reasons for studying pilot stress factors, but Strughold's work was clearly not limited to standard cockpit simulations. Having originated the first known space cabin simulator, Strughold's subjects spent impressive lengths of time inside the small enclosed environment to determine the limits of human physical and mental stresses in space. It's pretty obvious what Benson and the USAF were pursuing and the German scientist's contribution was appreciated. US citizenship for Strughold came in 1956, though two years later he would be investigated for WW2 war crimes, ultimately be exonerated by the Justice Department.[154]

Strughold was at the center of research and design of pressure suits, life support systems, and training of all flight surgeons relative to the Gemini program. Naturally the methods used in America did not involve lethal human experimentation, but Strughold and his peers possessed the knowledge gleaned from such dark practices to benefit of the United States' first pioneering steps into the unknown. In 1962, Strughold would be named chief scientist of NASA's Aerospace Medical Division and provide the same expertise for the Apollo program. It was for Gemini that my dad did ground testing of the flight suits being developed during 1957-58.[155]

What might Strughold have had to do with my dad's service?

Hubertus Strughold would not entirely escape scrutiny for his past. When several of his German Ministry colleagues were put on trial in 1947, Strughold had indeed submitted reference documents in their defense. He had evaded further investigation at the time, and had been exonerated in the 1958 case, but in 1974 was investigated again by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, though that case was dropped due to lack of evidence. The Justice Department apparently decided to ignore their prior ruling and looked at Strughold again in 1983, but dropped the matter when the much vaunted space scientist died three years later. Ironically, it would be US Army documents that would cast the final judgment on Strughold.[156]

By 1993, much more was known about what had gone on at Dachau and Strughold's name turned up on a US Army Intelligence list of war criminals wanted by US authorities. One by one, many honors given to Hubertus Strughold were stripped, ultimately the removal of his name from the Aeromedical Library at Brooks AFB. In 2006, Strughold was even removed from the International Space Hall of Fame in Alamogordo.[157]

What was it that investigators suspected Strughold had done while employed in Nazi Germany's Luftwaffe?

A 2004 investigation revealed that six children from the Brandenburg Euthanasia Center were handed over to Strughold's laboratory in Berlin where they were subjected to experiments in high altitude simulation in vacuum chambers. These children were forced into epileptic seizures in an attempt to simulate altitude sickness, like hypoxia. The children amazingly did not die. But due to a lack of direct evidence to prove Strughold's personal involvement, resistance to further erasure of his name from prestigious awards and facilities emerged based upon his significant contribution to the American space program.[158]

In this troubling situation, I see confirmation of my dad's claim about his altitude chamber training. My father had long ago told me of watching old WW2 German films of human altitude chamber tests. But is it really true?

The Issue of Nazi Training Films

John Marks in The Search for the Manchurian Candidate: The CIA and Mind Control (Times Books, 1979) writes: "Under the cover of 'aviation medicine' inmates were crushed to death in high altitude pressure chambers (to learn how high pilots could safely fly)"[159]

My dad never even hinted that children were the subjects of anything he saw so I doubt he saw the particular experiments involving the Brandenburg center subjects. However, he did tell me that the human test subjects were from concentration camps so I suspect these were films of the Dachau tests by Sigmund Rascher which Strughold likely learned about, and perhaps saw, at that 1942 conference in Nuremburg. Specifics described by my father are indeed gruesome.

As disturbing as this revelation may be to some readers, consider the position of American military aviation scientists. Rather than risk our own personnel or anyone else, why not at least learn from the data already available? I'm confident that was how they looked at it back then.

I am confident that my dad was probably telling the truth where the gruesome Nazi film footage is concerned. Let's continue with making the case for a USAF manned space program.

Goose-Stepping to the Stars

Another of the Heidelberg scientists recruited by Paperclip and assigned to the School of Aviation Medicine at Randolph AFB was Heinz Haber.

A physicist, Heinz Haber also served as a reconnaissance pilot in the Luftwaffe until 1942 when he was assigned to the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Physics. Interestingly, Haber's work there involved building a diffraction spectrograph which implies all sorts of interesting possibilities. Through the late 1940s, Haber worked closely with Strughold on space medicine advances. Together with his brother, Dr Fritz Haber, Heinz developed the simulation of weightlessness via parabolic flight. Heinz was well known for co-hosting Walt Disney's 'Man In Space' television show with Werner von Braun and was the chief science consultant to Disney studios. Heinz was also an associate physicist at UCLA.[160]

Frtiz Haber originated the parabolic training idea for astronauts, simulating weightlessness via flying a plane like a roller coaster. The now famous KC-135 'Vomit Comet' is the legacy of Fritz and his brother. But before all the fun in America, Fritz Haber worked for the German aircraft company Junkers in Dessau during the war. His contribution there also resulted in a lasting American space program legacy: Fritz Haber created the piggyback system of missile delivery which NASA would later modify to transport the Space Shuttle on the back of a 747.[161]

At the end of the war, Fritz missed capture by the Russians only because he had been in western Germany for the birth of his son when the zones were seized. He was instead captured by the United States and brought into the Paperclip fold, like his brother. Interestingly, along with his work for the US Air Force, Fritz would work for Avco Lycoming[162], a rocket engine manufacturer that was funded with capital from W. A. Harriman with whom readers of my breakaway research will be familiar.

I mention the Habers not because there is evidence of Nazi atrocity in their background[163] but rather for the suggestion of perception management and breakaway association, respectively.

Heinz' association with Disney was for the purpose of promoting human space exploration, specifically for civilian consumption. That Disney produced such a series is not without a national interest motive, specifically the implied defense benefits of American superiority off planet. However, Fritz' employment with Avco could imply some vague connection to a private space program, in particular to the Prussian group that I have written about elsewhere.[164]

And speaking of Prussians, there is another of Benson's recruits to whom we must return: Dr. Walter Schreiber.

MREs On Mars?

You may be wondering why the story of Major General Dr Walter Schreiber has anything to do with my father's story. In an examination of strange events that might suggest a secret USAF space program, anything associated with secret space program lore may be pertinent.

The possibility that a classified space program started by the US Air Force in the 1950's may explain aspects of my dad's story will be discussed later, but let's consider one last nagging issue about Dr Schreiber with this topic in mind.

That Schreiber's alleged assignment for the School of Aviation Medicine was research into survival and nutrition in remote locations[165] is suggestive. If you assume that this was merely to support deployed USAF personnel on Diego Garcia or downed pilots somewhere in Mongolia, you have to ask just what did a Nazi scientist know about such relatively mundane issues that Otis Benson and the Joint Chiefs spent so much energy and concern to keep him in the fold and facilitate his escape to South America?

What was Walter Schreiber really doing for the US Air Force School of Aviation Medicine? Might his survival and nutrition research have been in anticipation of remote environments not on Earth?

It could explain some things.

SUMMARY

The facts demonstrate the direct link between Operation Paperclip and the USAF School of Aviation Medicine, which my father attended twice. In fact, aviation medicine seemed to have driven much of Operation Paperclip to begin with, something I admittedly had not known before working on the research for this book.

It was the US Army Air Force that recruited 58 German scientists via Operation Paperclip[166]. It was German aviation medical research and development from which these scientists were drawn. It was to Otis Benson's aeromedical wonderland they were assigned. It would be the wartime atrocities committed by several of the Air Force Paperclip Germans that would be brought to light and ultimately tarnish the reputation of Operation Paperclip itself.

I came away with an impression I didn't have before, that Operation Paperclip's biggest beneficiary was the US Air Force. It was as if the Air Force, and the US military in general, had a 'don't ask, don't tell' policy regarding their Nazi scientists' wartime activities.

CONCLUSION

My dad's claims about Nazi material in his training are valid. What these Germans were assigned to do for US military aviation medicine (and other fields) suggest that the US Air Force was building an operational and ultimately classified manned space program. Such a program in the early years of Cold War tension would explain the highest level of secrecy applied to the project my dad said he was assigned to in Arizona, and that secrecy would justify extreme measures like hypnotic suppression.

And that brings us to the next chapter.

The historical facts repeatedly suggest a secret USAF space program developing years prior to NASA. USAF aviation medicine has proven to be space medicine all along. With the potential Nazi Bell technology link to a USAF space program via Hubertus Strughold, it appears that Otis Benson's push for the stars may have taken our airmen into strange and exotic spaces.[167]

And that is why we must venture into the bizarre realms of the human mind for it turns out that our ambitious flyboys were also keenly interested in this particular plane of inner space. What would psychology have to do with outer space and especially my dad's story?

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Climb in the back with your head in the clouds
And you're gone...
-- John Lennon & Paul McCartney

There are logical reasons for the Air Force space scientists to be studying psychology.

I have already mentioned Strughold's space cabin simulator, which Benson emulated at Wright-Patterson[168]. You don't want your crews cracking up out there so it would be prudent to know what the cold isolation of lengthy space travel could do to the human psyche. The better to identify the best profile for astronaut candidates.

But space explorer recruitment was not the limit of US Air Force interest in psychology.

You might think I'd rather not go here, but go here we must, in spite of what it might mean to my father's story.

Why are we looking to MKULTRA for an answer to my dad's mysterious tale? Because MKULTRA concerned itself with the mysteries of the human mind and how to control it. What did MKULTRA have to do with the US Air Force?

In the mid 1990s, after I had earned a commission and became an agent for the Air Force OSI, Colonel Lundy and I had one of our late night discussions as we walked around his sleeping neighborhood. Such discussions are more like briefings and in this particular instance he was informing me of sensitive details of my father's service. Colonel Lundy had known my dad for almost forty years by that time and, as he always did, he spoke in his southern manner.

"Your Pappy is what they call manic-depressive. You know it, he knows it. You grew up dealing with his mood swings. The extent of his moods wasn't entirely his nature, however...

"After he was out in the desert working for Wilson, they hypnotized him to suppress his memories. The hypnosis was linked to the full moon. It had to stay as much in place as they could set it for the rest of his life. You look up and see the full moon every month, he sees the same damned moon you do. But when he sees it, that hypnosis reactivates the block on his memory of that assignment.

"The effect on his mind is that his memories are foggy where that is concerned. Now, with time it can and has broken down a bit, year by year. It's why you're able to get more out of him. That's the problem with the method they used. Keying it to the full moon is a good idea but instead of blocking it out, your pappy just has a harder time pulling it all up. You have to realize that it has been almost forty years since they did it ."

Colonel Lundy had dropped a bombshell on my perception of my dad's tale. Who likely had administered the hypnosis? Was it voluntary? What did it say about what was going in the Arizona underground that was so sensitive and classified so highly that nondisclosure orders and the threat of prison were not enough to secure it among its own personnel?

I'll offer my answers to those questions but the first order of business is to determine what evidence exists to suggest that the US Air Force would even use such methods. This is where MKULTRA and the CIA enter the stage.

For those who aren't familiar with it, MKULTRA's roots date back to 1945 and Operation Paperclip. It is important for the reader to know what John Marks says in the beginning of his book on America's mind control quest: "Nothing the CIA ever did in its postwar search for mind-control technology came close to the callous killing of the Nazi 'aviation research'" [169]

After the war, what the OSS captured of the Nazi mind control data was gathered and sent back to the United States. This included advances in hypnosis and experiments with mescaline. None of this German research was ever revealed publicly.[170]

The Nazis started it and the US pursuit of mind control followed in late 1947 at the Naval Medical Research Institute which ran Operation CHATTER to find a drug that would essentially make an enemy agent spill his secrets. During the six years of this program, the recently fashioned Central Intelligence Agency stood up Project BLUEBIRD on 20 April 1950, a program initially dedicated to developing effective interrogation techniques, was signed into existence by then CIA Director Roscoe Hillenkoetter, he of ufology's long adored MJ-12 legend.[171]

What is interesting to me about BLUEBIRD's original purpose in developing a foolproof interrogation system is that it called for use of three-man teams consisting of a psychiatrist, a technician and a polygraph examiner trained in hypnosis[172]. It turns out hypnosis was on the 'to do' list of the CIA before any of these programs came to be and it came to be an integral element of much that was done under these programs. The other thing on their minds was a fear of mind control[173].

This concern that the Soviets might brainwash captured American pilots and operatives and turn them against us led to BLUEBIRD being refocused to explore a way to block mind control and thus was it determined the only way to do that was to understand it, which in turn required learning how to use mind control. This led to some unsavory activities like electro-shock to induce 'selective' amnesia[174]. In this we enter the ballpark of what I had been told was done to my dad a few years later.

BLUEBIRD was responsible for mind control research for a little over a year before it was refashioned into Project ARTICHOKE by 1952 inspired by an interest in gaining control over an agent's mind and controlling his will. It is with ARTICHOKE we first learn of keen US Air Force interest in these mind control programs, its specific concern here being interrogation techniques that would be used on downed pilots. But USAF interest in mind control would expand.[175]

Under Project ARTICHOKE, the CIA sought again to focus on inducing amnesia, as it had under BLUEBIRD. Ingeniously the agency scientists discovered that "the greater amnesia produced, the more effective the results"[176]. Isn't that the most profound thing you ever heard? 'The more I hammer your head, the more it will hurt and bleed'

Among the service branches most interested in ARTICHOKE was the US Air Force[177], and ARTICHOKE's first behavioral research expert Morse Allen's primary fascination was hypnosis. In fact, ARTICHOKE scientists used reference to 'medical treatment' as a euphemism for hypnosis, they were so dedicated to its application[178].

Among the program's objectives was to identify a subject from the one in five determined to be a good subject for hypnosis and use it to create a splinter personality from within said subject[179]. Another was to apply hypnosis to a field agent to embed mission directives that could only be activated via preset signals and not be recalled by the agent afterwards. In this we see a precedent for US Air Force interest in practical applications of hypnosis for operational needs.[180]

ARTICHOKE officially closed in 1953 with the end of the Korean War but was actually refashioned into Project MKULTRA. That year, CIA Director Allen Dulles enlisted the expertise of neurologist Dr Harold Wolff to pursue knowledge of the mind control techniques which the Agency suspected were employed by the Soviets. Wolff brought his associate Lawrence Hinkle from Cornell University on board and they became the new gurus of brainwashing and mind control research on behalf of the US intelligence community via the CIA.[181]

The funny thing about that is that the US Air Force, as well as the Army, was running its own parallel program on mind control at the same time[182]. Led by Colonel James Monroe, USAF, who would eventually jump over to the Agency; and Dr Fred Williams of the Air Force Psychological Warfare Division, this vaguely alluded program leaves one hard-pressed to identify. Monroe would go on to oversee resources for various mind control research projects of the CIA including that of the legendary Ewen Cameron[183] who developed his process of 'psychic driving' to re-pattern human behavior using looped recordings on subjects sequestered in sleep rooms in 1953 and by 1957 was into sensory deprivation research.

One of the specific methods in which the Agency and its earlier ARTICHOKE customers had expressed interest was the desire to trigger hypnotically induced amnesia at the right time[184]. That they were even working on this in 1959 suggests to me that basic methods of triggering operationally selective amnesia was something that might have been available by the time my father was on his assignment at Gunter AFB in 1958.

Is it possible that the parallel Air Force ARTICHOKE program discovered the method of linking the hypnosis to the full moon as a result of these mind control pursuits?

I say that is entirely possible. It is interesting to note that by 1960 the CIA was committed to inducing more durable amnesia instantly via posthypnotic suggestion. What is it that was done to my father just a couple years prior but this very thing, the posthypnotic 'suggestion' being the sight of the full moon every month for the remainder of his life? Did a US Air Force breakthrough in hypnotic suggestion move the CIA to further pursue the technique?

The timing is compelling and suggests to me that what Colonel Lundy said was done to my father has the history to back it up.

Having established a direct US Air Force connection to the CIA's legendary MKULTRA mind control programs and demonstrated a specific involvement in hypnotically-induced amnesia, there remains another major possibility regarding my father's story.

It may be that what he said happened in eastern Arizona, in the subterranean realm of the hidden race, is not what happened at all. Or maybe not exactly.

Planted Narrative of Memories?

One of things MKULTRA scientists explored was whether false memories could be implanted.

Lest the reader assume that US intelligence didn't get into this stuff until after Operation Paperclip brought the Nazi version to America, the OSS had been goofing around with it during the war. They had considered using hypnosis on a captured German, manipulating him to hate the Gestapo and assassinate Hitler[185]. The notorious Richard Helms, who had interviewed Hitler prior to the war, was an early OSS proponent of mind control research. OSS behavioral science pursuits had served the agency well and they valued the military utility of psychiatry and psychology, sociology and anthropology[186], and thus were mind control scientists certain to be at the top of the intelligence community shopping list for German scientists.

It was spring of 1943 in Basel, Switzerland, and Dr Albert Hofmann of the Sandoz chemical company was riding home on his bicycle when he suddenly felt dizzy and made his way home where he laid down in a pleasant spin. This was followed by 'an uninterrupted stream of fantastic images of extraordinary plasticity and vividness, accompanied by an intense kaleidoscope-like play of colors.' After the effect wore off, Hofmann suspected that he had been exposed to the LSD he had created in his lab.[187]

On that day in 1943, while Hofman was tripping on LSD, a couple of hundred miles away in an SS lab the Gestapo medical research staff was playing around with mescaline at Dachau. They hoped to 'eliminate the will of the person examined' specifically in the pursuit of mind control[188]. Did they succeed? Some think so.

It is John Marks' description of the work of Albert Hofmann and that first LSD trip in 1943 that offers a hint at what I think may have happened to my dad. Such pursuits were reminiscent of 'fantastic powers of ancient legends, comparable to the spells and potions of wizards'. Whatever the Nazi scientists were doing with such stuff, nothing they had done with mind control experiments was revealed to the American public at the time of Operation Paperclip. The OSS' successor CIA would maintain the same level of secrecy on their own dabbling in the fairy realm of the psyche.

The Operation Paperclip connection we can look to for this is Dr Friedrich 'Fritz' Hoffman whom the US Army Chemical Corps had obtained and teamed up with the technical director of the Chemical and Radiological Laboratories, Dr L. Wilson Greene whose vision of a new kind of warfare led to pursuit of hallucinogenic and psychotomimetic drugs. Hoffman was the man for the job as he was a recognized expert in the study of mescaline, fly agaric, and many other natural substances known to open mental realms since ancient times. As much as an impact as this may have had on the Army, the guys really impressed with Hoffman and Greene's work were running the Special Operations Division of the CIA.[189]

By the late 1950s, the era of my dad's service, Greene and the CIA were testing LSD and other drugs were being tested on army and naval personnel[190]. Consent was reportedly not a firm issue, contributing to the later controversy over MKULTRA in general[191]. This going on in the military at this particular time raises two questions: How do we know they didn't test this on air force personnel, like my dad? Might my father have been subject to one of these hallucinogenic psychochemical warfare experiments?

This potentially changes the perspective entirely. Is it possible that everything my dad described in his strange tale was nothing more than drug-induced fantasy? Might his involvement in an experiment have been suppressed via the hypnosis? Would they have gone to such lengths simply to keep a security lid on an experiment?

As John Marks puts it: "Only one aspect remained constant during the quarter-century of active research: The CIA's interest in controlling the human mind had to remain absolutely secret."[192]

The military participation in this research was directly associated with the CIA one way or another. Everyone was already playing around with hypnosis so why not use it to ensure tighter security? Especially with research the parent organization insisted had to remain 'absolutely secret'? If my dad had been subject to the covert drug research, he could have been hypnotized to suppress that involvement.

But what about the US Air Force specifically? We already know of the USAF enthusiasm for facets of MKULTRA starting with ARTICHOKE, but hallucinogenic drugs?

To Sandoz laboratory where LSD was developed during the war, a Sandoz executive would later reveal, various Americans had made inquiries about LSD -- including the US Air Force.[193]

During the 1950s, the US military was already funding their own drug research programs under the auspices of chemical warfare. They could obtain LSD by the ton, if they so desired. US military security agencies in particular supported LSD research with experts from the Missouri Institute of Psychiatry, the Naval Medical Research Institute, the New York Psychiatric Institute and various other university departments around the northeast. In fact, Eli Lily, one of only two manufacturers of LSD in the west, provided its entire inventory of the drug to the US military and the Agency.[194]

John Marks points out that by 1953 the CIA was using LSD operationally before testing was even complete and by 1957 six drugs were being used in the field by the CIA. "One speck of LSD could take a strong-willed man and turn his most basic perceptions into willowy shadows. Time, space, right, wrong, order, and the notion of what was possible all took on new faces."[195]

If the Agency was going forward with operational use of LSD and other drugs, I see no reason to think the US military was not. The US Air Force would not have run the aforementioned parallel program to waste resources and effort on simple redundancy. I propose they were doing the same as the CIA within their own context.

The CIA placed secrecy paramount to all considerations, and by association the military customers of their programs did likewise. We can surmise that the USAF aviation medicine command would seek to keep a lid on whatever experiments which my father could have been involved. Especially with an operational application, I can safely suggest that the USAF mind scientists would have tried hypnosis to suppress my dad's memories of participation in whatever activity had involved LSD or any other such drug.

Now we reach the intersection of CIA hypnosis and drug research as it pertains to MKULTRA mind control and my father.

If the answer to my dad's weird tale is a drug-induced fantasy suppressed through hypnosis, then it appears there may not have been any briefing on a 'Roswell' scenario at Wright-Patterson. Neither might there have been any mysterious underground search and rescue operation, no encounter with people from another civilization in Arizona. It could all be explained by participation in an aviation medicine experiment using LSD or some other drug.

But what about my analysis that he was not making it all up? How could it have been so real to my dad?

I have some ideas on that but first we must consider the power of these substances. Remember that the CIA had employed the German Paperclip scientists who had dabbled with mescaline and other long known natural hallucinogenics. The Agency also sent its scientists around the world to obtain various samples of other natural hallucinogenics known to various tribal cultures for their properties of seeming to transport the user between dimensions[196].

Many people in our times have used recreational drugs. Some have experience with these very hallucinogenics with which the CIA had dabbled because they became popular in subsequent years among the drug culture. As you might imagine, I am not among those hobbyists, but it turns out that I can contribute my two cents on this issue.

Captain Walter's Wild Trip

It was late summer 2010 and I was not yet forty-seven years old. I woke up one morning and, upon opening my eyes, the ceiling spun wildly. Actually, it tumbled repeatedly down on me with the walls. Startling was one way you could describe the experience. I quickly closed my eyes and the sensation subsided and stopped, though my anxiety did not. Opening my eyes again, the ceiling and walls spun and came down upon me. I shut my eyes.

Anyone who knows me will tell you I'm not a heavy drinker. I enjoy the occasional scotch, have red wine on hand for a meal maybe once a week or so, and simply never drink to excess. So for the record, it wasn't a hangover that I was experiencing. Not being a recreational drug enthusiast, it wasn't anything in that category either. Yet there I was in the throes of vertigo. What might it have been? An impending ear infection?

I could not stand without completely falling over, so I didn't try that after the first attempt. I crawled to the bathroom to go pee and then crawled back down the hall to the living room where I pulled myself onto the sofa and there I basically spent the next four days. But it was on the second day that something extraordinary happened.

It wasn't difficult to fall asleep after lying on the couch all day and not moving. That first night I slept deeply but on the morning of the second day, in my last minutes of sleep, I experienced -- to paraphrase Albert Hofmann's experience -- 'an uninterrupted stream of fantastic images and vividness' including a massive 'kaleidoscopic play of colors' in a night sky. The most incredible sky I ever saw awake or in a dream state, with the most beautiful aurora borealis undulating slowly, as if on cosmic steroids.

And that does not even begin to do justice to the sound I heard during all of this: singularly the most pleasing musical tones ever to flow into my ears, playing a gentle cacophony on the cool night breeze.

It was wondrous.

If I could go back to that dream, not a second would I waste to get there. I have also wanted to hear that music again and will hear glimpses of it for the remainder of my life. At times, I yearn to hear that music again. What exactly was this dream? It was on the level of a vision, not just a dream. I had never experienced any dream so distinctly lifelike, it was that vivid. Waking from it was like being pulled from Heaven and held back on Earth.

Nothing short of astonishing. Naturally, I had to figure out what had caused this dream or if it meant anything.

My first inclination was to analyze the situation and sure enough the answer presented itself pretty quickly. I reviewed what had I eaten or drank the night before. No alcohol, no rich foods late at night -- because having woke up with vertigo the morning prior, I had only eaten crackers or toast and drank water the entire day and evening. I next considered what I had been ingesting lately that was different from my routine, and that led me to the ultimate explanation: for a period of fourteen days in a row I had consumed two large cans of my preferred energy drink.

What could energy drinks do to me? These were the tall boy cans. The beverage was carbonated and blueberry flavored, sugar free, with a ton of caffeine. But my research uncovered that it was none of that. It was another ingredient: guarana.

I discovered that guarana, a caffeine intense fruit seed of a plant common in Brazil, is known to cause vertigo when enough of the stuff is ingested. Consumption of more than 300mg per day can cause serious side effects -- or even death[197]. I was consuming twice that amount per day for two weeks.

If a natural substance ingested in a beverage over the course of several days caused the conditions under which I felt literally transported to another time and place -- experiencing the intensely lucid sights and sensations that I cannot forget -- then I present this experience as my personal bonafides and join many who have experienced what can be done to human perception through artificially induced means.

I will add that if what I described is anything like what you recreational trippers experience, I understand why you go back to it. But being who I am, I won't even ingest an ounce of guarana ever again because I am in no way willing to experience vertigo to go back to that place.

Think about it: I had my wild trip on an overdose of a simple damned energy drink. Imagine if my dad had been administered LSD or mescaline or any other substance the USAF was using at the time. No wonder he believed what he was telling me. I believe what I saw in my dream!

I know the possibility that my dad's tale was nothing more than a drug-induced mind trip will be disappointing to some readers. It is to me. However, it must be put on the table and for a very good reason, not the least of which being that the USAF drug experimentation is a point of historical fact during the time my dad was on active duty in the very command that would have been involved in it.

But I cannot overlook that there is indeed a disconnected quality to my dad's tale and this could suggest an artificiality to his recall of the events.

An Objective Inspection

My father described to me a flight from the base in Alabama, headed ostensibly to a base in Texas, which was diverted to Ohio. Specifically, the flight was diverted somewhere over Mississippi or Louisiana and went to Wright-Patterson AFB instead. On this flight, my dad described a USAF intelligence officer, a Major Milton Knight, who emerged from the forward cabin and informed them of the change in plans. After this flight, he told me of the briefing and revelations at Wright-Patterson.

Notice the detail. My dad recalled that he was on a military aircraft headed for a base in Texas, likely Randolph or Kelly, and the plane was diverted over Mississippi or Louisiana and went on to a specific base in Ohio. So what about after the briefings at Wright-Patterson? What about the flight to Arizona?

My dad never described getting to Arizona. For that matter, he never described returning to Alabama where he had been in training at Gunter AFB.

I find this curious because I've done a lot of air travel in my professional life, including military service. When I tell someone about my deployment to Saudi Arabia with the USAF, I generally don't exclude the commercial flights between Dayton and South Carolina or the flight from there to Frankfurt to meet up with the military charter flight which itself. That was singularly the most uncomfortable damned flight I ever took. The flights were part of the experience for various reasons comical or otherwise.

My point is that I find it odd my father would not have described the flight to Arizona, particularly for such a bizarre assignment. Because he described the flight to Wright-Patterson AFB, I suppose that it could have actually happened. This is supported by a very real world association to that base via his specialty in physiological training. However, I must question whether the flight to Arizona happened, particularly under the scenario we are presently exploring (and there is another). The missing flights are not the only anomalies to consider.

Upon further analysis, I noticed that my dad's story jumps from one episode to the next. First the flight to Ohio and then the briefings at Wright-Patterson, and then he's in Arizona working for Wilson in the underground location. Finally he's encountering the Other People and the guy is killed. The story ends there.

Something seems to be missing.

I accept that he was in Alabama at the end of the training TDY primarily because his DD214 says he was there, but I know he was there because it was right before leaving Montgomery with my mom who confirmed it. Even more notably, the other stuff about flying the helicopters in the subterranean world and the technology transfer was never actually put into a logical sequence of events.

How long was my dad in Arizona? Did he fly helicopters underground before or after encountering the Other People who killed his associate? The problem is that he didn't specify and that nags at me. As an investigator, I want to put it all together in an identifiable string of events, a timeline that makes sense and lends some credibility to the whole story, but I can't. Upon close inspection, my dad's account does not come across like a series of things that happened.

But it does fit the telling of a dream.

Think about the vivid dreams you've had. Be honest with yourself, a dream is usually a bunch of scenes that come one right after another and most often goes from one to the next without a linking narrative. That is what my dad's story is like, a dream. But it still may not quite be a simple dream.

SUMMARY

The Nazis originated the seed of mind control research during WW2 and this data was captured by the OSS. Operation Paperclip Germans contributed to the US pursuit of mind control research by the CIA.

CIA scientists explored the frontiers of LSD and mushrooms, discovering what they could and could not do in the never-ending pursuit to create a robot agent entirely at their command, also finding along the way what could be done with memories, suppressing and fabricating them alike.

What we've learned in this chapter demonstrates that the US Air Force was definitely involved in CIA mind control research and its applications. The Air Force went off in its own direction with a program parallel to what the CIA was doing with hypnosis and hallucinogens through the duration of MKULTRA, right through the period of my dad's enlistment and beyond.

CONCLUSION

Because I was told that my father had undergone hypnotic suppression, I must assume that the technique administered to him was among the products of MKULTRA further developed by USAF aeromedical scientists at Wright-Patterson AFB.

My dad's story may have been a planted narrative experienced in a drug-induced semi-dream state. It may very well have actually been put into his head while he slept in a room in a laboratory at Wright-Patterson AFB. The CIA research into using hypnosis to create an assassin is evidence of that this technology was pursued.

That would explain a lot, if my dad had actually been part of a program conducted by USAF aviation medical scientists using hallucinogenics, first in their pursuit to understand what could be done to counter Soviet brainwashing of downed pilots and then perhaps to provide fabricated cover, i.e. a planted narrative, for sensitive operations. Because my dad was an aviation medicine asset and this particular USAF command was specifically linked to CIA MKULTRA programs, it makes sense that he could have been a test subject.

But what's this about a 'planted narrative'? Am I suggesting that the Arizona operation and all its otherworldiness was purposely implanted into my father's mind? Could the US Air Force do such a thing?

History demonstrates that it is indeed possible that my dad's wild story could have been implanted into his memory to cover a sensitive experiment.

Or a classified operation...

CHAPTER TWELVE

In a cavern, in a canyon
Excavating for a mine...
...Light she was and like a fairy
And her shoes were number nine...

-- Percy Montrose/Barker Bradford

It would wrap this analysis up very nicely if we were to accept that my dad's imaginative tale was merely an episode in the annals of US military psychological warfare experiments.

But that won't work, primarily because of my sources: Colonel Lundy, a pseudonym for a man I choose not to name, and another man who does not want to be named, whom I will call 'Billy Les'. These two provided me with information that implies two possibilities, one of which just doesn't fly.

What did these sources provide that make me willing to cite them when I can't identify them? Independent corroboration, of a sort, for my dad's story.

Colonel Lundy you know already. You also know what he told me: that my dad's story actually happened and that Wilson is (by now likely was) a living human being. That an intelligence agent senior to me affirmed those elements of the story demands we question the conclusion that it was all a drug-induced dream.

Of course, there is the option where Lundy was part of the experiment to begin with and is simply still covering for it, invoking the elements of the dream fantasy. Lundy was in US Army Special Forces by 1958.[198]

Ah, but wait. Colonel Lundy invoking elements of a fabricated dream story forty years later suggests he would have to know those elements. If merely a dream my father had under the influence of hallucinogenics, how would anyone know? The option of a planted narrative gains some credibility in this instance.

It is the same for Billy Les' contribution to my soft interrogation of my dad. It was Bill who asked me the name of the intelligence officer who emerged from the forward cabin on the flight to Wright-Patterson, and specifically asked if this officer was a 'Major Milton Knight'. I didn't know at the time so I agreed to find out, promptly setting up a lunch with my dad the next day. I got my dad onto The Subject and, doing my best 'forgetful Inspector Columbo' bit, asked him, "That intel officer on the plane to Wright-Pat, uh...the Major... What was his name again...?"

I was a bit stunned when he said, without skipping a beat, "Major Milton Knight."

That happened. I can't prove it to you, but I'm willing to put it print here and stand by it. When I got back to Billy Les and confirmed it, he was impressed, too. Unless Bill was also working on the experiment with my dad at Wright-Patterson back in 1958, this is a significant piece of information. It's a compelling suggestion that something about my dad's story is true, as he told it.

Of course, it must be acknowledged that even with a USAF drug experiment scenario, the trip to Wright-Patterson AFB could have happened. That my dad included this flight in his story, but no others, also suggests it. I can't reduce the significance of Billy Les, over forty years later, knowing the name of the intelligence officer on that plane back in 1958. I don't know the specifics of Bill's personal interest in this event, I can only surmise it relates in a general association to his own research.[199]

For the sake of further analysis, let's proceed with the idea that my dad not only went to Wright-Patterson AFB, as claimed, but also did indeed go to Arizona. I ask the reader to continue with me on this because there is actually a reason to entertain this possibility. A real world possibility may provide an alternative scenario to a drug experiment option while still including it and the accompanying hypnosis as well.

Air Force Underground

Assuming, for sake of analysis, that the briefing at Wright-Patterson AFB happened and my dad went on to Arizona. We must therefore ask the questions: What could the briefing actually have been about? And why might the USAF have actually sent my dad to Arizona in 1958?

There are two considerations here. Let's look at the first.

The briefing at Wright-Patterson would have obviously pertained to information regarding whatever my dad was really going to do in Arizona. If his strange version was a cover then I propose the purpose was to provide cover for something highly classified. So what in 1958 might that have been?

There are two air force bases in Arizona that existed in 1958. The Tuscon Army Air Field, established in 1940, was renamed Davis-Monthan AFB in 1948. Luke AFB, established as an army air field in 1941, was reactivated in 1951 as Luke AFB.[200]

In 1958, Luke AFB was placed under the Tactical Air Command and re-designated as the 4510th

Combat Crew Training Wing. Davis-Monthan was under the Air Defense Command at that time. Starting in the 1960s, there ended up being 18 nuclear missile silos in the greater Tucson area.[201]

Might my dad have been actually assigned to some function USAF missile silo or radar station construction operations? It's possible but it doesn't make sense where his specialty was concerned. Since the silos date only as far back as 1962[202], it's even less likely. But that doesn't eliminate the possibility of some other underground operation, as missile silos and radars stations were not the only facilities that were built underground.

A lot of talk about underground bases goes on in the alternative research community, especially in the 'discipline' of ufology. Much of it is hearsay, wishful thinking, or simply tall tales. That's why I'm going to stay away from such stuff in this analysis. Instead we will consider facilities of more credible record and sources because there is actually enough to be found there.

The question is: was the US Air Force involved in underground facilities other than missile silos and radar stations? Indeed they were, as the underground facilities at Wright-Patterson AFB[203] and inside Cheyenne Mountain outside of Denver famously demonstrate.

In 1959, the Air Force Times reported the USAF intention to build an underground SAGE radar facility with the US Department of the Interior in Kennesaw Mountain, Georgia, and two years before that the US Army announced plans to build an underground rocket assembly factory inside Green Mountain near Huntsville, Alabama, where the Redstone Arsenal and the Huntsville Industrial Expansion Committee were acquiring a lot of real estate in pursuit of a planned 'subterranean Pentagon' of sorts to the tune of 200 acres.[204]

You may have heard of the RAND Corporation. It's a major think tank that has been around for almost almost seventy years. But did you know it started out in 1946 as US Air Force 'Project RAND'? Its original charter was far-reaching research projects for the air force. As the newly founded RAND Corporation, the organization's pursuits included engineering, economics, mathematics, physics and social science. By the late 1950s, RAND had moved into issues concerning underground base construction for the US military.[205]

In March of 1959, RAND hosted an event dedicated to examining the difficulties of protecting deep underground installations or those inside mountains[206]. Did they mean planned installations? Or were there already such facilities in existence?

A 1960 RAND report commissioned by the US Air Force identified twelve potential sites for underground facilities that would be at least 1,000 feet below the surface[207]. Since 1957 RAND had been specifically investigating issues relative to defending hardened underground installations from nuclear attack[208]. The continuity of government facilities project had established protection for the President and Congress starting in 1952[209], so if such subterranean facilities as those at Mt Weather existed earlier that decade, what had the US Air Force built by 1958?

That's difficult to answer because, according to Richard Sauder, author of two excellent books full of real data on actual underground military and government facility construction, the Deputy Director of Engineering and Construction for the US Army Corps of Engineers Lloyd A. Duscha told a 1980 conference audience that *"I must deviate a little because several of the most interesting facilities that have been designed and constructed by the Corps are classified. "[210]

Sauder also points out other comments attributed to Duscha about sensitive underground facilities consisting of chambers 50 feet wide and 100 feet high. Sauder notes that Duscha refers to a "critical and unusual nature of these projects..."[211]

So again I ask what might the Air Force have been doing underground? In 1949, USAF engineers penetrated into the Manzano range near Albuquerque, New Mexico, constructing chambers 30 feet high, 40 feet wide and 100 feet long off of main tunnels[212]. The 1960 RAND report identified potential underground sites in Mohave and Coconino counties in Arizona. But it might be a Defense Nuclear Agency site that could prove of particular interest to this analysis.

According to a November 1975 report by H.R. Pratt and S.J. Green A Geology Compendium of the Continental United States - With Application To Deep-Base Systems, the subject of possible sites for underground military installations was to be located nearly one mile beneath the surface. Of the sites identified in the west there are a handful in Arizona, and among these is the 'general vicinity' of Holbrook.

Though the above information is from a report dated almost twenty years after my father's time in the air force, Holbrook's inclusion on the above list is suggestive.

'In the Vicinity of Winslow'

Holbrook, Arizona, was founded in 1881 with the coming of the railroad. The interest to us here is that Holbrook sits just 33 miles east of Winslow. Even more important is that Holbrook is in the area where the petulant conquistador Francisco Vasquez de Coronado had been told to search for the rumored Seven Cities of Cibola, a legend sometimes associated with an underground origin.[213]

Holbrook was also originally inhabited by the mysterious Anasazi, a civilization of ancient people who disappeared without explanation before the arrival of the current native cultures, same as the Hohokam, according to legends and history[214]

Now this is significant. How might Holbrook be the actual place where the mysterious underground air force project was established?

My dad said that the underground project was going on somewhere east of Winslow. Holbrook is just a half an hour's drive east of Winslow[215]. He said he encountered people who had gone underground long ago due to a catastrophe that drove them into the subterranean world. The Anasazi habitat included the Holbrook area and they are believed to have suddenly abandoned their city centuries ago because of some cataclysm that befell them and that's not only in the legends. So far, so good for Holbrook as the primary candidate.

My dad also described the tube device held by one member of the Others he encountered, the weapon that killed a man.

Sound familiar? In an earlier chapter we discussed the Paiute legend of an underground race they called 'Hav-Musuvs' who possessed flying machines and used a tubular weapon that stings. It so happens that the Paiutes are recognized as inhabiting the same regions that the Anasazis had abandoned. I have to ask: Are the mysterious Anasazi denizens of the subterranean realm of the legendary 'Hav-Musuvs' of the Paiutes?

I say there is certainly enough there to consider the possibility, the other option being that the Paiute legend got attached to the Anasazi at some point. But when you consider all the above data -- the location of the ancient Anasazi homeland extending just east of Winslow -- and that they are rumored by some to have gone underground long ago -- it does indeed fit my dad's story.

So what? What does that mean?

It means the USAF mind control scientists may have incorporated the rumors and legends into a 'planted narrative' cover story. What better material than spooky tales of lost civilizations down below to discredit someone whose hypnotic suppression might be weakening? Who would believe it?

Aside from the fact that the Anasazi indeed inhabited the Holbrook area and did disappear without apparent explanation, the rest is fantastic enough to divert most people from giving it further thought -- and that's what USAF security gurus would aim for.

Now let's say the Anasazi did go underground. Perhaps they truly did find a cavernous region which they used as shelter for a while. Because of the US Air Force search for suitable underground sites to place strategic military facilities, it's completely within the realm of possibility that a cavernous region in the Holbrook area -- perhaps extending as far west as Winslow -- could have been explored and developed by USAF engineers.

But is there any evidence to suggest a subterranean landscape suited to my dad's story?

Arizona offers many tourist caves to explore, mostly near Tucson to the south, around the Grand Canyon and Flagstaff to the north and west. There certainly must be caverns in the areas around Holbrook and Winslow but they don't seem to make the tourist guides. Could they be restricted?

If what I suggest is true, that the US Air Force had developed a natural subterranean landscape into a foundation for an underground facility, access would certainly be restricted, especially if said facility was secret. Is there any current USAF presence in Holbrook?

The vaguely described US Air Force Radar Site is located adjacent to Holbrook Municipal Airport[216]. Its purpose is described online as both 'international affairs' and 'national security'. How long has it been there? I don't know because there isn't much available information and I've just shared it here. But there is something potentially telling about its location.[217]

Using Google Earth/Maps, you find that the pin is literally in the middle of the street. The buildings in the vicinity of the airport are unassuming and those on the airport don't look like a radar station, as near as I can tell. There are a couple of structures that look like they could indeed be government facilities but these don't have any visible features that look like radar equipment. So where among these buildings is the US Air Force Radar Site?

Could it be underground?

Let's go back a few pages to the 1959 Air Force Times announcement to build an underground SAGE radar facility inside a mountain in Georgia. There's the USAF talking about building an underground radar facility the year after my dad's claim to have been working underground in Arizona. So we can say the Air Force was building such sites in the late 1950s and I can further suggest that the present Holbrook airport location of the US Air Force Radar Site may actually just be an entrance to a radar facility located beneath.

How can I say that? Richard Sauder points out that underground military facilities often have nondescript entrances on the surface. In reference to a US Army Corps of Engineers report, Sauder says: "According to the report, the could be constructed inside 'hills or plateaus' with concealed shaft entrances*"*[218]

As an example, Sauder offers a description of a British Army guardhouse at Sopley which from the outside looks small but inside provides a stairwell access to a fifty room facility below the ground. He also describes an unassuming US Army Warrenton Training Center in Virginia which requires closer inspection to notice the power cables disappearing into the ground.

Sauder writes: "I strongly suspect that the designers here in the United States have been at least as ingenious as their counterparts in Europe in disguising and concealing entrances to underground installations. Virtually any house anywhere, or any building, large or small, is capable of concealing an entrance to an underground facility....Some houses and buildings certainly can be disguised entrances...The hard part is figuring out which ones they are." [219]

Sometimes the underground facility can be hiding in plain sight, if we are to believe Sauder's source about a White House sub-basement facility that extends at least seventeen levels down. The testimony of this source dates back to the Johnson administration when the source was tasked with delivering some papers from the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). He was escorted by agents to an elevator in a non-public area of the White House and taken down to a deep level with long corridors lined ceiling to floor with ceramic tiles, corridors extending to 'the vanishing point'. The source handed the HUD papers to a man in a room and then he was escorted back up and out of the White House.[220]

The question is exactly the one asked by the source: What would HUD documents contain to require the messenger to be escorted by agents to a strictly controlled facility several floors beneath the White House?

Catherine Austin Fitts is a former Undersecretary for HUD and you might find some interesting input on this question in her work. She cites a statement by Susan Gaffney, a HUD Inspector General at the time, in testimony at a hearing on 22 March 2000, in which it is revealed that 284 adjustments to the tune of more than $77 billion had to be made to fiscal years 1998 and 1999 to make them agree with Treasury balances on record.[221] Is the money a surplus? Is it being shifted around to remain out of oversight? If hidden or even showing up 'off the record', what is this money actually for?

Fitts asks the question: "Was it possible that the US Treasury and the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) were operating HUD as a slush fund to illegally finance black budget operations?"[222]

Fitts experienced being targeted by US federal authorities who sent agents to seize and destroy her company's software and equipment to hide the trail of whatever was going on with an estimated trillions of dollars being channeled in this manner.

I took you on this HUD detour to point out that perhaps apparently mundane properties contracted under HUD could actually provide camouflage for classified facilities anywhere, in rural or urban settings. The money trail issues might reveal this.

Back to the USAF and Arizona, the point of suggesting that the present day Air Force radar site is likely underground is to show that the USAF might have put an underground facility in Holbrook. If they have one that can be found on the internet, what others are hiding there?

I didn't put Holbrook on the list in the 1975 report for potential underground facility sites, the experts in the field did. Might it have actually been identified years prior to this report, when missile silos were being built under more sensitive circumstances? Might this 'US Air Force Radar Site' at Holbrook Airport be the semi-camouflaged entrance to the same underground where my father worked?

It is interesting to note that Holbrook Municipal Airport was established in 1943 and is currently on a list of airports around the United States identified as 'infrequent' destinations for military Space-A flights to and from Andrews AFB. This alone is not indicative of anything but that it's a location where military personnel can catch available seats on military aircraft. However it also demonstrates that, no matter how infrequent, enough USAF personnel are present in the Holbrook area to justify the Space-A site designation.[223]

Now called Joint Base Andrews, this base is a major USAF station. Not only are the Presidential units that support Air Force One operations based here, there are several other important units and commands. Among these is the headquarters for my former employers, the Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI).[224] The significance here is that Andrews is located just southeast of Washington DC and all that implies, i.e. if there is an ultra secret underground facility at Holbrook, any personnel from the Pentagon, for example, can take an unassuming Space-A flight direct.

Some readers will complain that any flight to a base in Arizona, or even a commercial flight, would suffice. But in my experience with operations, the Air Force using the Space-A option for any potential secret installations underneath Holbrook is credible. Anyone, like a foreign agent or a courageous investigative journalist for example, can book a seat on a commercial flight -- but not just anyone can hop a Space-A aboard a military aircraft. Get it?

SUMMARY

It is sufficiently demonstrated that Holbrook could reasonably have some association with my dad's mysterious Arizona underground location. Holbrook fits 'east of Winslow' and the folk history of missing tribes and subterranean wonders is too resonant to ignore.

I have also demonstrated that the US Department of Defense, and specifically the US Air Force, has built underground facilities, both known and secret -- and they have been doing this since before my dad was in the air force.[225]

CONCLUSION

With a clear history of USAF presence both above and below the ground in Arizona, I will go on record to say that I think Holbrook, Arizona, is the best candidate for the underground site in my dad's story.

The question now is what do I think about my dad's tale: Was it a drug-induced hallucinatory dream? Or was there an actual operation so classified that it required the use of an hypnotically induced cover story of lost civilizations and mysterious UFO crashes in the desert?

That is a good question.

Let's walk a little deeper into the rabbit hole...

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

When the men on the chessboard
Get up and tell you where to go
And you've just had some kind of mushroom
And your mind is moving low...
-- Grace Slick

The question posed is what do I now think of the choices between my father's story having been the consequence of a military drug experiment or the murky memories of an hypnotically suppressed series of actual events. And the answer is...

Yes!

All joking aside, let's take the drug experiment option first because it truly is the simplest solution. In this scenario my father merely got an an airplane from Montgomery, possibly from Maxwell AFB across town, and was headed for Texas.

The experiment might have actually begun during the flight when the alleged Major Milton Knight stepped out from the forward cabin to inform my dad and the other subjects about the diversion to Wright-Patterson. This would begin the process of monitoring reactions to unexpected changes in plan and so forth.

Upon arrival at Wright-Patterson, my dad and the others would have been taken to the unit conducting said experiment and in-processed. From this point they would simply have been shown to rooms in the laboratory where they could be observed in a more controlled environment.

I say this activity would have been conducted in the aviation medicine research laboratory, for obvious reasons. A routine examination of vital signs would be measured, such as heart rate, temperature, etc. If all checked out satisfactorily, my dad would have ingested whatever drug was being tested and his 'trip' would begin shortly. This was aviation medicine's domain, especially in the Otis Benson era.

It is also possible that the USAF scientists could have slipped some of the drug into the subjects unwittingly at any time, but it seems more legitimately 'US Air Force' to me to conduct it with the full awareness and willing participation of the subjects. Conversely, the CIA had more reason to slip mickeys into unwitting subjects. They had plenty of that data for the USAF to refer to without doing it on their own. The Air Force is a very cautious branch of the military.

Once in my dad's bloodstream, away he goes into 'dreamyland'. It is at this point we must decide: Was what he told me entirely a dream? Or was what he told me a 'planted narrative' created by the scientists?

If a dream, we're done here. After the experiment, he simply had this strange dream in his head that seemed very real. The hypnosis would have been applied to suppress memory of the experiment itself, leaving my dad to struggle with the dream he thought was a real series of events. He gets on the plane and returns to Gunter AFB to go on with his life.

That scenario would pretty much end all discussion if it weren't for two things: Colonel Lundy told me the project in Arizona was real and so was Wilson. Billy Les knew the name of the officer on the plane to Wright-Patterson AFB. I even have reason to suspect Colonel Lundy could have had personal knowledge of the project at the time or was possibly even there in some capacity. I don't really know how Bill would have known about Major Knight being on the plane, based on what I know about him. The testimony of these two men nags me.

Therefore we must still consider that my dad may have really gone to Arizona, there was a classified project that could very well have been underground, and there actually could have been a mysterious Wilson involved. That doesn't change the possibility that what might have really happened was still cloaked in the 'planted narrative'.

Why The Spooky Tricks?

A word or two about the hypnosis.

Why would they have used hypnotic suppression when a nondisclosure agreement and the threat of court martial and prison would likely suffice to keep him from telling about it?

As stated before, hypnosis was a big thing back then, a major component of the mind control program methods. Essentially it was the hot new toy and the scientists were looking at all the things that could be done with it. I say that among these activities with hypnosis, someone in the USAF psych lab figured it might be a better way to keep a security lid on an operation, so they tried it.

Hypnotic suppression used on my dad would serve as an extra measure of security. I say he was fully aware and cooperative in its application. Remember, these were the days of the Cold War, fear ran high. It is not a stretch - at all - to suggest that hypnotic suppression was used on my dad for this purpose. Remember, I was told as much by Colonel Lundy.

That's a variation on the drug-induced dream scenario. The weird parts were a planted narrative to provide cover for vital classified activity. No mysterious underworld in Arizona, no lost civilization, no search and rescue for a UFO pilot. Whatever actually went on in Arizona while my dad was there was likely something more mundane like secret missile base ops or some USAF tech activity critical to national security during the Cold War.

We can turn off the lights and go home, right?

Most of you know me better than that so let's look at some MKULTRA history, specifically relating to Dr Sidney Gottlieb. He's the guy with whom such a cover narrative as lost civilizations and wondrous technology would have originated.

Black Sorcerer

Sidney Gottlieb ran the Chemical Division of the CIA's Technical Services Staff during the 1951-1956 romance with LSD. A curious fellow, Gottlieb was a folk dance enthusiast and lived in a former slave cabin, where he kept goats for milk, along with his children and wife, the daughter of Presbyterian missionaries who had spent time in India. A side occupation of the Gottlieb family was raising Christmas trees for sale to friends and associates. They also liked to make cheese. Sidney Gottlieb was respected by friends and colleagues alike, among them the infamous Richard Helms. [226]

In fact, it was the suggestion of Richard Helms to then Director Allen Dulles that LSD be used in operations that got MKULTRA approved to begin with on 13 April 1953, much because of the work of Gottlieb. The objective? Gottlieb said it was to determine how human behavior could be modified through covert means. The research was financed for an initial $300,000 and took off, but eventually more funds would be needed to continue. It turns out that the military, especially the USAF among them, were willing to provide the money for LSD.[227]

As Gottlieb ventured deeper, he aimed the research at objectives like 'disturbance of memory', 'discredit by aberrant behavior', 'altering sex patterns', suggestibility and 'creation of dependence' among them[228]. Here we have the CIA MKULTRA program committed to playing with memory and seeking a way to suggest whatever they desired to a subject under the influence. And LSD wasn't the only thing they played with.

Altered States

In 1955, just a few months after my father entered the service, banker and amateur mycologist R. Gordon Wasson, VP of the J.P. Morgan & Company, finally gained access to a legendary 'magic mushroom' called teonanactl, or 'God's Flesh', in Oaxaca, Mexico. The CIA had been searching for this very mushroom for a few years and would get their hands on them eventually through Wasson. [229]

Wasson described an all-night trip of intense hallucinations. The visions came first in artistic designs that changed before their eyes: "They evolved into palaces with courts, arcades, gardens -- resplendent palaces with semiprecious stones...Could the miraculous mobility that I was now enjoying be the explanation for the flying witches that played some important part in the folklore and fairy tales of northern Europe?...The effect of the mushroom is to bring about a fission of the spirit, a split in the person, a kind of schizophrenia, with the rational side continuing to reason..."[230]

mushroom', shortly after its active substance was synthetically reduced in the Swiss lab of LSD pioneer Albert Hofmann. It was called psilocybin and it made mushroom journeys more accessible. [231]

One of the CIA's more notorious experiment with psilocybin involved inmates in a Kentucky prison. The nine prisoners experienced all manner of reactions and hallucinations, including 'x-ray vision' of a sort, seeing through the skin of others. They also appeared to have found the same realm Wasson experienced in Mexico: "They seemed to be elsewhere...Trips to the Moon or living in gorgeous castles...".[232]

Wasson would write further on this particular aspect of his experiences using the mushroom. "For the mushrooms revealed to him worlds beyond the horizons known to him, in space and time, even world on a different plane of being..."[233]

Is there more to this than merely a waking dream?

It's clear that the CIA MKULTRA program was the leader in developing hallucinogenic substances for operational use in the US national security community. We know for a fact that the US Air Force was actively involved with using these products and even started their own programs[234], which as far as I know haven't been exposed via Congressional committee as was MKULTRA.

All this was going on during the entire period of my father's enlistment and he was assigned directly to the field most likely involved with administering the USAF drug research. I think I've established the case; my dad could have been a subject of USAF mind control drug research and that could explain his weird story -- whether a dream or a planted narrative to cover something else.

We've looked at Gottlieb the esoteric'sorcerer' and we've learned that CIA mind control scientists journeyed far into ancient Mexico to obtain the power of magic mushrooms. Before I explain what this all may have had to do with my dad, I need to introduce you to one more mas scientist.

Mr Charming

Let's look at Dr D. Ewen Cameron.

Readers of my other works will be familiar with my occult analysis and research of Montreal. Those readers will be familiar with my analysis of this Canadian city in terms of Hekate veneration, and of the city's role as a backdrop in the murder of Harry Houdini, including a look at McGill University student J. Gordon Whitehead. If you refer to my Empire of the Wheel 3:The Nameless Ones, you'll see how there were shell games played with identities in the Houdini mystery. Montreal's dark thread has woven itself throughout my past research.

Is it any surprise when here we find the notorious Dr Cameron running the psychiatric department at Allan Memorial Institute Hospital in Montreal, an outfit set up with the dubious Rockefeller Foundation?[235]

Ewen Cameron was known as an aloof and ill-at-ease man with whom his colleagues could not connect in a human way. Cameron had a theory of 'differential amnesia' and employed questionable methods of electro-shock therapy to wipe schizophrenic patients' mind blank so that their 'normal personality' could emerge victorious. It is almost hilarious that his stated objective was to cure schizophrenia.[236]

Cameron's mad doctor pursuits naturally gave the CIA boys a raging boner and they raised the covers of the MKULTRA bed so that he could join in the fun.

It wasn't long before the CIA was funding Cameron's experimental use of unapproved methods on actual and unwitting patients. His repertoire involved intensive electroshocks accompanied with long spells of drug-induced sleep. Some might say that under the circumstances Cameron was only going to dangerous lengths in the interest of national security -- but there is evidence to suggest that Cameron didn't know these experiments were being funded by the Agency. For him, it was just another day of providing psychiatric care that he called 'depatterning'.[237]

John Marks writes: "The frequent screams of patients that echoed through the hospital did not deter Cameron or most of his associates in their attempts to 'depattern' their subjects completely."[238]

Dr Cameron would subject patients to this 'depatterning' procedure usually for 15 to 30 days and sometimes up to 65 days. Reportedly, the minute the sedatives wore off them enough, orderlies would often chase clear-headed patients down the halls to catch them in their mad-dash attempts to escape the hospital. Cameron was still doing this stuff in 1958, our year in question.[239]

Hard as it may be to believe (or not, actually), Cameron achieved complete amnesia in some patients and the Agency became so aroused this time that they gave him even more money to take the method beyond the amnesia point. The CIA wanted him to erase a person's mind completely so they could program new behavior. To this request, Cameron applied a technique he had developed years before: 'psychic driving'.[240]

Cameron's method of 'psychic driving' was to simply bombard the patient or subject with a repetition of recorded messages. Colleagues at McGill said of his research that it was "an awful set of ideas he was working with" and "Cameron was no good as a researcher".[241] But the Agency loved it!

The process started with planting speakers underneath the patient's pillow through which played 16 hours a day of negative commentary (allegedly still audible even when they weren't on the bed), with electrodes connected to their legs at night to shock them at the end of each message. And this went on for weeks. One of Cameron's brilliant assistants said, "We made sure they heard it."[242]

After a whirl on this kaleidoscope of terror, the patient would then repeat the process but with 'positive' messages, though God knows what that meant, to Cameron. Then comes the day the good doctor tells the CIA that he can get the same results through the addition of drugs and sensory deprivation, just one big festival of psychiatric horror in the pursuit of mind control (only so that we could understand how it's done, of course, heh heh).

Thus in 1957 did Ewen Cameron's work in sensory deprivation begin.

Just when you thought you'd heard enough, we have the doctor now sequestering subjects in small rooms and then literally in boxes, wearing apparatuses on their heads to block vision and hearing. The boxes were equipped with padded interiors (!) to prevent the sensation of touch (other than the pads, I guess), and free of smells.

A US Army subject kicked his way out of the box in a screaming mad fit after 40 days inside. Even then, Cameron subjected a female patient to his depatterning looping-shock-message drugged torture and then put her in the box for 35 days. The reason this patient had even been under his care was issues with menopause.[243]

And who was the CIA officer who approved Cameron's budgets and provided him with requested resources?

Lieutenant Colonel James Monroe, formerly of the USAF. Monroe personally supervised Cameron's research grants from the Agency via a cover organization called the 'Human Ecology Society'. Monroe was with the Air Force when he started working with the CIA in the early days of MKULTRA brainwashing research.[244] Monroe had been assigned to psychological warfare during WW2 and continued in that field for the US Air Force until going to the Agency permanently.[245] Knowing what we know about US Air Force enthusiasm for MKULTRA programs, and that they were running their own, it's reasonable to suggest that the Air Force was using some of this stuff and perhaps getting it from Monroe.

Thus are we able to now consider that some form of Cameron's diabolical methodology was being used by the US Air Force in their own psychological warfare pursuits and perhaps in their security efforts.

SUMMARY

I've demonstrated that the CIA MKULTRA program mind control science was greatly driven by the desire to control the human mind. Through the work of Sidney Gottlieb, the programs led to manipulation of human perception via hallucinogens such as LSD and mushrooms. The work of Ewen Cameron provided the CIA with the confidence that the human mind might be broken down and reprogrammed, which suggests the possibility that 'planted narratives' were indeed possible.

That the military was conducting its own programs spun off from the MKULTRA experiments raises concerns over what exactly they were doing that the CIA wasn't. That we never really found out what the US Air Force was doing specifically - or how far they ran with it -- is highly suggestive within the context of my dad's experience. Had USAF aviation medicine scientists made breakthroughs of which the CIA was unaware?

What might the Air Force have accomplished with hypnosis and hallucinogens and Cameron's 'psychic driving'? Did the aviation medicine gurus at Wright-Patterson AFB discover how to successfully 'plant narratives' into the minds of airmen?

We don't know because what the Air Force did with their own MKULTRA research was never revealed to the public.[246]

CONCLUSION

I propose my dad might have been subjected to a form of Cameron's 'psychic driving' to plant a fabricated narrative into his mind designed to provide cover for whatever might have happened in Arizona. I also propose that this process was followed by hypnotically induced amnesia to suppress the planted narrative as an extra measure.

Where does that now put us, where his story is concerned?

WHAT THIS COULD MEAN

Here's the scenario: My dad is indeed assigned to some highly classified operation in a location likely within the continental United States, due to the time constraints as discussed in an earlier chapter. He goes to the TDY site and does his job. He returns to Wright-Patterson AFB.

While at Wright-Patterson, he undergoes a USAF MKULTRA spinoff psychological treatment that we will call re-patterning: a drug-induced state of consciousness exposed to a lighter version of psychic driving. In this Cameronesque process, the looped message is a false cover story designed to fill in the days on the TDY project that were washed from his mind. This planted-narrative cover story replaces the real events with a wild tale of a crashed UFO in New Mexico, a search-and-rescue operation for a UFO pilot from a 'lost civilization', and finally an encounter with strange people in a subterranean realm. My dad wakes up at the end of the process, released to his usual duty and the rest of his life, not remembering what he was really doing on the classified TDY in 1958.

There is very good reason for suspecting that my dad's weird tale was not true, that something else was going on with him. That the USAF was indeed, as a matter of historical record, establishing its own mind control program and pursing practical applications of the results, I must seriously consider that my dad's tale is a product of this MKULTRA technology.

There are indeed the gaps in my dad's story. We know how he got to Ohio but we never hear about how he got to Arizona (presumably a flight to Holbrook...?) or how he got back to Alabama. We learn of 'Wilson' but we never learn the name of the man who got killed by the mysterious underground dweller with the tube weapon. I would think my dad would never have forgotten that man's name, as he was standing beside him when it happened. Perhaps this suggests that the scenes loaded into my dad's psyche may have been emerging by design as the hypnosis began to weaken over the years.

Some might yet ask why the USAF would really go to such lengths with mind control when the aforementioned punitive security agreement was readily available and more practical. That is a reasonable question.

The answer might be what Col Lundy told me years back, that my dad got into some difficulty and was removed from the operation by Wilson.

If the death of the other airman was under conditions of duress, they may have wanted to wipe that from my dad's memory before sending him back to regular duty. Or if he screwed up somehow and had 'seen too much' they might have elected to use the mind-clearing methods. Whatever the reason, in this scenario of real and sensitive events to suppress, this must have been a very important project to subject anyone to this stuff.

But there is yet another possibility.

A Coping Mechanism?

There is a story my dad told me many years ago about an incident that I am compelled to share within this context. He never connected this story to the topic of this book, but all possibilities must be considered if I hope to come close to the truth.

I recall my dad telling me about a situation in which two airmen were guarding something, maybe a gate, maybe a building, I don't recall. These two carried sidearms and they had stupidly engaged in a little personal game of 'gunslinger'. As you might guess, came the day that one of them returned to the guardhouse from making rounds or whatever and the other said 'Draw!'. He drew and reflexively pulled the trigger, firing a .45 round through the head of his buddy. I remember him telling this story to make a point about gun safety, but now it piques my curiosity in other ways.

I am an investigator by profession and analytical by nature. It is imperative that I follow through with hunches because useful information can often be drawn from them, and sometimes the whole truth.

What if this cautionary tale about the two 'air force guards' might actually have involved my dad?

I wonder if my dad was the one who shot his buddy and killed him. I wonder if this incident might actually have been what got him removed from the classified operation.

Here's the scenario: Whatever they were really doing, my dad and a fellow airman were issued sidearms. They may actually have been responsible for the security of something, likely their own unit equipment. The same dumbass game of gunslinger is played and my dad was the one who wasn't thinking, and he shot the other man dead. This shocks my dad, maybe unhinges him to some degree. They have to relieve him of this duty and return him to either Wright-Patterson or Gunter AFB where he undergoes psychiatric treatment that includes hypnotic suppression. The classified operation is reconstructed into a fantasy episode in which it's not he who kills the man but a disembodied denizen of another world armed with a magic tube. With the planted narrative in place, reinforced with hypnotic suppression, my dad is released.

Why would I consider this?

Because you will recall that whenever my dad told his tale of the underworld it always ended with the death of the airmen and my dad becoming too emotional to continue.

Sure, this tragic possibility might have happened anywhere, not necessarily on some mysterious operational deployment. All the weird stuff was just human nature putting a handle on a difficult situation. A coping mechanism.

The other possibility is that my dad witnessed the shooting but wasn't involved. That would return any MKULTRA suppression completely to the operational security column.

I want to be clear that the weapon mishandling scenario is a wild ass guess on my part. I have no other reason than this analysis to even entertain such a thing ever happening with my dad. Besides, it neither explains nor eliminates everything else.

Whether some hidden misstep on my dad's part happened or not, there is the issue of using MKULTRA methods to suppress his memories of whatever he knew about the mysterious USAF project. The encounter that ended in the life of the other airman, be it suppressed tragedy or confrontation with people from another realm, it still apparently happened in a sensitive environment.

Whatever suppression methods were applied, its primary function would be to protect the operational security of said project, in my opinion.

What might the USAF have been up to?

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Hey now, you better listen to me every one of you
We got a lotta lotta lotta lotta work to do
Forget about your women and that water can Today you're working for the man...

-- Roy Orbison & Joe Melson

The question remains: Could there have been a project such as my dad described?

Let's look again at the elements of his story.

My source, Colonel Lundy, told me Wilson was real. My research since 2004 and especially relative to my books EOTW2:Friends From Sonora and Origin deal with Wilsons of record who were likely related to the Wilson in my dad's story. I propose Wilson's existence, yay or nay, remains open and thus suggests there was some classified operation to which my dad could indeed have been assigned.

Then there is Major Milton Knight. That name was first given to me by my source Billy Les and I later confirmed it through a little interrogatory trick used on my dad. In other words, I didn't ask him if the guy on the plane was Knight, I asked him the name of the guy on the plane and he said it: Milton Knight. That suggests to me that either Billy Les and my dad knew each other and were perpetrating a hoax on me or else the plane flight took place and that Knight was really there.

We also have Wright-Patterson AFB for which it is a matter of documented history was in a direct supervisory and technical support function for my father's identified specialty. I say a trip to Wright-Pat remains a corroboration of his story.

There is my dad's specialty and USAF history with American manned space travel. If the secret project was real and had anything to do with anyone who flies in space, my dad could very well have been tasked to support it in some fashion.

Let's not forget that my dad was also assigned to Casualty Collection Team 1 at George AFB and therefore trained and experienced in response to crash incidents, specifically retrieval of material and personnel. And retrieval, as we all know, is often associated with UFO cases[247].

A picture is beginning to emerge. It could actually explain why the project in Arizona was so highly classified that exotic measures such as mind control and hypnotic suppression were deemed necessary to keep a lid on it.

Yes, USAF missile operations were expanding in the late 1950s. Silo facilities were being constructed underground throughout several areas of the southwest, Arizona included. There were 18 underground missile silos around Tucson alone, associated with Davis-Monthan AFB[248]. Missile defense was vital for the national defense during the Cold War and especially in its early days. The silos had to remain secure and therefore the locations were sensitive, usually classified information. That is all true.

But neither missile silos nor radar stations explain everything we've been looking at here. Not by a long shot, from my perspective.

There were other types of underground facilities being planned during this period. Command centers that would need to remain operational should war be raining up above would also would require a cloak of secrecy, lest the Soviets or even the Chinese lob a missile right onto its roof. Their locations would likewise be sensitive and certainly classified.

It is entirely possible that my dad was assigned to some function supporting the construction of an underground facility in Arizona in 1958. We know these things are real. We know they were built. This passes that popular (though often misapplied) Occam's Razor test that pops the skeptics' boners.

But there is a problem with known USAF underground facilities like missile silos and command centers, or even with camouflaged hangars in mountains.

Neither missiles nor radar were my dad's specialty.

He was a Physiological Training Specialist. He worked on issues directly related to pilots in aircraft, specifically high altitude operations. More importantly, my father worked under the USAF aviation medicine mission as designed and commanded by Otis Benson. My dad's job required the involvement of men who travel aboard aircraft.

CONCLUSION

Otis Benson's command tells me one thing: Whatever my dad would have been working on in a subterranean facility in eastern Arizona in 1958 had to do with manned space travel. If that was indeed the case -- and it was as highly classified as was indicated to me over the years -- then it further suggests one primary possibility: The Arizona project involved a classified manned space travel operations facility.

A secret USAF space program?

If Philip Corso's book was mixing truth with lies, consider what he says: "As a cover, NASA, in 1961, agreed to cooperate with military planners to work a 'second-tier' space program within and covered up by the civilian scientific missions."[249]

You decide for yourself. I was already convinced years ago that the USAF sends astronauts into space on covert missions.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

I'm not the man they think I am back home
I'm a rocket man
-- Elton John

I will now make a reasonable, and justified, wild ass speculation of colossal proportions:

My father's work in the US Air Force fell under a secret USAF manned spaceflight umbrella.

Thanks to acquisition of Nazi German scientists after WW2, the United States took a major leap forward and upward in all aspects of aerospace technology. Specifically through aviation medicine research augmented by the expertise of Paperclip scientists, manned space enthusiast Otis Benson was enabled to push the US Air Force into space. By the late 1950s, NASA took over the civilian space program and served as the public face of the American civilian scientific reach for the stars.

Meanwhile, under the approval of Curtis Le May, Otis Benson's vision and guidance resulted in the technology and personnel uniquely qualified to man the rockets and other craft being engineered by other commands. It was decided that this would be highly classified and remain so indefinitely -- largely because they knew we aren't alone up there but also because of the Cold War competition with the Soviets.

How's that? Have I pissed off enough skeptics yet?

I shall keep going...

By the summer of 1958, an installation was being constructed underground in Holbrook, Arizona. This was a launch facility that likely employed technology asymmetric to rocketry. It was placed underground also for its security, both from spying eyes[250] and from falling bombs. Personnel and equipment were deployed from all over the USAF during the construction and facility installation phases. Among the personnel would have been USAF space flight pilots and crews.

Likely because flight crew training for these military astronauts would be sensitive, it was decided to provide all the physiological training on site. Thus the necessary technology and materials were being installed and required specialists to inspect and maintain. That means physiological training materials and apparatuses. That's why my dad would have been there.

My father was not a security forces asset. He did not pull guard duty at entry control points (ECPs). But for some reason he and his colleagues were issued weapons, possibly even sidearms. Speculative explanations for this remain a murky issue, but for the purpose of this scenario let us surmise there was a perceived threat. It could have been communist spies in the southwest because we know there were indeed Soviet spies in the country at that time[251]. It may be that my dad and his colleagues were actually responsible for certain equipment so were therefore authorized to carry rifles and/or a sidearm.

This weapons issue is primarily important to address because the man who was killed in the encounter with the Others was carrying a gun, per my dad. There was an incident involving the use of the weapons. On one end of the spectrum, we have the encounter with someone down below. Might it actually have been Soviet agents or say an investigative busybody who found their way down there? Who knows? But let us say the encounter happened and a US airman was killed. Who shot whom?

I see issues with this part of the scenario. First, if a Soviet agent had been armed and for whatever reason shot and killed US military personnel, there is no inherent reason for my father to be fired or for losing his marbles if he fired back and killed the agent. However, if they had come across a nosy journalist or civilian and my father shot and killed that person, there might have been a potential scandal for the USAF and while trying to establish a very secret space facility.

Whatever the case, there is a man dead who shouldn't have be and the whole incident lands my dad in hot water or at least a pickle for on-site commanders. He is then packed up and put on the next plane out of Holbrook, possibly for Wright-Patterson to undergo MKULTRA depatterning and hypnotic manipulation. His direct memory of all events while in the underground facility are erased or blocked through selective amnesia and then suppressed with hypnosis, refreshed every month for the rest of his life by the full moon. For the first couple of decades, it works very well but begins to wear off around the twenty year mark, when he starts to tell the story in detail.

That's the scenario as I now see it. The reason I'm still entertaining the idea that my dad indeed was part of something underground in eastern Arizona is the nagging presence of source information and my own research on secret space program and breakaway technology issues.

Colonel Lundy flat out told me my dad's story was true, though he pushed me to draw out more details on my own. Billy Les knew the name of the intelligence officer on the plane in 1958 and I independently confirmed that through interrogatory technique on my father. The story being a complete fabrication, while certainly quite possible, remains a questionable conclusion. Enough opposing factors defy that explanation.

So I am going on the record here to suggest there was indeed a highly classified underground operation that involved a USAF manned space program element. Events surrounding a man being killed caused my dad to be reassigned. This is truly all I can confidently propose where my dad's story is concerned but it still offers much with which to be fascinated.

I've suggested in the past that the United States Air Force has likely been operating a secret manned space program for over half a century. I stand firmly by that supposition.

I have also proposed in the past that some sort of subterranean facility dedicated to said manned space program was built in the late 1950s or after, and alluded without detail and admittedly somewhat mysteriously to 'asymmetric' technology development, not rocketry. This resonates with things I heard while on active duty.

Now comes the next question: I get why the presence of a Soviet agent on the scene would be suppressed, and I especially understand why a curious civilian showing up down there would be suppressed, especially if either got killed by USAF personnel. But if the facility were simply a comparatively mundane USAF operation[252] and the shooting of the airman just a tragic incident of mishandling weapons, why would a fantastic tale of UFOs from a lost civilization and an encounter with a hidden underground culture be implanted into my dad's head as a cover in the interest of secrecy?

The only logic I can muster for implanting a wild fantasy story to cover something so important would be the hope that no one would pay serious attention to my dad if he told such a tall tale. Discredit the leak with elements unbelievable to most people.

But here's the problem with that: The moment some people hear the crazy cover story, they will head to the caverns and look for the lost civilization, i.e. they will start snooping around east of Winslow where the Air Force (hypothetically) doesn't want them snooping around.

If a weird story, why a weird story?

It appears to have always been a weird story...

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

And there's some rumors going round Someone's underground...

-- Don Henley & Bernie Leadon

It turns out that there was something else going on.

We know how the date of the legendary Roswell incident is placed sometime during the first week of July of 1947. The date of the MJ-12 documents is identified as 18 November 1952[253]. The former we have discussed already, the latter is highly questionable, as usually presented, and likely altered if not fake. But what is very curious to me are the dates, 1947 and 1952.

One of the problems I have with the MJ-12, or 'MAJESTIC 12' papers is the historical context. That is, the historical context is usually disregarded and may not even be known by many of those people invoking these controversial papers, usually to advocate the ET hypothesis. I think the true significance of the MJ-12 document, if it's real, has been missed.

The clue to what I think is unknown to UFO researchers is found in a heading stamp on the MJ-12 documents: MAJIC.[254]

I think MAJIC has a distinct reference to found in WW2 history.

Back in 1945, Operation Paperclip was shifted administratively from military intelligence to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The task of direct management of Operation Paperclip was given to the Joint Intelligence Objectives Agency. This JIOA was a subcommittee of the somewhat shadowy Joint Intelligence Committee, the chief spies for the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Citing a CIA monograph, Annie Jacobsen writes: "The JIC was and remains one of the most enigmatic of all the American intelligence agencies."[255]

As soon as the war ended in the summer of 1945, the JIC focused all its attention on the Soviet threat. Sixteen major intelligence reports and twenty-seven policy papers were produced by the JIC for the Joint Chiefs just that summer alone. In September of that year, the JIC advised that the United States would be in 'total war' with the Soviets by 1952.[256]

Let's pause to review. Midway through 1945, the JIC tells their bosses that 1952 is the red letter year for the impending Soviet threat to explode into open warfare -- in this new atomic era. Roswell, whatever it actually was, happens two years later. Then in the 1980s there emerge some alleged presidential briefing papers dated November of 1952. This is notable.

MAJIC and the Joint Intelligence Committee

For years, some people have wondered why the MJ-12 security heading was MAJIC when the word magic is correctly spelled with a G. Naturally one need only point to the text of these documents to find reference to OPERATION MAJESTIC-12 as an explanation for the header spelling of 'MAJIC'. 'MAJestIC' is the logic here. But what if that's not the case?

Let's pretend that there is something legitimate about the MJ-12 documents (without laughing). It has been proposed by others before me that whomever might have faked the documents used pieces of actual documents[257] including a possibly real classification stamp 'MAJIC'. Humor me a little further and consider for a moment that the 'MAJESTIC' title for the alleged operation was part of the fabricated elements of the MJ-12 documents, extrapolated from the stamp 'MAJIC'. What might this suggest within the historical context?

It might suggest that the header stamp 'MAJIC' is actually related to the Joint Intelligence Committee or the JIC.

How so? Annie Jacobsen refers to a JIC report in the "JIC 250" series, specifically JIC250/4 which reports to the JCS their concerns about German scientists disappearing from Germany and possibly ending up in Soviet employment (or custody)[258]. In this we have an historical precedent in high level intelligence reports labeled 'JIC' because there was a JIC, or Joint Intelligence Committee, issuing these reports.

Might the MAJIC stamp on the MJ-12 papers have actually been a header stamp lifted by the forgers of the MJ-12 papers from knowledge of JIC documents and terminology? And if we're asking that question, in light of the probability that 'MAJESTIC' itself being a fake name, is it unreasonable to suggest that the forgers simply added 'MA' to 'JIC' to make their MAJESTIC fit the scenario?

It could also be that 'MAJIC' was a legitimate header stamp thus the 'MAJESTIC' extrapolation by creative forgers. The point is MAJIC may indeed refer to the JIC and that suggests a different perspective on MJ-12 than is popularly assumed.

If any true parts exist in the 'MJ-12' documents, they might have had nothing to do with Roswell, simply appropriated to give the appearance of legitimacy to a false briefing report.

Interestingly, it is another document deemed fake that offers a possible answer to the 'MAJIC' question.

Karl T. Pflock tells of an interesting reference to the JIC itself in a document he otherwise reasonably argues is a fake. In his commentary on documents from Tim Cooper, of a town right up the mountain from me, Big Bear Lake, Pflock specifically addresses a "Memorandum for the Military Assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee".[259]

It was an intriguing possibility -- and yet I was to understand that the source was unreliable, a hoaxed product.

Military Assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee.

Look at it again:

Military

Assessment

Joint

Intelligence

Committee

Do you see it...?

M.A.J.I.C or MAJIC could very well refer to any given 'Military Assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee' and therefore rate a classification header stamp.

And I'm not the only one who noticed this. For example, the guys at Dark Government (darkgovernment.com) have also pointed this out. It's not rocket science. Why didn't any of the numerous researchers in the UFO field, especially those with a military or intelligence association, ever take the time to analyze the header?[260]

My point is that anyone who has taken the time to look closely can see the hand of Joint Intelligence Committee in this MAJIC aspect of the MJ-12 mess: MAJIC was, in my opinion, either a real dissemination header stamp or it was faked from the phrase 'Military Assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee'.

It could also be that the phrase was from faked from a fake 'MAJIC' header. How about that!

But let's suppose MAJIC really was a legitimate stamp for the sake of discussion, because it just might turn out to be true. The Cooper document contains the only direct reference to the JIC in these MJ-12 style documents that I found while working on this book. Maybe there are others.

What was the actual subject of the document?

"Examination of Unidentified Disk-like Aircraft Near Military Installations in the State of New Mexico: A Preliminary Report" dated 19 September 1947. I am compelled to mention this document because of the JIC reference, in spite Pflock's argument. Why?

Because the Joint Intelligence Committee's role in Operation Paperclip. Because it was Paperclip Germans who applied their expertise leading to our own space programs, secret or otherwise. Because of the preponderance of facts and circumstances surrounding Roswell indeed suggest the possibility that a supposedly defeated German enemy was still alive and well. Because of the JIC threat assessment in 1945 that we would be in total war with the Soviets by 1952 -- curiously the date of the controversial MJ-12 documents.

All of these things suggest a JIC hand in what we've been talking about in this book and what happened to my father. And there is yet another thing that keeps the JIC on my desktop short list in this bizarre situation. Something very compelling.

Nothing we've discussed up to this point could not be explained by the USAF emphasis on situational awareness designed to protect secret US military space and missile operations from prying Soviet eyes. Even extreme measures of mind control techniques such as hypnotism and amnesia would fit the bill of the times. Fear ran high, there was much unknown about the intentions of the Soviets and Chinese. Such measures would have seemed acceptable to try. But there remain other issues, the so called 'devil in the details' -- and it involves the JIC.

Let's turn again to Sidney Gottlieb for a little background.

Operation Often drew its name from Gottlieb's habitual use of the word 'often', one favorite phrase perhaps summing up Gottlieb's deeper personal interests being the following: "Often we forget that the only scientific way forward is to learn from the past."[261]

I find this to be of no small significance here. Sidney Gottlieb, the CIA scientist who raised goats for milk, who lived with his family in an old slave cabin, who grew Christmas trees, believed that the work of Ewen Cameron was on the verge of a breakthrough in paranormal research. Gottlieb himself would take Cameron's work in the direction of black magic and the supernatural. The Agency employed psychic mediums, astrologists and demonologists among other denizens of the occult arts and sciences in their support of the program. These interests were not new to Gottlieb.

And such things are not new to this world.

So what has this to do with the JIC and Roswell and my dad's story? Operation Often began in 1969 and continued into the 1970s but my dad's encounter in the underworld happened ten years prior, and Roswell a decade before that. How do these connect to the Joint Intelligence Committee?

What the hell does spooky hocus-pocus have to do with my dad and USAF space science?

More than you may think...

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Last thing I remember
I was running for the door
I had to find the passage back
To the place I was before...

-- Don Henley & Glenn Frey

I didn't write this book to convince anyone of anything.

This effort represents my attempt to put down in tangible form all the details of my dad's story. It's a book about my thoughts and conclusions and speculations on an issue personal to me and makes no difference to me how it does or does not reflect on the greater issue of ufology or the paranormal. As this is also a very personal book, I can't give you definitive answers for you to found a position and move on to the next topic. My hope is that you come away with as many questions as I had when I went into this.

I have fewer questions now. After writing this book, some things have become more perceptible. In every investigator's casebook will be found that internal data page on which go the items and insights not shared with the general public. These items and insights serve to make better sense of what is reported. They provide the perspective that often leads the investigator to an intuitive grasp of the truth.

What is on my internal data page are the things that I've shared with only a few trusted associates over the past nine years. I will not write about these things nor discuss them on the the radio or podcasts. I only bring them up now because my research on this book included material brought to my attention along the way. Specific things on my internal data page, things identical to that which have happened to me, showed up in the research material for this book. As I went deeper into my dad's mystery, I found this particular thing at every turn -- in my dad's story and in my own.

So let's get to it.

In his book Final Events And The Secret Government Group On Demonic UFOs And The Afterlife, Nick Redfern shares an odd tale of the US national security community's purported response to the 1947 mystery event and the dark odyssey that followed. According to his sources, the aftermath of the event we know as the 'Roswell' ET encounter led government agencies to attempt to grasp through occult means the nature of the otherworldly visitors. It is a fascinating perspective.

At the center of Redfern's book is a group called The Collins Elite. They are a select collection of military, intelligence and other government personnel who, as Redfern puts it, "await the future with overwhelming dread" in anticipation of the perceived hostile agenda of intruders who came here from a different realm of existence than our own[262]. They believe, we are told, that these intruders came to our world in 1947.

The trouble began with Aleister Crowley in 1918 and continued with Jack Parsons, according to the Collins Elite. In essence, Crowley's Amalantrah Working led to Parsons and L Ron Hubbard's Babalon Working in 1946 which, according to Parsons, may have opened the door that let something in -- somewhere in New Mexico in 1947.

Parsons suggested that even the Kenneth Arnold sighting at Mt Rainier in Washington was a result of his and Hubbard's attempt to create a 'moonchild' via black magic, i.e. deep occult ritual.[263]

Readers of my EOTW1: An Investigation of Espionage, Murder and the Occult co-authored with Richard B Spence, himself an author of an excellent book on Crowley, will recognize the novel 'Moonchild' which Crowley wrote between late 1915 and 1917. EOTW1 suggests the connection of Crowley's operation to the 1915 San Bernardino Working. In that book we propose that whatever Crowley knew of the events in San Bernardino which resulted in the questionable deaths of seven people served as a major influence and inspiration for much of his novel. The creation of a metaphysical 'moonchild' was actually attempted by Parsons and Hubbard thirty years later and may have wrought doom upon our heads, according to the Collins Elite.

Allegedly it was the investigation into Jack Parsons and his magician lifestyle, which included the libertine joys of 'loose women', that charmed and intrigued several of the agents investigating him. The charge was sharing classified material with unauthorized personnel. The Israelis were keenly interested in Parson's rocketry work (and who knows what else) and there was an issue of a document Parsons should not have removed from a secure workplace.[264] Enter the US Air Force.

It turns out that the Air Materiel Command was concerned about what Mr Parsons was sharing with the Israelis. You recall AMC, one of the host commands of Wright-Patterson AFB. They requested the Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI) meet with Parsons. The result of that meeting, we are told, is that a very nervous Parsons told the AFOSI agents that he felt responsible for opening an interdimensional doorway that let something in near Roswell. Parsons also allegedly confessed to knowing both Kenneth Arnold and Robert Goddard, the legendary rocket scientist working at Roswell in 1947, suggesting none of these connections were coincidental.[265]

Pause to consider that last bit. Kenneth Arnold, the man credited with the first report of the modern UFO era, was acquainted with Jack Parsons, the brilliant rocket scientists and JPL founder and sorcerer who claims to have caused 'Roswell', who was also pals with Robert Goddard, legendary rocket pioneer who was himself in New Mexico in 1947. And Parsons hinted to the AFOSI that these associations and what allegedly happened near Roswell had something to do with one another.

What do we extrapolate from that? I interpret this to mean that Parsons was telling AFOSI that Arnold had seen the same Others at Mt Rainier whose relatives popped through a portal in New Mexico just days later -- and Robert Goddard was involved somehow, but how exactly?

Go back to my suggestion of a secret US Army AF attempt at manned space flight. Goddard being the American rocketry icon at the time and being in New Mexico might place him on the insiders list of those involved with the flight. However, Parsons thought he had opened a portal and someone came through so where does that leave the secret manned flight idea?

Who knows? I can't answer that at this point, I'm just throwing out there the ideas that involvement of certain players suggest. My point ultimately is that there is so much evidence to suggest so many options that the whole situation is maddening.

According to one of Redfern's sources, this 1948 meeting between AFOSI agents and Jack Parsons resulted in the formation of a small group at Wright-Patterson AFB tasked to investigate the disciplines of demonology, ancient religions and the occult. The USAF group pursued knowledge on the esoteric world familiar to the celebrated but troubled rocket genius, interviewing priests and archaeologists and shamans alike, and coming away with a growing sense of worry that something was coming. Something bad.[266]

Pause again to consider: Here we have a distinct connection between Wright-Patterson AFB scientists, a milieu directly associated with my dad's specialty, supposedly looking into things from other dimensions, specifically the beings from these other dimensions.

Although Redfern's book makes a jump from this 1948 Wright-Patterson AFB group of investigators to the 1952 formation of the Collins Elite, I think it is quite significant to our context here that the first four years of this investigation into the occult and the identity of visitors from another dimension was solely in the hands of the United States Air Force.

It is the UFO flap over Washington DC in 1952 that ultimately drives the establishment of the deeply covert Collins Elite, notably just a week or so after the untimely death of Jack Parsons, we are told by Redfern's source.

What did the US Air Force learn in those four years before the reported formation of the Collins group? Did they keep it to themselves? Or did they report what they found to a higher authority? Since these events involved whatever it was that happened at Roswell -- where many of the Paperclip scientists were assigned -- might their findings have importance to the Paperclip authority JOIC and thus have been reported via the JIC?

Redfern's Collins Elite source claimed that the secrecy surrounding their work was because the USAF wanted to know if the source of the UFOs was 'the Devil' i.e. beings from another dimension[267]. That the classified group employed intelligence collectors and agents from three military branches suggests to me that oversight would likely fall to the JIC, if Redfern's sources are to be entertained. The Collins Elite, in my opinion, was likely formed by the JIC and reported to it.

Note also that the Collins Elite was formed in 1952 -- the very year that the JIC was convinced we would be at total war, albeit with the Soviets, according to known documented sources. Who were else might these guys have been worried about?

Let's say the Collins Elite exists as Redfern has been told. Its original complement was supposedly made up of sixteen agents from the USAF, Army G-2 (Intel) and Naval Intelligence. They were tasked with picking up where the USAF had reached a puzzled conclusion in their investigation into Parson's occult work -- and its similarity to UFO reports.[268]

So with the suggestion of a JIC association to this Collins Elite story, and my earlier postulation that JIC would have some possible connection to the MJ-12 milieu, we must now look again at the JIC assessment of 1945 that we would be in 'total war' with the Soviets by 1952.

Here again we have this period right after the war and then something happening in 1952: The JIC proposed war with the Soviets, the UFO flap in Washington DC, the untimely death of Jack Parsons, the date of the MJ-12 documents, and the alleged formation of the Collins Elite. Is there something missing from that JIC assessment of 1945 that has remained classified?

Consider that 'Roswell' happened two years after the JIC assessment and the MJ-12 papers are dated 1952. Pretend for a moment that the Operation MAJESTIC 12 panel itself was real. If the JIC was indeed the authority to which the Collins Elite reported, this might suggest that the header 'MAJIC' indeed does indicate that the JIC reported to the convened group of twelve men identified in the documents. What did they report?

The problems with the MJ-12 documents we have already discussed, but a tactic in selling disinformation is to include some factual data.[269] I suspect that the factual data in the MJ-12 documents was an accurate list of involved parties, the twelve men, among whom were major USAF commanders, I might add.

If it is the text about the retrieval of UFO crash debris that was fabricated by the document hoaxers, then we can only guess what an authentic 1952 JIC report to MAJESTIC 12 contained. Perhaps it was actually a report on the USAF findings in their four year investigation into what Jack Parsons was doing -- perhaps they had reason to assume they were dealing with being from another dimension. That might imply that it was MAJESTIC 12, confronted with this otherworldly information, that instructed the JIC to form the Collins Elite.

That puts a different spin on 'Roswell' and might explain the more esoteric aspects of MKULTRA. Might the JIC forecast of 'total war' with the Soviets in 1952 have reflected what the Soviets were doing with mind control -- or, more specifically, what they were doing with other occult technologies?

If what Redfern's sources say about Jack Parsons' role in motivating USAF investigation into the occult is true, and if whatever happened in New Mexico in 1947 caused a concern over otherworldly things, could the 1952 assessment have also been about what Russian-captured German scientists were sharing with the Soviets in this regard?

And if that were the case, is it not reasonable to consider that some of our Paperclip Nazis would have known much of the same esoteric secrets that their former colleagues were suspected of sharing with the Russians?

Who exactly was the JIC really worried about?

Consider again the Paperclip Germans working for us in New Mexico and the scenario of a secret US Army Air Force attempt at manned spaceflight. What else might the Germans have enabled and encouraged us to try?

Might we have fooled around with the mysterious Nazi Bell?

The opening of portals was already on someone's mind at the end of WW2. US military intelligence could have already been aware of what Jack Parsons was planning to do in 1946 through an agent planted close to the rocketry wizard.

It so happens that L Ron Hubbard was a US Naval officer whose career reflects an outstanding officer of incredible wartime leadership and accomplishment, according to his Scientology biography.

However, the Department of the Navy has stated that the exploits depicted by Scientology are not supported by Hubbard's personnel record. What the US Navy does report is a comedy of errors and shenanigans of almost hilarious proportion. People who knew Hubbard say the version he told himself was always much closer to the opinion of the Navy. Perhaps most curious is the assessment of one US Air Force veteran, Colonel L. Fletcher, is that Hubbard may actually have been assigned to Naval Intelligence. [270]

Whatever you choose to believe about L Ron Hubbard, he was indeed a personal associate of Jack Parsons. He did practice occult magic with Parsons, including the notorious Babalon Working which Parsons suspected was the cause of the 1947 event in New Mexico. Consider what we've discussed thus far about Paperclip, the US Air Force, the JIC, Wright-Patterson and its investigation into the occult, and what we may have learned about lost ancient technology from the Paperclip Nazis (the Bell) and what we suspected the Soviets were doing with 'mind control' which sparked our quest for that same grail.

Now consider that Hubbard himself - the guy who came up with Scientology and all its mind games -- had vaguely suggested the Navy had wanted him to work issues relative to mind control. What do you think about that?

Since Hubbard was a Navy Intelligence officer with esoteric interests, I find it a reasonable possibility that he was assigned to get close to and collect on Parsons. And that suggests that the US military -- read that the JIC -- already knew what Parsons and Hubbard had done in 1946, and thus may have already suspected what really happened in New Mexico the following summer near Roswell.

And if the JIC already knew that Roswell was an event involving people from another dimension and not an ET event, we have now cut a different facet on the activities of the early days of the CIA's its mind control quest, specifically a new perspective on the work of Sidney Gottlieb in light of his esoteric personal interests and his belief in 'learning science from the past'.

If anyone in the 1950s CIA might have steered things in an occult direction, it would have been Sidney Gottlieb. The reported enthusiasm of the US Air Force for everything MKULTRA just fed Gottlieb's appetite. The argument for JIC interest and its likely authority over the alleged Collins Elite may be reflected in USAF interest in psychic consultant Andrija Puharich. Gottlieb's Project Often would take this USAF example and put it on steroids.

Puharich had been studying ESP since 1947 when, in that special year 1952, he was contacted at his Maine laboratory by his friend who was Chief of Research in the office of Psychological Warfare for the US Army. This friend, a colonel, expressed that the Army was interested in psychic research. Puharich said that he gave a report on this topic to the aforementioned Army office in late 1952. Redfern's Collins Elite source claimed the Army and the CIA were jointly interested in this report and Redfern cites an actual CIA document titled "A History of Ouija and Intelligence Applications" dated February of 1954.[271]

In the midst of all this was Sidney Gottlieb. According to Redfern source Robert Manners, the Collins Elite was well aware of Gottlieb's interests and found them disturbing. By the late 1960s, Gottlieb was steering the intelligence field into the murky waters of the occult, seeking to 'harness demonic powers as tools of espionage'. Gottlieb apparently believed that Ewen Cameron (remember him?) had actually been at the threshold of a breakthrough in paranormal studies -- and thus Gottlieb used Project Often to explore black magic and the supernatural.[272]

It isn't likely that Gottlieb's interest in such things began suddenly in the 1960s. Remember, he was the guy who lived a somewhat rustic lifestyle with his family and who said "Often we forget that the only scientific way forward is to learn from the past..."[273]

How far back? To the foggy days of legend? Perhaps to the days of the Tuatha de Danann?

I have discussed some rather esoteric aspects of my dad's story throughout this book, but can we connect any of these occult pursuits of the CIA more specifically to my dad's service in the Air Force?

Yes we can.

According to Nick Redfern's source, a Dr M.K. Savely of the Aero Medical Division of the United States Air Force Office of Scientific Research was interviewed about his personal contact with Andrija Puharich in the summer of 1957. Dr Savely reported that Puharich had formed a group of fourteen experts in psychic research who were developing methods of telepathy, and that this research was financed by investors including a Representative Bolton of Ohio[274]. Savely also acknowledged Puharich's service with the US Army Medical Corps, assigned to the Army Chemical Center in Edgewood, Maryland[275]. Savely gave a good character reference for Puharich.[276]

Not only do we have Puharich working at an Army facility known to have employed Paperclip Germans, and all that implies within the context of this book, we have Dr M. K. Savely identified with USAF aviation medicine[277], the very field to which my dad was assigned, the field that was commanded and designed by Otis Benson, the biggest advocate for manned space travel in the US Air Force.

Though I could not find M.K. Savely independent of Redfern's book, I did find a document from the 1960s on ejection seat injuries that references an H.E. Savely[278], and also a 'Joint Services Electronic Program Reports List' with Dr Harvey E. Savely, Director of Life Sciences in the Air Force Office of Scientific Research. On this list is also the CIA, the USAF School of Aerospace Medicine at Brooks AFB, various cryptically identified technical offices at Wright-Patterson AFB, a cryptically identified technical office at Maxwell AFB, and the USAF Project RAND -- all organizations discussed in this book and all associated with aspects of my dad's story[279], in some cases directly.

Here we have a reported USAF aviation medicine and aero medical lab scientist meeting with psychics and in the background there are USAF elements and bases at the heart of my dad's story -- organizations we have learned were pursuing esoteric mind science and occult knowledge. MKULTRA brought the CIA and the defense department closer together via the various projects involving psychics and demonology and the like, dating back to the post WW2 era.

Though all of this certainly could suggest that USAF MKULTRA scientists conjured a story of ancient subterranean dwellers and flying machines and magic deadly wands to cover a comparatively mundane USAF operation, I am of the mind that the irony here may be that nobody made up anything of the sort. All Colonel Lundy said was that they hypnotized my dad to suppress what he encountered down below. He said nothing about a 'planted narrative'. He never said my dad's story did not happen as he told it.

In defense of my dad's story, there is the known history of underground facilities constructed by the USAF, the branch of the military at the heart of the Operation Paperclip program and the enthusiastic customer of early CIA programs on mind control. In the milieu of Nazi scientists, mind control, occult experiments and a dawning space program can be found USAF aviation medicine, the very field in which my dad spent his entire enlistment.

On this particular issue, I think that whatever happened to my dad, whatever he really experienced on his deployment to Arizona, was directly influenced and mandated by this joint military-intelligence venture of mind control research.

Why?

I think that whatever the project in Arizona was, be it merely our very critical and sensitive missile defense system or an even more secret and vital manned Air Force space program facility, it was apparently decided that an hypnotically-induced selective amnesia would be applied as a means of suppression some aspect of his participation.

Whether this was the consequence of his unexpected departure or the pre-determined security requirement for all personnel upon departure from the project remains a question, but either the events in the underground happened the way my dad described them or the wilder aspects of his tale were elements of that 'planted narrative' we discussed earlier, something the CIA had been working on for years by 1958.

So why would such a fantasy story be implanted?

Using elements of occult fairy lore found in native mythology may simply have been one way to further protect the classified project by making it hard for anyone to believe the story should the hypnosis break down and the amnesia wear off. As my dad tells the story, the elements of lore and mythology would certainly sound like fantasy to anyone hearing it and thus he would be taken less seriously. This would hypothetically serve to deter wide interest in what my dad told anyone about the underground. But why not just implant a mundane cover story?

Why implant an encounter with Native American 'Ant People' wielding magic tubes that kill?

Might not implanting a wild fairy story to cover something you want to hide, or even discourage suspicion of, might be defeating the purpose. Look at what I'm doing here with this book: digging into this fairy story and making connections that perhaps the Air Force and CIA would not have wanted people to notice. I argue that something a bit more mundane and even boring would have better served operational security.

CONCLUSION

This is where I'm supposed to tell you exactly what happened to my dad back in 1958 and put to rest all the questions in a manner to please everyone.

I can't do that. The whole episode remains the sort of tale told late at night, perhaps not much different than those you might hear on the radio before drifting off to sleep. I can neither confirm that what my dad said is true nor will I assure the reader that it was all a dream or simple fabrication. The facts and circumstances at every turn defy the easy answer.

Not for a moment do I think my dad was willfully making it all up. Neither do I have reason to suspect Colonel Lundy was lying to me[280]. That Billy Les had the name of the guy my dad says was on the plane is too compelling to dismiss. What I know about the Air Force and what I've learned through my research and investigations these past nine years also convinces me that something about what my dad said is true.

I am convinced that his story happened, one way or another. I am also pretty certain that whatever MKULTRA techniques were applied to his psyche affected the remainder of his life, exacerbating whatever issues were there naturally; issues that might likely have manifested no differently than those of most anyone else had he not been exposed to this often bizarre field of psychological warfare.

But I also think he allowed it to be done because it was his duty. The Honorable discharge speaks to that.

I am one of many who can say 'My dad helped put men on the Moon' and one of fewer who can possibly say 'My dad helped send men across the stars and God knows where else...'

So what remains?

There is the mystery of Gerry Irwin and the tube-wielding Hav-Musuvs and also the UFO occupants reported by Schirmer in Nebraska. There is Jacques Vallee and his suspicion that something else is going on here, that the mysterious 'others' may have been with us all along while cleverly masquerading as what we mistakenly assume them to be. We find ourselves again looking for these shy Others who reveal themselves only to those whom they choose and trust.

Jacques Vallee says that the realm of the Others "constitutes a sort of parallel universe, which co-exists with our own. It is made visible and tangible only to selected people, and the 'doors' that lead through it are tangential points, known only to the elves."[281]

You will have to decide for yourself whether you agree with me or not. I think there is something going on around us, others living beside us, perhaps asymmetrically. I'm convinced my dad encountered them somewhere beneath Holbrook, Arizona, in the late 1950s. They have been with us for a very long time and their presence explains a lot more than some care to acknowledge. Some fear them, others recognize and welcome them, and many others say there is no evidence that they ever were.

As for me, I am unable to disavow the existence of the Tuatha de Danann and of them I will say no more.

FOREWORD

At this point I would like to express my sincere thanks to some of our readers at home and abroad for sending in documents and newspaper reports from various parts of the world. This has enabled me to provide an even better insight into these extraordinary connections which are hardly known to the world public.

The reader should, in view of the current situation, show understanding for the fact that in the chapter 'German Restricted Areas', precise geographical information on their location is partly missing, and has been made unrecognizable in a document in the appendix, and that precise source information and dates are missing, although I have them.

If in Part I of SECRET WONDER WEAPONS only the German Antarctic region was mentioned as a representative of various other German restricted areas, the facts were not nearly as substantiated as they are today. Now that there are more or less precise references to various other areas in connection with the deportation, as well as German aviation developments not captured in 1945, a much more accurate overall picture is emerging.

THE GERMAN FLYING DISC DEVELOPMENT

As explained in more detail in Part I of this series of publications entitled 'Secret Wonder Weapons' , the prototypes of the flying objects referred to today by the media as flying saucers or UFOs were demonstrably developed in Germany before 1945 under the names flying gyroscopes, flying discs, humming gyroscopes or V-7s. The following picture emerges from the press reports of the 1950s:

I. Captain and factory pilot, Ing. Rudolf Schriever and Ing. Habermohl worked on the hermetically sealed part of the factory airfield of the German BMW factory in Prague.
A Schriever model first flew on June 1, 1942; a manned first flight took place on February 14, 1945 in Prague.

II. Dr.-Ing. and Colonel of the Pioneer Corps Heinrich Richard Miethe developed the system at the BMW plant in Breslau. After the collapse of fascism in Italy, the Italian inventor and turbine engineer Professor Giuseppe Beluzzo took part in this work.

The report prepared for the Führer after Miethe's first flight was leaked to the enemy and thus became known. Miethe wrote in it:

"Today, April 17, 1944, the 'Vergeltungswaffe 7' was tested over the Baltic skies under my leadership and in the presence of three colonels of the Luftwaffe. The following summary contains the general characteristics and the achieved performance of the missile.

- The V7, a supersonic helicopter equipped with 12 BMW028 turbochargers, reached an altitude of 20,803 metres on its first test flight and an altitude of 24,200 metres on its second ascent at the nozzles and a thrust of 2,600 kiloponds; in the air it was 5,400 C V. and 2,900 kiloponds thrust.

- On the ground the engine developed a power of 5,500 C V.

- Helium served as the basic fuel. 22 cubic metres were sufficient for a flight of 76 hours and 10 minutes.
- In Peenemünde the launch took place from a vertical tower, with the help of an additional rocket within 15.8 seconds.
- In principle, the device could also be operated with nuclear energy."

S. 90 (1)

Graduate physicist Illo Brand comments on this Miethe report : "The development work on this missile was carried out in the workshops of the Tenth Army in Essen, Dortmund, Stettin and Peenemünde, where the Retaliation Weapons VI and V2 were also tested ."

S. 90 (1)

III. The Austrian implosion expert Victor Schauberger, who was received by the Führer for a first meeting in the Reich Chancellery in Berlin in 1934, created his first experimental model made of copper in 1940 at the Kertl company in Vienna IV, and later worked with Polish and Czech engineers and structural engineers who were first imprisoned and later released in the Mauthausen concentration camp. (2)

IV. At the Waldpolenz air base near Wurzen, about 25 km east of Leipzig, the flight instructor Lieutenant Schmidt developed

The order given here corresponds to the respective secrecy levels that were in place at the time: I = top secret; II = strictest secrecy; III = strictest secrecy; IV = absolute secrecy. (According to N. Jürgen-Ratthofer, No. 20/1980,

S. 15 (3)

However, under secrecy level IV, Jürgen-Ratthofer claims that here, under the care of the German Reich Research Office - on the basis of the electrogravity experiments of the famous Italian physicist Marconi, who died in 1937 - a 30 to 35 year old German-speaking technician and inventor and possible student of Marconi was developing flying discs. However, the occupation and post-war press has almost nothing to report about this; which is irrelevant, since as an instrument of the enemy, they did not know much anyway, and where they did know, they misled the reader by twisting, diverting and distorting, to the detriment of Germany and the German people.

There is something wrong with the first test reports about the first German flying disc launch attempts:

These reports also talk about jets, turbo units, adjustable blades (similar to propellers) and a lot of mechanics, as well as various conventional fuels.

But all of this seems most likely not to be present in the flying discs or UFOs that are repeatedly seen and, in serious cases, even come into action, or has been kept to a minimum. The flying discs make no noise other than a quiet humming sound, apparently have no exhaust fumes and demonstrate zigzag flights or make right-angled turns even at several times the speed of sound. But this is precisely what is not possible with conventional flight technology or propulsion systems.

Either the reports given to the press by Schriever, Habermohl, Miethe and others were distorted to confuse the enemy, or their series of developments are to be considered second or third class; which is to be assumed because Schauberger, Miethe etc. were not included in the large-scale removal maneuver in the mid-1940s (it is proven that it took place; we will report on it later). You don't leave top scientists and inventors behind and hand them over to the enemy, especially since you didn't intend to give up the fight, but to take it up again from a much higher level!

The following two letters from readers report on flying discs over Mecklenburg from 1943 and over Oldenburg in 1944. In one case, the zigzag movement is mentioned, in the other another characteristic is reported: the 'red-hot' disc:

I saw > Flying Plates <

After an Italian colleague recently spoke up and explained that the 'flying saucers' were nothing new, but that they had already been sighted over Germany and Italy during the war, as they were weapons that were being tested, I would also like to say something on the subject:

The fact is that other eyewitnesses and I in Neustrelitz i. M. — from the summer of 1943 onwards at intervals — saw such “flying saucers” from the shore of Lake Zierker. To us they looked like vertical, flying, flat disks that were glowing red and

This information about flying saucers was not only provided to us, but also about 70 km south of Prague, near the road from Prague to Pilsen.
The headquarters or administration was in Prague. HL's wife, who had only ever been told a harmless version of her husband's work, only remembered that her husband had to travel about 1 1/2 hours from Prague to the factory site. My brother was only able to answer a small part of my 11 written questions and hardly any precise answers. In any case, nothing fell into the hands of the enemy, because in January/February 1945 the technicians and engineers flew away with their wives and children to an unknown destination in flying discs. Nothing of use was left behind. When I asked why his brother had died here in Germany, I received the answer that the selection had been made based on the children, families with children under 10 were not taken, and his brother had two small children at the time. But those who remained here were not left in Prague, but - presumably to prevent enemy interrogation - evacuated to Bavaria, where they were settled in isolated and scattered locations. All he had learned about the propulsion system from his brother was: 'Completely new type of propulsion. And when I asked about the flying disc armament, the answer was 'Some kind of beam, maybe laser?

Effect of the weapons: normal engines stop.'

Nothing was known about the size of the factory, the number of employees, the number of flying discs manufactured, the number of people who left there and how many flying discs they manufactured.

When he visited his brother in Prague in December 1944 - he still remembered - his brother said to him: 'I have to leave urgently tomorrow morning. Hermann is coming to an important meeting', by Hermann he meant Göring. The Reich Aviation Minister and Reich Marshal often visited and inspected the factory premises. When he returned from the meeting late in the evening, he said in a hopeful voice: 'What we need is a little more time, then the war will turn in our favor again. I am not allowed to tell you any more details.'

Based on my correspondence with the brother of the deceased Dipl.-Ing. HL and especially after several long telephone conversations, I am convinced that I can absolutely trust these details and that nothing has been glossed over or added without authorization. My confidant was able to the fortification measures became clearer, and there was most likely still some essential work to be completed.

THE FUNCTION OF FIREBALLS - AND THEIR PRODUCTION FACILITIES

During the last months of the war, Allied pilots reported: 'silver balls floating in the air', 'mysterious round, glowing flying objects' which they had seen in the air over the various European fronts and also during their terror attacks on the civilian population in German cities, and which at times accompanied them up close.

It was probably partly manned flying discs and partly these apparently unmanned spheres that Germany's Allied enemies called 'foo fighters' (enemy fighter planes). Dipl. physicist Illo Brand writes about these spheres, also called 'fireballs' :

> "As a by-product of this research (here we mean the ignition interference of enemy aircraft engines, which we will come to later; author's note), another air force center, which was led by Speer and the technical troops of the SS, had developed methods for radio interference with American night fighters. From these investigations a highly original flying machine was created: it was round and armored; it was roughly shaped like a turtle. The flying machine was powered by a turbojet engine that was also flat and round. In flight, the engine produced a huge halo of glowing flames, which gave the machine the name 'fireball'. After takeoff, these objects were initially guided by radio to the vicinity of the enemy aircraft. Infrared sensors, which responded to the hot exhaust gases, took over the further automatic navigation.
> The fiery halo around the objects - which was created by special fuel mixtures - and the chemical additives that were able to ionize the air in the immediate vicinity resulted in considerable electrical interference fields.
> Specially developed and specially protected klystron tubes also emitted strong electromagnetic pulses, massively disrupting enemy radar systems."

The English UFO reference work 'The Encyclopedia of UFOs' quotes under the keyword 'foo-fighter ' the Italian flight engineer Renato Vesco from his article in the Argosy magazine of August 1969, in which he states

"Later encounters with foo fighters led experts to believe that they were German inventions of a new way to fool radar. How close they came to the truth became clear when Allied intelligence experts entered the secret Nazi factories. The foo fighters seen by Allied pilots were only a small demonstration and a fraction of a variety of methods for defeating radar and disrupting electromagnetic currents. Work on an anti-radar fireball was accelerated at a Luftwaffe experimental center near Oberammergau in the fall of 1944. There and at the aeronautical facilities at Wiener Neustadt the first fireballs were manufactured. Later, as the Russians approached Austria, these productions were transferred to the Black Forest. Quick and remotely controlled, equipped with klystron tubes operating on the same frequency as the enemy radar, they could wipe the radar signals from the screen and were thus invisible to ground control."

At least this English UFO encyclopedia was prepared to admit that the German secret weapon theory in the case of the initially so-called 'Foo Fighters' is more likely than attempts at extraterrestrial explanations, and adds: 'as many would like to believe'.

Regarding the planning and production of the fireballs, we read from Dipl.-Phys. Brand:

"Planning for the 'Fireball' project began in the aircraft factories in Wiener Neustadt and in the Oberpfaffenhofen Aircraft Radio Research Institute (FFO). As the Russians approached the Austrian border, further work was carried out in underground factories at the Zeppelin works in the Black Forest. The klystron tubes were supplied by the German Reichspost Research Institute (FDRP) in Aach near Radolfzell. A person who was present at the first launch of a 'Fireball' can still remember the flight characteristics of the device. During the day, the thing looked like a glowing top rotating on its own axis. At night, the 'Fireball' was comparable to a burning ball."

The English UFO encyclopedia also writes about the fireballs: "The Foo Fighters or Kraut Balls (the 'Krauts' was a strong expression for the sauerkraut-eating Germans on the English-American side; inserted by the author), as they are also called were first observed as very small balls of light that followed and apparently annoyed fighter and bomber planes during the last months of World War II. These miniature UFOs appeared alone, in pairs or in groups and sometimes seemed to be under some kind of remote, intelligent control. They sometimes emitted a steady beam of red, gold or white light, sometimes pulsating."

In 'Secret Wonder Weapons' II, p. 8+9, three American press reports from December 13, 1944, about sighted new German fireballs were reproduced, and two more from January 2, 1945 are to follow here:

"The London Daily Telegraph:
In Alsace, January 1, 1945 'And now the Phoo-Fighters'. Phoo-Fighters are the sensation of our harassment flights. They are strange orange lights that follow our planes in formation and individually, and also turn and climb. Some have come within a few meters of the planes and have been shot down. Another type appears under the wings and sends out a series of dim flashes. (Express News Service.)"

On the same day, the New York Herald Tribune reported on a Night fighter base in France:

"On December 13, 1944, it was announced to press reporters that the Germans had used silvery balls against aircraft flying in during the day. Pilots report that they have seen these balls individually and in clusters during their flights over the Rhine. Now it seems as if the Germans have thrown something new into the night sky over Germany. They are the crazy, mysterious 'Foo Fighter' balls that race along the wing tips of the 'Beaufighters' flying night jamming missions over Germany. The crews have been encountering this sinister weapon during their night missions for more than four weeks. No one seems to know what this flying weapon is. The fireballs appear suddenly and accompany the aircraft for many kilometers. They seem to be controlled by radio from the ground. At least that is what intelligence reports say: 'There are three types of these lights that we call Foo Fighters,' says Lt Donald Meiers of Chicago. 'One is a red ball that appears at our wing tips and accompanies us. No. 2 is a vertical line of three fireballs that flies ahead of us and No. 3 is a group of about 75 lights that appears in the distance and stands in the sky like a Christmas tree whose lights are switched on and off.'

The pilots of this night fighter squadron, which has been in operation since September 1943, consider these fiery balls to be the most mysterious thing they have ever seen. They are convinced that these foo fighters are used as a psychological and military weapon, although it is not the nature of fireballs to attack an aircraft. 'Recently a foo fighter caught me at a height of around 220 m and chased me for over 30 km down the Rhine valley,' said Meiers. 'I turned to the right and... two fireballs circled with me! We were doing a good 420 km/ h, but the fireballs easily kept up. Another time we were also caught by a foo fighter and I fell away at 580 km/ h. The ball stayed at the height of our wing tip for quite a while and then shot off upwards. When I saw the thing stuck to the tip of my wing, I had the horrible thought that somewhere on the ground a German would press a button and blow me up. But they neither explode nor attack us. They just follow us and seem extremely curious."

This is the New York Herald Tribune from January 2, 1945, during the final phase of World War II. This and the previous report appeared in Harold T. Wilkins' book: 'Flying Saucer in the Moon' in Chapter II: 'The Coming of the Foo Fighters'; taken from UFO News, No. 70, June 1962. In his book 'Flying Saucer on the attack', published in 1967 by Ace Books, Ins., New York, Wilkins deals in detail with these Foo Fighters.

We would like to avoid filling several pages with eyewitness and pilot reports about fireballs sighted at that time. In the chapter 'The era of the 'Foo Fighters' and 'Kraut Balls' from 1941-1945', pages 71-110, I. Brand (1) reproduces a whole series of well-known reports of Allied pilots' experiences. See also: 'The UFO phenomenon', by JvButtlar, p. 15/16 (28)

We find two, albeit sparse, references to the fireballs in Fritz Trenkle's book 'Die deutschen Funkstörverfahren bis

On page 93 under the stamp 'Secret Command Matter' there is a painted picture: A vehicle with transmitting and receiving devices installed in the rear, next to it a parabolic mirror standing on the ground. Adjacent information: '"Fireball' jammer; Fireball RPF transmitter" plus further technical information. Apparently the mobile ground station for the fireballs. On page 168 in the table 'Radio jamming and radio deception system': "Fireball=RPF transmitter= Post-Klystron" with additional technical information. (7) The English.

Consul Gordon W. Creighton wrote in a lengthy report on the 'Foo Fighters' in 1962:

> "After the occupation of Germany by the Allies, however, no more 'foo fighters' were observed there. Even in a detailed investigation of the German test sites and their Ceheim projects, nothing was found - as far as we know - that would suggest that the Germans had invented something that could fly in formations for hours as golden or silver balls and could be made invisible and then visible again from one moment to the next." No. 70, 6/1962, Ufo-Nachr.

Which could also mean that step by step the occupation of Germany was carried out as part of the large-scale and yet very secret removal maneuver; so that the Allied spying agents could no longer find anything.

In previous years, US Major Donald E. Keyhoe in the Pentagon was denied access to these Foo Fighter files on the grounds that this specific data was still classified.

A special department of the British secret service under the leadership of Lieutenant General Massey and codenamed 'Section T' began collecting and examining these reports as early as 1943, and they were immediately classified as 'secret' in 1944.

When fireballs hit the entire southwestern United States, as well as the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Washington, and the U.S. island of Puerto Rico, the U.S. Air Force set up 'Project Twinkle' in 1949 to research these mysterious balls, which were not only observed by hundreds of U.S. pilots, weather observers, and atomic researchers, but also by Air Force colonels, U.S. intelligence officers, and senior chiefs of staff. The first Project Twinkle observation station was in Vaughn, New Mexico, and later, among others, at Holloman Air Force Base in Alamogordo (New Mexico).

This first observation project, Twinkle, was later incorporated into the general UFO observation and defense organizations that the US government felt compelled to create and which it expanded from year to year, such as:

- the Air Defense Command ; - the Air Force Intelligence ; - the super-secret NSA; National Security Agency with its 15,000 employees, which deals largely with UFOs; - NORAD (the North American Defense Command's early warning system) with its 35,000 employees; - and other organizations.

Based on the multi-page newspaper report by the American Dr. Georg Hunt Williamson 'The Green Fireballs' (9), the following can be said in summary about these mysterious flying balls, also called 'telemeter discs' - only a subset of the German flying discs:

They are silently flying, artificially powered, partly remote-controlled, partly self-reacting, spherical or disc-shaped objects measuring a few centimetres to one metre (sometimes more) in size, which, depending on their type of propulsion, flight characteristics and type, are observed to fluoresce green, white, yellow and red, and were developed and built before 1945 in secret, partly underground German research centres and used to collect information and for flight reconnaissance, radar and radio jamming purposes, clearly by the German side - before 1945 still from German soil, after 1945 mostly from spaceships or spacecraft.

'UFOs' - were launched. They are divided into three, possibly more types depending on their design or area of responsibility and in most cases have so far been indestructible by gunfire.

without neutralizing harmful radioactivity in the earth's atmosphere caused by the atomic and radioactive experiments of the Allied powers in the East and West. After completing their task, the 'balls' can either be retrieved by remote control or dissolved or atomized in the task area, in which case a silent (!) light explosion takes place (see photo of a fireball, taken from "Le Figaro Magazine", Paris, most likely in the stage of such a silent 'light explosion' in the appendix). The fireballs are similar in their significance to our own remote-controlled devices; only on a much higher level, says Dr. Williamson.

Air analyses carried out in the USA after such fireball dissolutions showed concentrations of copper particles in the air, from which it is concluded for these and other reasons that the essence of these ominous balls consists of crystalline copper or copper and crystal. Dr. Williamson describes the properties of copper, which until now were probably only known esoterically/ alchemically, as follows:

> "Copper in particular has the strange ability to register and hold on. Copper can be compared to a soul in terms of its receptivity and, like a soul, can reproduce impressions once received. One can say: copper never forgets; it does not lose the impressions it has received. Copper is a layered, attentive, crystallized consciousness. ..." (9)

The possibility of using crystals for transmitting messages no longer sounds quite so incomprehensible, but only because they have now found their way into the field of communications technology as transistors (semiconductor crystals) and as crystal detectors (germanium crystals). In 1930, Rudolf J. Gorsieben dealt with the theory of crystals in a philosophical way in a book chapter and made the statement "all substance, all matter is crystallized spirit" (10). With the materialistic way of thinking that we have been taught, we will certainly not get any further here; we must be prepared to think differently!

In the first post-war years, this material dissolution, this silent and flash-like dematerialization of a fireball, was simply incomprehensible. "The World of November 7, 1950 reported how thirty employees of an electric power plant in the city of Seattle in the US state of Washington observed a fiery flying object gliding slowly over the city, which then, as it moved over South Seattle exploded:

> "The police were immediately notified. The eyewitnesses indicated an area of about 16 blocks where the missile must have landed. With the help of the fire department, this area was searched. However, no remains were found, nor any other trace that would suggest that an accident had occurred. So what should one make of such a report? Does it not lead one to believe that the celestial bodies explode when their propulsion power is exhausted, and that the fragments dissolve and become gaseous during the fall?
> There is little we can say about it.....

The ominous-looking flying balls can therefore orient themselves and inform themselves worldwide through words, images and sound, and do so without having to engage in expensive espionage in the traditional sense, simply by using these flying microphones and television eyes to record and play back colored images and three-dimensional projections (it should be remembered that the first usable television set was first presented to the world public in the spring of 1936 at the Berlin Radio Exhibition and was first used in the same year at the Summer Olympics, also in Berlin.

The production of the 'people's television', which had just gone into series production in 1939, came to a halt because the war broke out. Technical advances were therefore already available. The idea that these fireballs could also perceive people's thoughts and feelings, penetrate into locked rooms through chimneys, slits, doors and openings, and not only record conversations and secret conferences of the opposing side, but also scan written texts, thus preventing planned military actions or political crimes from being concealed, simply sounds too fantastic and improbable.

Highly developed computers are apparently used to store the fireball information collected from all over the world (it should also be remembered here that the computer was developed in Germany in the second half of the 1930s by the German engineer Konrad Zuse). Here again, one can see that the intellectual and technical-physical prerequisites were there to create such 'wonder weapons' . There was certainly no lack of will and energy, especially at that time. And when people in Germany spoke of 'wonder weapons' in the last years of the war , it is only too logical that these were not just a simple invention.

We have to get used to the idea that the miracle wars were an extraordinary technological leap if we want to approach the topic without prejudice.

The 'realism' that has been handed down to us, or rather forced upon us , based on the false doctrine of scientific materialism of the 18th and 19th centuries, which only recognized what we can see, measure, weigh, touch and count, will have a hard time finding its way into the third millennium, into the spiritually determined age of Aquarius. The 'realist ' who thinks only with his intellect is already cornered today when he is asked to explain from the perspective of this long-outdated world view why, for example, a bone fracture inside the body can be conjured up on a photographic plate using X-rays, or how images and words can be sent from the moon to the earth and vice versa without a direct cable connection and made audible or visible here or there (radio and television). Or how light is created, what electricity really is. And if we are still being educated in this unrealistic world view of the eternal yesterday people in schools, higher education institutions and universities by the so-called science that denies the spirit, magic and transcendence and believes it can explain everything materialistically, then it is up to us to break these psychological shackles.

An intellectual, ideological and technical elite has finally overcome the dark Middle Ages. We who are left behind should also make an effort to catch up intellectually in every respect. Instead, we Central Europeans have been going through a regression controlled by the dark forces for 40 years that is beyond comprehension!

"Scientific knowledge is not objective. It is, like civilization, a conspiracy. A whole series of facts are rejected because they would disturb the established conclusions of reason.

We live under an inquisition and the weapon it most often uses against unpleasant facts is contempt accompanied by scornful laughter."

MORE SECRET DEVELOPMENTS

In May 1983, a young man from Hagen, who was also involved in the secret German developments before 1945, told me as with the UFO mystery of the last decades, that he personally knew the aerodynamicist - let's call him Heinrich Müller - who worked in Peenemünde before 1945, later at the Aviation and Space Archives and also at an aviation magazine. In the 30 km Zossen, a town south of Berlin, were in the last years of the war often and without reason or apparent cause, cars on the Streets have stopped because secret research facilities
Müller personally reported to him that attempts were being made to stop the engines. The Army High Command was also located in Zossen.

In the January 1983 issue of the monthly magazine "Waffenrevue" a very well documented 28-page report appeared, titled
"The most secret weapon of WWII; engine stopping agent", which began with the following:

> "We want to deal here with a German development during the Second World War that was treated so top secret that only after decades of effort > and under the most difficult conditions, we have managed to collect some very interesting documents about
> It is therefore not surprising that in the past
> There was nothing about it in the literature. Some readers may have heard the term 'engine stopping agent' somewhere, but many will not know what it means.
> have placed." S. 7711 (13)

Based on the consideration that enemy weapons equipped with combustion engines, such as aircraft, tanks, etc., Since anti-aircraft fire or explosive projectiles could only be fought and defended very poorly up to that point, a Hildesheim-based company, ELEMAC, submitted a proposal entitled "Disruption of the function of electrical devices as a means of warfare" , which was personal staff of the Reichsführer SS to the various staffs and research institutes of the Reich for assessment and comment (documented by the reproduction of 11 original documents in the Waffen-Revue). Photocopy of the ELEMAG letter in the appendix.

By remote control, by ionization of the air in the area of an opposing combustion engine, an engine stop should be brought about which, for example, would cause an airplane to crash.

The ELEMAG proposal of November 28, 1944 came too late in view of the already clearly looming defeat in the war and was blocked and rejected with excuses such as: due to excessive workload or: technically not feasible for the time being; at least on paper. It is noteworthy that the correspondence surrounding this proposal was classified as 'secret' .

Two excerpts from letters on this subject may also be of interest.
RSH Office IV letter dated 8.1.45 to SS-Standartenführer Dr. R. Brandt "The idea of disrupting electrical equipment, wireless communication, etc. by ionizing the surrounding airspace is not new"

Prof. Dr. Dr. A Meißner, AEG Research Institute Berlin-Reinickendorf, 27.1.1945:

In the previous war (-1916), despite strong objections from experts, several departments had to work on the task of making the ignition in aircraft ineffective by means of X-rays or some other rays ('death rays')."

S. 7731-33 (13)

Which shows that at least individual groups have been secretly working on this for a long time, and the "secret research facility for engine stop experiments in Zossen" - as mentioned at the beginning - seems credible

In a long report by the mathematician Dr. Helmut J. Fischer, Hamburg, in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Ztg., there is further confirmation of the development of electromagnetic interference methods, which have been masterfully used by the so-called UFOs since 1945. Dr. Fischer was an SS officer in the Reichs-

Main Security Office (RSHA), where he was responsible for all scientific and technical research in Germany as part of the SD's surveillance work.

He reports on the physicist and expert, among other things in the field of magnetism, Professor Gans, who, as a Jew, was able to evade the internment measures because he was working on an electron catapult, also called a 'rheotron' , with the help of which he was able to generate rays that could bring airplanes out of the sky.

"Gans claimed that one could ionize the air molecules by using very hard X-rays at high altitudes and thus Aircraft engines disrupt the electrical ignition to such an extent that the engines failed."

Machine Translated by Google

The heads of the departments Gerlach and Thiessen were at that time convinced by Fischer's proposal to take Gans' work into the care of the Reich Research Council.

"... not very enthusiastic at first, especially since the Siemens-Reiniger company in Erlangen was already working on the construction of a rheotron." (14)

Under the heading: "German weapons research 1938/39" read we in the UFO news already in 1964:

"As a supplement to the article 'Death and LASER Rays', it may be of interest to report that in 1938/39 the British Secret Service received reports of experiments with a new German secret weapon in Silesia. It was reported that whatever was used had the effect of disabling the electrical equipment on motor vehicles to such an extent that sometimes engines and the like had to be replaced. Unfortunately, it was never possible to find out any further details about exactly where these experiments took place. It was generally assumed that they took place in the area between Breslau in Silesia and Katowice in Upper Silesia. The conditions for the investigation were somewhat unfavourable at the time and the small number of people (i.e. English agents) available for this purpose were completely occupied with other and more urgent tasks. At that time the most brilliant experts in this field were working for Germany and it was known that Experiments were carried out at various centers."

UN No. 94, June 1964

The great Italian scientist Guglielmo Marconi, Nobel Prize winner, inventor of wireless telegraphy and the 'death rays', was engaged in a strange experiment on the Rome-Ostia road in the summer of 1936. Mussolini's widow reported on the Marconi experiment in her book 'Mussolini sans masque' , published by Fayard in 1972 , because she herself was affected by it:

When she was about to drive to her small estate in Ostia on a beautiful June afternoon, the former Italian head of state said goodbye to his wife with the words "Be careful between 3 and 3.30 p.m. You will experience a nasty surprise on the Rome-Ostia road," which consisted of her car and dozens of other in front of and behind her, stopped at the exact time specified. The fact that her chauffeur and the other drivers tampered with their vehicles was of little use. All vehicles were only able to continue driving after the specified time, at exactly 3:35 p.m.

It was not until the evening that Bennito Mussolini gave his wife the key to this mystery: Marconi had tried out his new invention and interrupted the motors' circuits with rays. When Pope Pius XI found out about these paralyzing waves, he is said to have - how could it be otherwise - urged the Duce to forbid Marconi from using such devilish stuff and to destroy the existing documents. Instead, the following happened a year later. Marconi died quite unexpectedly on July 20, 1937 under mysterious circumstances, allegedly from angina pectoris. However, his closest colleagues were in the know and had a duplicate of the documents. According to Robert Charroux in 'Rätsel der Anden', page 169/170, (32)

Whether the German developments in ignition interruption go back to Marconi or, as Prof. Dr. Dr. Meißner suggests in his letter of January 27, 1945, to the German experiments during the First World War remains an open question for the time being. In any case, not to the proposal from ELEMAG, which came much too late, as the Waffen-Revue claimed.

Regarding this Marconi report, one should recall the relevant passages in 'Secret Wonder Weapons /', page 42 and pp. 64/65.

In the report of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, the 'wonder weapons' were mentioned, unfortunately only vaguely (the FAZ report was only a - perhaps censored - excerpt from a previously unpublished manuscript by Dr. Fischer), and the subject of the discussion turned to Ministerial Director Erich Schumann: "As the person responsible for research issues in the Army Weapons Office and at the same time in the High Command of the Wehrmacht, he was a key expert for Hitler, and Schumann's authority as an expert was underlined by the fact that he was a professor at the University of Berlin and a representative in the Reich Research Office. -It was also clear that Schumann had personally presented research issues to Hitler on several occasions and demonstrated experiments to him ."

Dr. Fischer also referred to the three-part division of research: one part that was fairly open to the observer, and the two that were conducted away from the public; the secret industrial research and the research and development work in the individual Wehrmacht units:

"Anyone who has no insight into these two more secret areas had no say when it came to an overview of the Research went." (14)

We can therefore examine the post-war publications on German Weapon developments can still be described as incomplete today, especially since many developments have only been partially disclosed due to the large-scale and secret German withdrawal maneuver around 1945.

In recent decades, electrical, electronic, ignition and radio disturbances in connection with 'UFOs' have been reported time and again worldwide, sometimes on a small scale and sometimes on a very large scale, which will be explained in more detail here. "Der Spiegel", No. 17/1967, p. 162:

> *"The officer in charge of a missile unit of the American Air Force in North Dakota noticed on August 25 1966, that his radio connection was suddenly disrupted. an Italian police unit that was searching for UFOs on the outskirts of Reggio-Cala-bria. In view of and in the vicinity of the 'saucer', the ignition of their car failed. A fireball in a glowing halo raced vertically from the night sky towards the Italian port city of La Spezia. The lights went out in entire districts. For inexplicable reasons, the voltage in the power plant had dropped

19-year-old student Ignacio Bonadies claims to have photographed the UFO from a 745-meter-high mountain. He and two other students report: 'We threw ourselves to the ground in fear when the fiery red plate was directly above us for two to three seconds.'

Deputy Police Chief Dr. Benzini: 'We have handed the photo over to the military authorities.'

UFO turned off power

Traces in the sand of the Cima Verugoli hill, melted stones, 'as if a lunar module had landed, a power failure that the power plant cannot explain, were discovered. The 'fiery red disks' in the night sky were haunting the Italian port city of La Spezia and were observed by hundreds of people.

"It had been observed since 1947 that some force field associated with the unidentified flying objects was causing interference in electromagnetic devices. It was first noticed in compasses. Later, pilots discovered that whenever a UFO was near them, the ignition of their internal combustion engines failed. Ships, automobiles and tractors also experienced interference with their engines in the presence of UFOs. Drivers and pilots repeatedly reported failures in their radio devices, which prevented them from sending or receiving signals and messages when UFOs were nearby."

In 1957, when three glowing disc-shaped flying tops slowly flew over the city of Mogi Mirim (Brazil), the power went out and the lights went out, leaving the area of the UFO flight path in total darkness and the peripheral areas with faint and more distant, normal

About 30,000,000 people in an area of about 200,000 square kilometers were affected. In New York, 630 trains of the electric subway "Subway" came to a standstill and trapped 800,000 passengers in the underground tunnels for hours, and tens of thousands were stuck in the elevators of skyscrapers alone. What was happening there: "was, in the opinion of the best power experts in the USA and Canada, a complete impossibility. The large overland power grid CANUSE (Canadian US Eastern Crid) had collapsed and failed completely - the tragedy that was unfolding for the inhabitants of eight US states from New York to Maine began in the control room of the electric hydroelectric plant in Ontario, Canada at 5:16 p.m. EST (Eastern Standard Time) when the measuring curves of the power production meters began to fluctuate unexpectedly.

A few minutes later, on the American side of Lake Ontario, the needles on the meters in the Rochester gas and electricity plant went off scale. In the Niagara power station 'Robert Moses', the output voltage rose sharply from 1,500 megavolts to 2,250, before suddenly dropping to zero.

Synchronized generators in connected power stations and overland stations were rotating out of control; overloaded power relays were interrupting the flow of electricity; all carefully planned cross-fuse and backup diversions had failed."

Regarding the same, almost incomprehensible event, the question is raised in the UFO article, part 7, of the 'Bremer-Nachrichten' of October 8, 1977:

> "How could this total collapse of the power grid and the electricity supply occur when all power plants have complex safety systems? And why had the electronic instruments, which had cost several million dollars to purchase and install, not detected the fault - and why had the energy supply not been diverted?
>
> The official explanation was more than meager: a small relay in a Canadian power plant had failed, other devices had subsequently also failed, and this ultimately led to a total power failure.
>
> But this explanation only elicited a pitying smile from the leading power plant engineers and especially the electronics experts.

But what other explanation was there ? Were UFOs - 'unidentified flying objects' - the cause of this sudden darkness with its catastrophic side effects?"(17)

Indeed, it must have been so. The crews of various airliners that were in this airspace during this event reported sightings of 'UFOs'. These were also observed from the ground by well over a hundred people as they flew over power plants, overhead power lines and substations. See:

Book chapter: "The Great Blackout", pp. 237-250 (15) Book chapter: "The lights went out in New York", pp. 23-27(16) The 'Bremer Nachrichten' of 8.10.77 also summarizes: "Since 1947 it has been suspected that there is a connection between UFOs and disturbances in electromagnetic mechanisms. From 1947 onwards there were also increasing reports that the ignition systems in combustion engines were no longer working properly and that radio, wireless and television sets were failing when UFOs were nearby."

This connection is evident from the countless newspaper reports, series of articles and UFO books that I have available. It would therefore be too time-consuming to provide further detailed sources on this subject.

As unpleasant as the widespread power outage may have been for the residents of the New York metropolitan area, they did not get even a faint foretaste of what war means - a war that they, as the so-called No. 1 world power, have always been happy to fight on the backs of other peoples, sometimes together with their Soviet allies, or in sophisticated theatrical productions as pretend enemies. Whether we think of the inferno of the city bombings in Germany, Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the Korean War, the napalm bombs and the wildfires in Vietnam, etc., it was always a mass slaughter of millions of civilians, women and children. The losers were often not only portrayed as subhumans and war criminals, but were also treated accordingly, as is the case in divided, occupied and disenfranchised Germany to this day. In this century, the Americans have not experienced war on their own territory, but have diligently pursued the business of war and the policy of subjugation in all parts of the world. That is why they are only slightly behind the Soviets. Surely such a minor power outage can serve as a warning to the

The US ruling clique's actions on November 9th - which was twice historically disastrous for Germany - had to be tolerated by the population.

The ignition and electromagnetic jamming capabilities must in any case be viewed as a partial aspect of a first-class defensive and war prevention weapon . This serves on the one hand as protection for the flying discs from Allied fighter-bomber fire, and on the other hand as an invisible shield against bombing and rocket fire for the flying disc bases in remote parts of the world.

Because no flying disc base can be approached by conventional aircraft, let alone flown over or attacked with missiles. And since the Third Power today, after decades of construction and development, monitors all military strategic points and military bases around the globe, its most important task, which is determined from a higher perspective, seems to be to prevent or nip in the bud a nuclear conflagration desired by nuclear armament maniacs. Here Europe and the world are offered a unique and unusual opportunity to decide for the dark forces of nuclear destruction in the East and West, or against them. But as we have learned to assess the mass of people manipulated by the media, they will rather allow themselves to be led further into the abyss like a herd than to turn openly towards the saving element - the element that is therefore so demonized and slandered by those who are mad about destruction.

In recent decades, the Allies' nuclear and conventional weapons systems have increasingly been equipped with electrical/electronic control systems and are therefore vulnerable to the electromagnetic interference of the flying discs.

highly vulnerable or completely paralyzed. In order to prevent or at least limit this, work began in previous years to make the electrical/electronic systems more robust and less susceptible to interference, not only in the military but also in other important areas. This conversion of the control, drive, switching and communication systems is costing billions. Since UFOs should not officially exist if possible, the population was given the following reasons for the gigantic conversions in large-scale radio, television and press campaigns in the summer/autumn of 1981: Nuclear explosions triggered at high altitudes create a so-called

so-called EMP effect (electromagnetic pulse) which causes electromagnetic interference. For example, an atom bomb detonated over a large city causes power outages, ignition problems in engines, radio, radio and radar interference, etc. in the city and a wide area. The author considers this justification, which is spread by the media, to be untrue. The first purposeful lie: UFOs do not exist, makes many subsequent lies necessary. Electromagnetic interference has been occurring for decades in connection with flying saucers and not in nuclear experiments. In the chapter: "Electromagnetic interference and UFOs", Rho Sigma writes:

"The first documented observation of UFOs and simultaneous EM disturbances occurred on August 28, 1945 near Iwo Jima in the Pacific, when the crew of a US C-46 aircraft noticed simultaneous engine disturbances upon sighting three flying objects of unknown origin and their aircraft lost altitude for this reason."

A letter from the American professor Dr. James E. Mc Donald of the University of Arizona in 1967 to the Secretary General of the United Nations also clearly showed the connection between UFOs and EM disturbances:

> "A wide spectrum of electromagnetic disturbances, each of which coincides in time with approaching or hovering Unidentified Flying Objects (UFOs), is now a documented fact throughout the world - although these documented events have still not been accepted as 'scientific findings'. In hundreds of cases, the (electrical ignition) disturbances in internal combustion engines coincide in time with the passing of disk- or cylindrical, 'unconventional' flying objects. I personally know of dozens of absolutely credible reported cases from the last few years in the USA. Often these electrical disturbances are found in radio devices over a wide frequency range. In many cases, compass systems on ships as well as aircraft have been disrupted. Magnetometers and even (electrical)

During the war years, due to the emergency situation caused by Allied bombing terror, special fog machines were developed to protect the Obersalzberg fortress. These were installed throughout the area and could completely cover the entire Obersalzberg and Berchtesgaden within 20-30 minutes if a group of bombers were reported to be approaching. The former commander of the Obersalzberg, Dr. B. Frank, who was specifically in charge of the fogging operations in an emergency, reported on this in his book: "The rescue of Berchtesgaden...", in the chapter: "The Obersalzberg fog unit." (16)

That is one thing, the other would be this:

In the post-war decades, it was not uncommon to observe and photograph unnatural, even artificial-looking clouds in the blue sky in clear weather. From the very brilliant, razor-sharp color image in the book: "Fascination of the Unfathomable", (18) page 309, we have reproduced the black and white image shown here, which was taken over the Brazilian city of Sao Paulo. Often, as here (18) , these clouds are - I find it distracting - presented as lenticular clouds. But if you take older reference works, you will find that lenticular clouds look quite different. In the article series in Bunten-Illustrierte: "The Riddle of the Century; UFO Spook or Reality", No. 9, p. 84 ©, this same but of the Brazilian Air Force." It is simply unlikely that the military is concerned with collecting lenticular or other harmless clouds. Regarding the other picture on the same page with only one, but very similar 'cloud', the magazine writes: "1973: UFO over the US state of South Dakota. 50 eyewitnesses saw the phenomenon." Other picture sources: Der Spiegel, No. 17/1967, p.

165; Frankfurter-Allgemeine-Ztg., 20.10.1979; and many others. Of course, we shouldn't immediately assume something is behind every unusual-looking cloud, but could the first idea of the Obersalzberg not have been the inspiration here as well?

Mist sprayed out by the flying gyroscope, and under the influence of its own rotation, a cloud could easily form in which the object pupates like an insect. Or to put it another way, the rotation forms the sprayed mist into a circling cloud-like structure.

Seemingly inexplicable structures are often the cause of alleged encounters with UFOs. The cloud formations that were photographed over the Brazilian city of Sao Paulo are formed by air vortices on mountain slopes; they are called lenticular clouds.

In any case, it has been documented often enough that the flying tops can not only make themselves invisible, but from one moment to the next they can become visible, invisible, visible and then invisible again.

This sounds very fantastic to us, who have been brought up in a materialistic way of thinking! But we could take some support from a report that appeared in the press only a few years ago, according to which the Americans have discovered that if they coat the outer skin of their aircraft with silver bromide, they become temporarily invisible.

This of course does not mean that the aircraft has temporarily lost its material existence, but only that a surface vibration or light reflection has occurred that deceives the eye

We should always remember the long-known report of a German submariner from U-234, which is also described by Major General Remer on pages 264/265 (38). Especially the final sentence! Here is the slightly shortened report:

> "In the spring of 1945 I was commanded on 'U-234'. The boat was a Type XB minelayer converted for special tasks with 1760 GRT, 4200 HP and a crew of 52. The commander was Lieutenant Commander Fehler. The boat set off on March 23, 1945 from Kiel to southern Norway on a surface voyage. On April 15, 1945 it surfaced at Christiansand-Süd for an underwater voyage, initially with a course for passage between Iceland and the Faroe Islands. The destination of the voyage was Japan. The mission was to bring the General of the Air Force, Kessler, as air force attache with staff and technicians to Tokyo. The Tenno had requested that the air defense of the Japanese islands be set up with the weapons developed in Germany. In addition to the general, there were two air force officers on board, as well as..... and two Japanese
> Frigate captains.....
> The boat's cargo contained twelve steel cylinders fitted into the mine shafts, containing comprehensive microfilm material on the latest German inventions in offensive and defensive weapons, especially missile and missile defense technology, as well as our research results in the field of high and low frequency technology, as well as a decisive contribution to the development of nuclear energy and atomic technology.

After crossing the Iceland Strait and spending twenty-eight days underwater at an average depth of eighty meters, we received the surrender order from Grand Admiral Dönitz on the night of May 12-13 while snorkeling via our snorkeling dipole. At that time we were in the middle of the Atlantic in a position southeast of the Newfoundland Banks.

The order addressed the commander of 'U-234' in a very personal tone, asking him to hand over the boat without destroying it and with all its valuable cargo. After twelve hours of deliberation and reflection, Lieutenant Fehler decided, in agreement with General Kessler and after informing the two Japanese frigate captains, to carry out Dönitz's order and surface for the handover. The two Japanese officers committed suicide before surfacing. Eight hours later, 'U-234' was captured as a prize by the American destroyer 'Sutton' and taken to the US naval port of Portland (Maine).

The American officers and officials who subsequently interrogated us were extremely dismayed at the contents of our submarine. They accused us of not being able to appreciate how valuable our cargo was. At the end of July 1945, the head of the investigation team finally told me that the material from the micro-recordings and the statements of our technicians proved that we were '100 years ahead' of the Western powers in key technical facilities and developments."

This report briefly shows what advantage there was over the Allies. This becomes even clearer in relevant publications and books such as: © © ©

The report of the former Hamburg mayor CV Krogmann, who died years ago, goes even further with the statement of one of the American officers about the valuable contents of the U-234. In the series 'Lies and Truth', No. 35 by Kormann, we read: "Then I was taken away. It was only some time later, during a walk together and in a long conversation about the victory of the Americans and Russians and the German defeat, that the same officer said to me: 'You Germans were 100 years ahead of us technically and 1,000 years ahead of us intellectually.'"

Machine Translated by Google

This intellectual high point of that time should be thought about very seriously. But since the defeated cannot be ranked higher than the victor, occupied and post-war Germany was then brought down to the intellectual level of the Eastern and Western Allies - who were far too quick to celebrate themselves as 'victors' - along with the controlled mixing of races and the decline of morals and culture.

All of the material that was supposed to go to the Japanese but fell into the hands of the Americans consisted only of further developments and research results based on conventional science and technology, against which Victor Schauberger had always railed: We have reached a dead end with our science and technology, from which we must get out. We use the destructive power of explosions, with their poisonous residues, which also consume oxygen, and with which we ultimately destroy everything (just think of the destruction of nature and the environment today). The statement attributed to Adolf Hitler about Jewish-liberal science, which together with the Jewish-Christian religion represents a conspiracy that must be broken up (see the HUGIN publication ' Secrets of the Universe', page 18), certainly gives us the key to the question of why we have reached this fatal dead end.

The Chilean ex-ambassador and esoteric writer Miguel Serrano also claims in his books on 'esoteric Hitlerism' in connection with the flying disc technology of the Third Reich that today they use a completely different science, a completely different technique and technology.

According to this, the microfilms that were sent to the Japanese with U-234 were indeed high-quality findings and research results, but were still based on traditional, destructive, negative science and technology

And only in this respect were the Americans able to capture and catch up with the 100-year German lead. The flying disc technology is the direct opposite of this already of a few explosion technologies recognized as false in Germany logy. But this was not captured!

FLIGHT MANEUVERS AND SPEEDS - PHYSICALLY IMPOSSIBLE ?

Shortly after the end of hostilities in Europe,
The military and scientists were partly incredulous or even dismissive or were utterly astonished by the then still incomprehensible speeds and almost acrobatic flight maneuvers of the flying discs; depending on their receptiveness or, better said, intellectual openness to this - at least for our era - completely new flight and propulsion technology, which can be seen from many UFO press reports of the time.

US Major Keyhoe reports on the UFO pursuit of jet fighter pilot Jim Riordan and crew:

"So you put your foot on the gas and head for it. Then suddenly the object turns towards you at lightning speed and you know that you have been spotted. And now your heart sinks. You watch as the thing makes a tight turn around you. No human on earth could withstand the centrifugal force of such turns. It moves so fast that you almost twist your neck to keep your eyes on it. You may be able to see the outline of a flying object behind the light, or maybe not.....

Then the saucer suddenly retreats, so quickly that they think they are standing still. They fly back home and are caught in a pincer movement by the secret service.'

In many cases, the same picture emerged: the UFOs casually oscillate through the air at 90 km/ h until jet fighters take off. Immediately afterwards, the strange flying phenomena shoot away at insane speeds and perform maneuvers that seem to defy all earthly laws of gravity.

Their light changes, from dim at slow speeds to brighter when the planes fly faster."

"It was not the first time that UFOs had been sighted near the rocket test stations. Commodore RB
McLaughlin, a naval missile specialist, reported three sightings in an article censored by the Pentagon: A large disk, measured at 17,000 miles per hour, flew at an altitude of 52 miles over White Sands (US missile testing grounds; author's note). Two smaller disks, tracked from five observation posts, tracked an Army stratospheric missile.

But it was only after UFOs were seen over the Los Alamos nuclear plant at the end of 1951 that the Air Force decided to take new measures: It ordered the purchase of 200 special cameras to analyze the light from the saucers in order to explain their energy sources. The cameras were to be set up in places where UFOs were often seen:"

In a long newspaper report entitled "UFO research in the Soviet Union; ever new reports of unidentified flying objects", incomprehensible flight maneuvers at high speeds are also mentioned: "Attention was drawn to the fact that flying objects are supposedly able to turn at right angles at high speeds of up to 72,000 km/h, which means that they must have unknown materials and capabilities to overcome the Earth's gravity."

Even the pilots of our jet planes can only fly turns that are several kilometers long at their ridiculous speed of sound of 1,200 km/h, because their organisms would no longer be able to cope with the terrible pressure in a tighter curve. And just like humans, no earthly building material and no earthly building method can withstand the stresses of such flight maneuvers.*

He announced this in a very cautious and slightly ironic way by on 22 April 1966 at a meeting of American newspaper publishers in Washington DC stated:

had to work - even today there is evidence of a gradation that extends from semi-divine human geniuses down to the most primitive human-like life. The Christian dogma of the equality of everything that has a human face, which was established with the aim of leveling downwards, as well as the Marxist doctrine of salvation, which operates in similar waters, with its equally degrading leveling, which only wants to recognize differences - what a mistake - depending on the environment, have clouded our view of clearly seeing the facts mentioned above.

Attempts to explain the origin of UFOs by extraterrestrials can safely be put aside until we actually know whether advanced, technically and scientifically capable life exists on other planets. 'Little green men' and similar nonsense arise from ostrich politics and are the fantastic, anxiety-neurotic outflow of criminal power cliques.

Standstill in the air; silent flight; fantastic acceleration from a standstill; zigzag flights, U-turns and tight curves at top speeds; no energy consumption in the traditional sense, and therefore no environmental poisoning that is slowly destroying us.

This and much more are the excellent qualities that are repeatedly acknowledged and attested to by the 'UFOs' , often beyond many aerodynamic and other established laws.

In recent years, renowned scientists - especially those dependent on state funding - have found it difficult to our technical-physical world view is not too difficult, to make the useful claim: 'UFOs' cannot exist because these often reported and observed Flight characteristics are simply not possible. There are a lot of statements made by the government.

But if - especially the young generation - they do not want to be among the last of Yesterday, but among the first of tomorrow, she will think the other way round and therefore only logically and say:

bodies that generate their own gravitational field and are thus free from the earth's shackles, whereas we with our known means of locomotion are at the mercy of certain forces such as inertia, acceleration, so-called gravity, air resistance, frictional heat, etc.

This has long been recognized by open-minded scientists, among whom the German rocket expert Prof. Dr. Hermann Oberth, the 'father of space travel' , undoubtedly belongs.

Prof. Oberth, who in the 1960s - much to the indignation of various scientific colleagues - appeared at the DUIST UFO congresses in Wiesbaden and Mainz (every three years), which lasted several days, explained as early as 1961, as he does today, that UFOs fly with the help of artificially generated gravitational fields, which also explains their sudden changes of direction (UN, No. 283/Dec. 1983; p. 214 ©).

Prof. Oberth has made several very clever comments about the origin of UFOs: "I named these hypothetical beings 'Uranids' after a text by Hans Dominik, because from our perspective they seem to come from the sky (Greek: Uranos)."

(UN, No. 283)

to produce ben- or spherical devices, revolutionary flying objects that, when sent out into space, behave in a similar way to planets and suns. That can operate independently, even sovereignly; that have freed themselves from earthly shackles; that are no longer hindered by the laws of acceleration, inertia, gravitational pull, etc. ? The Englishman Searl also discovered while working on motors and generators that rotating metal parts generate a small electromagnetic force.

If we wrap an iron rod with insulated copper wire and allow current to flow through it, we achieve something similar in a slightly different way: the rod becomes magnetic. An electromagnet is created (Figure I). At both ends of the iron rod we now have a positive and a negative pole. If we bring two electromagnets together with their like poles, they repel each other, just as mutual attraction occurs with opposite poles. If a small ball pendulum is attached to a conductor, when the conductor is charged, a repulsion of the ball pendulum is observed that is proportional to the level of the charge (Figure III).

In "Physics of the Uranides," Dr. W. Fragner is obviously making things too easy for himself when he assumes that an electromagnetically operated UFO could repel itself from the Earth's magnetic field (Fig. II). After all, there is a difference between Earth's magnetism and electromagnetism.

Many scientific theories, such as Newton's and Einstein's, are like the atrocious lies against Germany. Repeated thousands of times by the science lobby on the one hand and political propagandists on the other, and repeated thousands of times by students and believers, these have long since become dogmas and written laws. The breakthrough of the truth can be delayed, but cannot be prevented in the long term. This applies equally to political lies and to the theories that are kept alive artificially.

'Just as Einstein himself questioned and strongly doubted his life's work (in a private letter) in his old age, we can also confidently question Newton's theory of gravitation, because the gravitational constant is not constant at all.

bodies have their weight. We see that everything has two sides, and different media such as air and water are changeable.

The flying discs probably not only use the electro-magnetic effect of attraction and repulsion, but also know the laws of gravity and master the cancellation of gravity, i.e. the secrets of levitation.

And these grandiose falsifications of the past, which took place gradually and over centuries, had only one great purpose: to preserve the Judeo-Christian world view that was imposed around 1,000 years ago with lies, deceit, cunning and brutal violence to this day; in order to undeservedly exalt some and unjustifiably disparage others. The culture cannot, as it actually did, have come from higher species from the north, but must have been given to the world by Semitic nomadic tribes coming from the desert.

The 'ex Oriente / ux' (the light comes from the East) has long been refuted, but is persistently promoted by the dumbing down media and educational institutions.

The Earth floats in a sea of energy; like all planets.
The sun's force or magnetic field fills the entire solar system, enclosing all of the sun's satellites. These fields partially penetrate each other - the moon, for example, causes the tides here on earth. What tremendous flows of force, emanations, there are, which are completely invisible, imperceptible, and yet can be effective. Even in horticulture, people know about the influence of the moon.

For a long time, one could only find out more in secret that it was advisable to do this or that when the moon was waxing or waning.

The use or utilization of not only the forces of the moon, but also of many other power streams that are not perceptible with our five senses is called occult. But occult means nothing more than hidden, secret. At a time when the Roman Church was at its peak of power in the Middle Ages, not only traditional wisdom from nature, the cosmos, history, mythology, etc. had to be kept secret and hidden, but also the use of invisible natural forces. Anyone who used nature's herb garden and dared to make teas, ointments and juices, or even knew how to use magical powers for healing purposes, always had to fear coming into unpleasant contact with the stake. Even today, natural healing methods and alternative practitioners are not yet covered by health insurance.

Today we can confidently deal with the powers of omnipotence again, even if it is not acceptable to the 'Lord of the Desert', the 'Prince of Slavery', the 'Private God of the Jews' (according to Schopenhauer), the Yahweh/Jehovah of the Old Testament - whom the former pagan and later forcibly Christianized Germanic peoples were also tricked into worshiping. For his time is rapidly approaching its end.

It is a mistake if science still claims that space is empty, that Einstein and others have abolished the ether

The term ether, which was common in ancient times, has other names today: neutrino sea, gravitational magnet, tachyon field, etc. The variety of names prompted Dr. Nieper, Hanover, to speak of the 'energy of a thousand names' . Prof. Oberth also assumed some time ago that 'energy, inertia and gravitational fields are merely aspects of one and the same thing' and that it would prove impossible to separate them from one another. In 1970, Nobel Prize winner Alven declared after work and discoveries in the field of magnetohydrodynamics and plasma physics : "Today we know that there are highly structured electrical currents in certain areas .... It can be assumed that the entire cosmos consists of a network of such currents."

This ether, which the ancients knew about, exists and not only fills the cosmic spaces, but also penetrates the coarser celestial bodies themselves. The great spaces between the

Ether, this cosmic energy in space, must be of the highest density because even the rocket-powered spaceships fly there without propulsion.

Walter Schauberger sees high environmental density as eliminating any heaviness.

From the "Confidential Communications" of 17 July 1984, No. 2510, we can also see the following about the German development:

> "You will remember what we wrote about Captain Coler, who demonstrated the first German tachyon converter more than 40 years ago. The success was so convincing that Rheinmetall-Borsig was already preparing for series production. The end of the war ruined everything! But our informants are in possession of all the secret documents, both from the interrogation of Captain Coler by the Allies and the technical description of the machine and the patent, along with other professorial reports."

The production of the Coler converter, whose development dates back to the 1930s, was prepared not only at Borsig, but also at the companies Siemens-Schuckert and Hermann-Göring-Werke (now Salzgitter).

The question arises: if the use of this free energy is already possible today, why is it not being tackled with all available means, when we have been stuck in the energy crisis for years?

The energy crisis is a huge fraud that has enabled the 'energy mafia' to increase its profits enormously. The top management of the 'energy mafia' is also identical to the top management of high finance, which, together with the leading Soviets, considers itself chosen - according to the laws of the Old Testament (Deuteronomy 15 verse 6; Deuteronomy 23 verse 20-21; Deuteronomy 27 verse 1), for example - to direct and dominate the world. As with the monopolization of money, today's monopolization of energy - but not with free energy - can keep entire states in political and economic dependence. In addition, states with nuclear power plants are completely vulnerable to blackmail by the military powers because of the risk of disaster in the event of war. In this way, the world can easily be kept in a state of energy and financial dependency and an intimidating nuclear threat by a relatively small clique operating from the background (due to a specially created law in the Federal Republic of Germany, this clique cannot be defined more precisely). Nevertheless, this globally active, anonymous background power is in an ambivalent situation. It would love to catch up with the Third Power in the field of energy technology, but then it would lose one of its most important means of power, 'unfree energy'. We can safely leave the oil sheiks out of the game, they have - at least - see from their own countries - no dirigistic significance, they are probably played up for diversionary purposes. In the USA, gravitational and tachyon research is secretly carried out by some aircraft and other large corporations, and certainly also in the USSR; but if the free energy is allowed for technical use in the aviation and space flight sectors, then after a few years its use on a broad basis can no longer be prevented.

Rho Sigma also believes that it is only due to a huge amount of secrecy and a conspiracy of silence on the part of very powerful interest groups that no further research and development has taken place in this regard.

Even most countries would go bankrupt today if they had to forego taxes from the excessive energy prices. So it is hardly surprising that lawyer E. Engelhardt, Nuremberg, received an almost identical reply on 27 May 1983 from the 'Federal Minister for Research and Technology' , Dr. Weiss, to his letter of 18 May 1983 to Chancellor Kohl - in which he drew attention to the many possibilities of this free energy production in several pages and raised the question of why something was not finally being done about it: "Dear Mr. Engelhardt, > Regarding the question you asked about 'tachion energy', I refer you to the attached document 10/50 of the German Bundestag. From this you can see that the claims about tachion energy are not supported by physical experience."

The great powers, or rather the power behind them, their secret services and the state-dependent science lobby have, to this day, stuck to their methods that have been tried and tested for decades against non-dependent inventors and technicians who have more or less succeeded in entering the field of free energy production: ridicule; financial ruin; contractually buying up inventions in order to then have them disappear in the safe forever; intimidation; persecution; murder.

A case that has only recently become known will be presented here in a very shortened form as a representative of many others. The American physicist Stan Deyo was employed by the Air Force and was very interested in electrogravity. In the mid-1970s he suddenly moved to Perth, Australia. That this move had deeper reasons is evident from an article in the Australian magazine 'People' from June 14, 1979, in which Deyo is quoted: "I went to Perth because it is the loneliest city in the world 56 is, but it was still not far enough away"

The magazine further reports on Deyo:

> "He became aware of the unpleasant fact that some people who were too interested in antigravity research > had shown, had suddenly died ....
> Why keep such a scientific breakthrough secret?
>
> Deyo claims This is pretty obvious - think of all the money that the oil industry invests in the manufacture of cars, tires, and road construction. The entire financial structure of the world would be threatened if we suddenly had a new, cheap source of energy.
>
> The new technology is being suppressed by the people who control the finances of this planet." Taken from the congress lecture by research engineer Dr. hc Rho Sigma, UN No. 260, 12/79

In Australia, Deyo wrote a second book, a sequel to his first work, 'Cosmic Conspiracy'.

In June 1981, RhoSigma reported in UN No. 269 that Stan Deyo had recently been shot dead in Perth, but he had not yet been able to ascertain any further details.

So we see that what was already possible in the German Reich from 1944 onwards was not possible in the four decades of occupation and the post-war period, partly because it was violently suppressed and prevented!

Thus, further environmental destruction, forest dieback, nuclear contamination (along with an increase in cancer and leukaemia), the death of rivers, lakes, seas and oceans, takes its disastrous course, and reason and insight are only present in a few, and certainly not in those in power. Therefore, it seems that the Third Power is also destined to prevent total ecological collapse and to free Mother Earth from the stranglehold of the dark forces at the right time. It is up to us to continue to follow the destructive, life- and nature-hostile forces, or to make a spiritual and practical transformation in ourselves and to look forward to salvation with an open mind and an affirmative attitude. This is not to say that information about the disastrous development and personal initiatives to improve the situation should be neglected. Quite the opposite!

MORE DETAILS ON THE FLYING DISC DRIVE

Rho Sigma reported on the German professor Paul Alfred Biefeld, born in Königswalde in 1867, who emigrated to America and who encouraged his student Townsend Brown at Denison University to carry out certain basic experiments that led to the discovery of the Biefeld-Brown effect, which states

> A capacitor suspended like a pendulum with the pole ends horizontal will move towards its positive pole when voltage is added. (See Figure IV)
> If a capacitor is balanced on a beam balance with counterweights on the other pan and then current is supplied to the capacitor, the capacitor pan moves upwards if the capacitor is lying with its positive pole upwards. If it is lying on the pan with its positive pole downwards, the pan moves downwards (Fig. IV).

Rho Sigma assumes, and explains in more detail on the following pages, that UFOs would also have to fly according to this principle and be able to generate their own gravitational field. Disk-shaped devices equipped with 50,000 - 150,000 volt electrode voltage could be made to float and rise. The Hypothesis TT
Brown's theory states that there is a similar reciprocal connection between electricity and gravity as there is between electricity and magnetism; and what the current-carrying coil does for electromagnetism, the voltage-charged capacitor does for electrogravity. The basic research carried out by Biefeld and Brown in the 1920s and 1930s was itself patented in the 1950s, in the USA of course. And Rho Sigma suspects quite correctly that the use of this technology for flight technology was deliberately suppressed by the official authorities there, (16) as I have already said.

In 1969, reports were published in the Anglo-Saxon press that the Englishman John R. Searl (born 1932) from Mortimer, England, had succeeded in producing discs that could fly. He called them 'Levity Discs' . Searl relied on what he called the 'Searl effect', which not only drives the discs but also replaces the earth's gravitational field with its own independent field for any passengers, so that acceleration and centrifugal forces no longer play a role. In 1949, he began his first experimental and simple tests and in 1969 he was ready to produce the first small, unmanned gyroscopes, 90 cm in diameter, although still accelerated by a stationary drive motor and then decoupled, to float away in the sky.

Up to now, controlled steering remained his biggest problem, because the things he constructed disappeared forever.

high voltage, 100,000 volts and more, and relatively

At low rotation speeds the 'Searl effect' occurred .

The centrifugal force created free electrons and these in turn a electric field.

Every material body that is set in rotation generates a magnetic field precisely because all matter contains electrons, which the rotation. This also applies to the planets, which generate their electromagnetic or gravitational fields through rotation, as I have already said. They are set in rotation, or kept in constant rotation, by the sun. One half of the sphere is in sunlight and warming, the other half in darkness and cooling. This alternation maintains the perpetual rotation. The astronauts also have to

When they leave the Earth/Moon magnetic field and enter space, they have to be careful not to start rotating constantly. They can only prevent this by artificially heating the outer skin of their spaceship that faces away from the sun.

This field created by Searl around the 90 cm gyroscope probably caused the levitating effect and the repulsion from the earth's magnetic field. Schauberger would say that it has a compression the surrounding shell. The gyroscope took off and accelerated even further without the stationary drive, whereby he then glowed pink fluorescent (the flying disc effect that is often observed, especially in the dark!). No. 79/80 from 1980 (2) ; No. 255, 2/1979, (9) ; (19) ; and others Sources.

Here we should recall the luminous phenomenon of the glow discharge in the so-called 'Geissler tube' , in which an electrical discharge takes place. If you put an electric field of about 1,000 volts on this almost airless tube, the electricity passes through. We see around the cathode an orange light, then a dark room and behind it a violet column to the anode, where the electrons come out of the tube again.

The often observed fluorescent effect in the flying discs, does not come from an assumed frictional heat between object and atmosphere, as could happen with an over-speeding aircraft, but by the free electrodes and the ionic sation of the surrounding air, which is repelled by the flight gyro.

It is assumed that the gyroscope is roughly what the cathode is in the Geissler tube. The resulting ambient vacuum eliminates all the usual aerodynamic problems, such as frictional heat and aircraft noise. There is no sound barrier or heat barrier for the flying gyroscope. So we have the flying gyroscope, around which there is a more or less large vacuum envelope, and then outside a highly compressed air envelope due to the air being expelled. Does the electromagnetic field expelled by the flying gyroscope also experience compression in this area? In any case, projectiles fired at a flying gyroscope have no effect, and explosive projectiles and rockets fired at it explode at a safe distance from the object. This must be related to this type of propulsion. Even in space, swarms of meteorites are said to be unable to harm electrogravitational flying gyroscopes or the larger cigar-shaped objects observed.

If it is now possible to vary the surrounding vacuum, that is, to pull it off at the top, bottom, left or right and to expel it on the opposite side, an enormous suction effect, a negative pressure, is created on the side that has been pulled off, into which the flying top virtually falls and thus moves forward, be it downwards, to any side, or even upwards.

John Searl had not yet got that far. In this way, or according to similar principles, or in a different technical formulation, the flying discs could take off and fly within the atmosphere. In space it would probably be even easier.

In this apparent bubble in which the gyro is located, it is completely independent of the surrounding geomagnetic field and the atmosphere, and thus not at the mercy of the 'earth's gravity'. Sudden changes of direction, high acceleration and abrupt stops do not affect the crew inside the gyro

Here is another example of a basic experiment in the field of levitation. The two scientists Kowsky and Frost, who based their ideas on the work of the extremely important German physicist Meissner, who worked in the field of piezoelectricity (this is certainly referring to the now deceased Prof. Dr. Dr. A. Meißner, who worked at AEG-Telefunken at the time), carried out the following experiment:

"A small quartz crystal of 5x2x1.5 mm, i.e. a Volume of only 15 mm3 but of defined lattice structure, the oscillations of a radio transmitter of several kilowatts, its volume increased by 800%.

After longer-term induction, it began to gravitate (I would say: levitate; author's note) until he was able to levitate a weight of almost 50 kg!! at a height of two meters." p. 199 (24)

In this context, we would like to recall the comments on the fireballs in the second chapter reminds

The former Peenemünde engineer Rho Sigma (pseudonym) sees the propulsion and control of the flying discs as follows (excerpt):

"The earth generates a gravitational field and is surrounded by it; this reaches zero if we go far enough out into space. This field holds objects and people just like a disk-shaped object on the surface of the earth. But with the help of the Biefeld-Brown effect, a 'flying disk' can generate its own gravitational field that acts on the earth's field. This field acts like a wave, the negative pole of which is on the crest of the wave and the positive pole in the trough of the wave. The disk therefore moves like a 'surfboard on a wave slope that is created by the disk's electrogravity generator.

is constantly kept in motion.

Since the directional component of the field can be controlled can, the disc can move on the 'wave' it creates itself at any desired angle and in any flight direction.

Since the disc always moves towards the positive pole
The control (navigation) is made possible simply by changing the direction of the positive voltage. is therefore achieved by switching, ie shifting the electrical current voltages instead of aerodynamic control surfaces. Since the disk is on the wave slope of a constantly advancing wave that it generates to change the gravitational field of the earth, no mechanical driving force is required."

However, the 100,000 volts and more initial voltage required for the flying disc launch must first be generated somewhere, and the discs do not have stationary systems at every point on earth where they can be charged, so N. Jürgen-Ratthofer is perhaps right in assuming that the flying discs have various drive systems that are linked to one another. The Walter drive developed in the 1930s by the German chemist Prof. H. Walter of Kiel is considered as a starting aid. This hydrogen peroxide engine was not only used with considerable success in the so-called Walter submarines, but also in the V-1 and V-2 and also as a starting aid for conventional aircraft. Jürgen-Ratthofer assumes that from around 1940/41, in terms of technical development, two different combination models were possible in Germany.

A: the Marconi-Schriever-Walter-Schwarz flying top B: the Neumann-Walter-Schwarz flying top The different types of propulsion are:

Marconi electrogravity dynamo drive; Schriever - flying wheel; Walter hydrogen peroxide turbine engine; Schwarz vacuum airship; Dr. Joh. von Neumann - electrogravity system. Through the combination of these different systems, which we do not want to explain in technical detail here, NJ-R. expects a kind of perpetuum-mo-bile effect. (Article series: 'Walking weapon UFO', parts I + II).

Since no outsider can know the flying disc drive in detail, no exact description is possible. The layman should only be made aware of some preliminary experimental tests on anti-gravity, the levitation phenomenon, electromagnetism and earth magnetism, etc., and -

To the extent that I have succeeded in doing so, a basis has been created to be able to understand the mysterious secret of the drive. The expert may forgive me for any errors in reasoning that may have crept in.

The extraterrestrial origin theory of the 'UFOs', or rather flying discs, which were so suddenly and so brazenly introduced into the world by the democratic-Christian-Communist world after 1945, space cannot be refuted (because we know almost nothing about life on other planets or solar systems, or have been made aware of it), but has not been proven to this day.

Because if the Allied superpowers, who were involved in space travel, had brought clear evidence from space, they would have put it on the table with joy and relief long ago. Be that as it may, this series of writings 'SECRET WONDER WEAPONS' part \-\\\ has in any case provided clear evidence

This has shown that any 'UFO' origin theory which excludes Reich Germany and conceals or does not know any connection with it must be regarded as false from the outset!!!

In the background 'UFO' literature, at least two theories persist as to how Reich Germany at that time believed in the other science, other technology, which then led to the development of flying discs, fireballs, ray weapons, etc. Although I personally suspect that Germany was able to bring about these developments on its own and although these two theories may be dismissed as fantastic or impossible by readers who are not very familiar with esoteric topics, they will be briefly discussed and outlined here:

1. Theory:

The Chilean ex-ambassador, author, Hitlerist and esoteric Miguel Serrano assumes that the SS in southern France (that must have been after the French campaign)

I found the GRAL treasure and was also able to decipher what the flying disc development is based on. (43)

The Grail should not be thought of as the bowl in which the blood of Christ was collected after the Roman legionary Longinus had stabbed him with a lance, as this was distortedly reinterpreted in the later Christianization phase, but rather as a much older Nordic-Aryan-Germanic mystery tradition (see also Baron Julius von Evola "The Mystery of the Grail", Ansata-Verlag).

The Grail Treasure, most likely from the Cathars (the Pure Ones)

Machine Translated by Google

last guarded at the castle of Montsegur in the French Pyrenees, was rescued during the later storming of the castle by clerical-Roman mercenary troops and brought to safety in time

Based on Otto Rahn's "Crusade against the Grail" and above all "Lucifer's Court", the Viennese engineer and real esotericist Erich Halig developed the idea in the Viennese spiritual journal 'Mensch und Schicksal', No. 5/15.5.1952 in his work "The Mystery of the Mani-sola" that the Manisola (Mani Sun) associated with the Grail, the Mani, is to be thought of as a collecting lens for cosmic influences. Furthermore, that the earlier 'Bhamani Vimanas' (aircraft) of the Brahmanic Indo-Aryans (Indo-Germans) were made to float by Manis (here translated as 'lenses'):

> "Due to their special composition, these 'Manis' had a physical affinity to certain celestial bodies (especially the sun) and, through this 'correspondence', enabled the weightless levitation of the objects into which they were built. However, it is precisely this levitation ability that is also attributed to the Grail in various traditions...
> If the flying saucers are Grail vehicles that levitate through the Mani.... "

According to this, the Mani would be a gemstone, a high-quality crystal (?) cut into lenses through which the sun's rays fall and are concentrated in one point and converted into high-quality energy.
This makes any spacecraft into which the Mani is installed a levitating Grail vehicle.

2. Theory:

In addition to our well-known school theory, according to which the earth is a solid sphere with a metallic, liquid, glowing core, there are two other theories. One of them states that the earth either has very different sized cavities, or is a hollow sphere, with a possible small inner sun. An inner world in which life exists just as much as in our outer world (see brief description and sketch in the Hugin text 'Secrets of the Universe'). This hypothesis has the great advantage that it can refer to ancient traditions and myths of almost all ancient cultures and native peoples, whereas our school theory is a more recent construction that has little basis in fact.

has nothing to offer, but is exclusively and persistently propagated to the public.

At the poles there are large openings and smaller cave-like Passages and connecting passages, e.g. in the Gobi Desert (inner Mongolia), in the Himalayas, and in South America The name 'Agartha' of the Eastern mythology, is identical with the Inner World, as in the Germanic the name 'Asgart' (the residence of the gods) or Valhalla At times of great earth catastrophes such as ice ages, moonset, floods, the sinking of Atlantis, people, as well as entire peoples, e.g. Atlanteans, are said to have taken refuge there.

Indian traditions, as well as Nordic and Germanic ones, say that their ancestors in ancient times traveled from the Pole (North Pole)

The Inner World, the Hollow Earth, was created by the medieval church renamed it 'hell' and thus relegated it to the realm of the fantastic. Only in small circles could the knowledge about it has been preserved into our time. About 12,000 years ago, when Atlantis sank, Atlanteans lost their great knowledge into the Inner Kingdom and to this day preserved, since the lineage there continues its normal course. Due to the German base in 'Neu-Schwabenland', which was built near the South Pole in the 1940s, one can establish real contact with the inner kingdom of 'Asgart . The Atlanteans living there are mostly over 2 m tall, light-skinned, blond, blue-eyed people. They have made friends and exchanged knowledge

So far, the least credible of the two theories.

There would need to be considerably more space available here in order to be able to present this in a way that is at least somewhat understandable and plausible.

In the very long report "Are UFOs coming from the sunken Atlantis", Neue Weltschau, page: 'Europa2000', No. 25, 22 June 1978, Stephan Hansen writes based on the knowledge of earthly origin, but without specifying who this power is > *"To the objection that it is impossible that anywhere on the Earth still undiscovered or even undiscoverable life, Larger-scale construction and production facilities - underground or above ground, must be answered that this objection is simply wrong. Events are taking place that are inexplicable and that pose insoluble puzzles even for the secret services of the great powers. One rarely hears anything about it, because the governments and their secret services as well as the military bodies consider it more appropriate not to let their people know that there are intelligent powers or groups of powers on earth that are far superior to the war or defense ministries and their research and observation staffs. Anyone who knows too much in this regard and cannot keep their mouth shut must expect to get a pretty harsh slap on the cheek."

He gives very clear information about the procurement of materials for the production of the flying discs, immediately following:

"As far as the manufacture of UFOs is concerned, an expert who has thought the matter through in detail recently explained the following: If a group of people appeared at one of the large factories in the industrialized nations that manufacture steel, metal or plastic parts, presented construction plans for a certain construction part and gave the order to produce a certain number of pieces of it, then the management of the company in question would be grateful for the large order and would be satisfied with the explanations it received from the buyers, especially if the price demanded was paid without hesitation with the corresponding advance payment (the rest upon delivery). Sales directors are not secret agents or suspicious armaments experts, but are only interested in giving their staff work and bread and earning good money from the order. When the ordered parts are ready, they are picked up by a convoy of trucks. Where they are taken to and what they are intended for is of no interest to the factory management.

Now let's let our imagination run wild: The delivered parts are taken by trusted people from our secret elite group to a remote location where they are picked up by UFO transporters under cover of darkness and taken to the assembly sites, which are unknown and inaccessible to normal people.

This could be the case with practically all the components of the UFOs, even the simplest switching elements and screws that are ordered from a workshop somewhere in the world. The finishing touches are then applied by the super-technicians of the elite groups who take the delivered 66

Individual parts, after necessary additions and finishing processes, are finally assembled into what we see as UFOs in the sky."

With these thoughts on the possibilities of obtaining materials for building flying discs in remote areas, I would like to move on to the next chapter.

GERMAN RESTRICTED AREAS - WORLDWIDE

In 1964, the American police newspaper 'Police Gazette' reported, New York, about an inaccessible German restricted area in the wilderness of Argentina, with an area of 25,900 sq km (size comparison: East Prussia - 37,000 sq km; Westphalia - 20,215 sq. km). The reader will find in the appendix of this document the first page of the American original as a document, followed by the complete German translation. Although the area is known to the Allies, we have replaced the province, river and city names mentioned for closer localization, as well as the names of people with dots

The above-mentioned report speaks of men wearing uniforms and wore caps like those of the Rommel Afrika Corps. Therefore, we will now turn to a strange report about a restricted area in the Sahara. "Das kleine Blatt", Vienna, reported in 1957 (copy of the two-page report with exact Date is available to me) under the title "We are looking for the white city", about mysterious events in a mountain range in the Sahara. It begins with:

> "A secret French expedition is currently underway in Africa, tasked with determining the exact location of a mysterious 'white city' in the... massif. About eight > thousand - according to another reading more than ten thousand - whites live who know how to cleverly disguise their existence from the world. In Europe they have long since disappeared and are declared dead. The French II. Bureau, the counter-espionage service, wants to seat should be more precise documentation that ....."

In brief, the following is announced: It is estimated 10,000 former soldiers of the Rommel Africa

Machine Translated by Google

After the end of the African campaign (that must have been in 1943), the 3rd Corps, equipped with vehicles, weapons, food, technical equipment, radios, etc., retreated into the 100,000 sq km mountain range. They built roads, bridges, towns, and even health resorts, provided existing cave systems with doors and gates, and expanded them into fortresses. Together with the Berber-like tribe of around 12,000 people who once lived there in poverty, they transformed the not so overly hot mountain valleys into much more fertile areas through irrigation, etc.

They have organized their own state, they are a close-knit community and there is no mercy for anyone who violates their laws. They control all the caravan routes through the Sahara, conduct trade and commerce, control the movement of goods, and determine prices. The local population also works to ensure that the surrounding desert area is secure. Natives armed with machine guns stand guard along the caravan routes, monitor entry and exit, ask for passes and papers, and turn away undesirable and shady people. The heat, the dryness, the desert are another important barrier against foreigners. Anyone who does not have a valid pass from '..... Export + Import, Cairo' cannot get in, and if they try to get in via secret routes, they will never get out again (with Madrid as its headquarters, the company has branches in Beirut, Istanbul, Athens, Rome, Tetuan, Cairo, and Tangier).

Not only agents and spies from the French II Bureau, special department for North Africa/Central Africa, have been trying for years to get into the area, sometimes disguised as natives, but also American and English agents from Libya, and the Russians from Egypt. 'There can be no doubt that a mysterious colony of white men is at work in the ... massif. We have intercepted radio messages that we could not decipher,' said the French. And no agent who was sent in has ever reappeared. Over the years, Italians, Spaniards, Poles, Belarusians and numerous former foreign legionaries have joined them from the North and Central African region.

If we take the core content of this report seriously, then in 1943, after the African campaign, carefully selected soldiers, or even entire German elite units, did not return to the European theaters of war, but went directly and at higher levels

Command partly into the ....-massif of the Sahara and partly into the previously mentioned restricted area of South America. This conclusion is certainly obvious if one is prepared to switch off narrow-minded habits of thought.

The German ARD radio correspondent and television employee Karl Brugger, specialist in Indian issues, lived as a freelance ARD employee in South America since 1974. In his 1976 book

In "The Chronicle of Akakor" (30) he reports exclusively on a tribe of Indians, the 'Ugha Mongulala', which has not yet been officially discovered and lives in seclusion in the headwaters of the Amazon, in the still unexplored jungle area. Brugger came into contact with the current tribal chief 'Tatunka Nara'.

His book is essentially the report of this chief. He told him about the 'gods' who came to them about 15,000 years ago.

South America. Brugger, full of scepticism, was asked by Tatunca Nara to accompany him to his tribe.
Brugger equipped a small expedition and from Manaus they set off up the Amazon. Halfway through, he abandoned the journey, after a boat carrying equipment, provisions and film cameras capsized. Brugger was initially only able to read the long report Tatunka Naras instructed:

In 1936, the Ugha Mongulala tribe fought against the white invaders at Santa Maria on the Black River. They won and took, among others, a German nurse Reinha, who had been sent there to evangelize for the purpose of the Judeo-Christian conquest of the world.

The chief at the time fell in love with Reinha, married her, and in 1937 Tatunka Nara was born as their son and later chief. As the tribe got more and more into trouble and their living areas were threatened with discovery, Reinha decided in 1940 to travel to Germany, to Berlin, directly to the Reich government and, if possible, ask for help.

She was allowed to come forward and was listened to. She explained the needs of her tribe and finally managed to get three high officials of the Reich government to accompany her on the return journey to her tribe in the jungles of South America. There a contract was concluded; Tatunka Nara literally:

"This was the life of my people when the High Council made the alliance with the German leaders. They promised the Ugha Mongulala the same powerful weapons as the White Barbarians (their term for the white conquerors of South America who, since Columbus and in the name of the Cross, have brutally slaughtered the natives by the millions) possessed. 2,000 soldiers were to show them how to use the weapons of war.

Their task was also to build strong fortresses and gain new farmland. The crucial part of the treaty, however, referred to a war planned for the year 1944 in the White Barbarians' time. Our allies wanted to land on the coast of Brazil and occupy all the larger cities. The warriors of the Ugha Mongulala would support the campaign by raiding the White Barbarians' settlements in the interior. After an expected victory, the division of Brazil into two regions was planned. The German soldiers claimed the provinces on the coast.

The Ugha Mongulala were content with the land on the Great River that the gods had given them 12,000 years ago.
That was the treaty between the High Council of Akakor and the leaders from Germany. ....
The first German soldiers crossed the borders of Akakor in the dry season of 1941 in the White Barbarian era. In the following years, new groups continued to arrive until the agreed number of 2,000 was reached.

In 1945.... the last German soldiers reached the Capital of the Ugha Mongulala. Then the connections broke off.

I know the route of the German soldiers from their homeland to Akakor from their stories. Their starting point was a city called Marseille. Their destination was England. It was only on the ship, which could move like a fish deep in the water (submarine), that they found out their real destination...

The war did not take place exactly where the Germans

Tatunca Nara also reported that the gods had 'flying disks' with which they disappeared into the sky about 12,000 years ago, but also - and this could be of interest here - they left a flying disk behind in the 4-5 km diameter underground rock city of ' Lower Akakor' .

Could Germany have received technical inspiration from here for the construction of its flying discs?

Before publishing his book with the Tatunca Nara report, Brugger carried out his own research to verify the chief's statements, through which he found many of the statements confirmed, which he then included in the book's appendix, such as:

"The history of Brazil's entry into the war on the side of the Allies began with a visit by the Supreme Commander of the North American Armed Forces, George C. Marshall, to Rio de Janeiro in June 1939. 'In the defense of North America,' the general explained, 'Brazil plays a vital role. The presence of enemy forces on Brazilian soil and the control of the connection to Europe and Africa would pose a dangerous threat to the USA. Consequently, the coast between Salvador and Belem must be secured and defended against a possible invasion.'.....

At the Panama Conference in 1939, Brazil declared its willingness to provide the USA with supply bases and strategic airfields for defense. Just a few months later, the first North American bomber squadrons landed in Joao Pessoa and Recife.

It is further reported that throughout South America, in the pre-war and war years, a number of German-run banks were founded and industrial plants were built and successfully run. For the German leadership, South America was something like the nucleus of a single large German colony, rich in people as well as raw materials.

"During the five years from 1933 to 1938, large German companies and banks channeled a total of 300 million pesos to Argentina and invested them there. By 1945, it should be noted that, according to Silvano Santander, a member of the Argentine parliament (later ambassador to Mexico), 3 trillion pesos in total investments had been made by Germany in Argentina."

S. 19 (31)

From May 22, 1944, the German Major General Faupel began to work on the establishment of an air bridge that would lead directly from Madrid to Buenos Aires:

> "This time, however, it was no longer about platinum from Colombia, but about gold, jewelry and works of art of all kinds that were to be transported from Germany to Argentina.

We already reported on the southern route, also called the Roman Way, in the first part of this blue series of publications. At the beginning of 1945, Peron made about 15,000 blank passports available to the German Reich government via the Copenhagen embassy, of which about 10,000 are said to have been used.

were obscured, on 29 July 1945 off the coast of Patagonia. The light buoy was put into operation, and the first boat came within a few hundred meters of the coast."

To better understand these South American events of the time
To be able to think about it, it is appropriate to read this book!
Especially since the many individual processes and reports in a large must be seen in a context that did not end in 1945, but rather began.

"From the end of January 1945, more and more people from Germany began to appear in Colombia. Some SS officers were among them.....

Under the increasing pressure of his neighbours, and especially America, Argentina also had to declare war on Germany on March 27, 1945."

But Argentina remained pro-German under the Peron era, and temporarily even afterwards:

"When the SIS then set about confiscating the German companies in Argentina (1945), it had to realise that they had all been given Argentinean ownership and could therefore not be confiscated. Although attempts were made to prove that this is nothing other than a clever German manipulation. The Argentine authorities responded with a shrug of the shoulders. For them, the ownership situation was clear."

According to R. Charroux (who is always intent on confusion, and in his Books obviously tend to distort the overall context) there is a UFO base in the Mapimi Desert in Mexico, 40-50 km northeast of the village of Ceballos in the Mexican border triangle CHIHUAHUA-COAHUILA-DURANGO.

Reddish fireballs are seen, the surrounding villages report strange light phenomena constantly, even almost daily, animals react abnormally, irritated and nervously, even radios remain silent in the area. The state of Mexico rejected the leasing of the area by the USA - which has repeatedly shown a strong interest in this region - as well as the construction of an observation station in Ceballo, which was planned by Wernher von Braun and the American NASA on March 27, 1970; in order to better investigate the events in the 'Sierra de Silencio' = mountain region of silence, 40-50 km away, a desert region declared a 'zone of silence' by the USA . In April 1970, scientists, engineers and locals were assembled into an expedition and sent to the area just 250 km south of the US border. Three months later the following happened:

The base was therefore ready for action - for whatever secret operations."*

In 1974, two Spanish reporters and an Austrian, with a leased yacht equipped with diving equipment and oxygen bottles, tried to find the base and, above all, the underwater entrance based on rumors. Posing as tourists, they had previously carried out very careful but targeted research among the local island population, which finally enabled them to reach the boat bunker through the submarine entrance hole with their diving equipment on.

They could hardly believe their eyes when they found not only two huge lathes, but also two sparkling clean, intact and ready-to-go German submarines, which on the outside were of the type VII C (perhaps internally brought up to the standard of the 'New Submarine Construction Program' , whereby they could no longer be located with radar and other conventional methods; perhaps also no longer sunk with conventional depth charges, like the boats of 'unknown nationality' that have been repeatedly sighted, particularly off the Scandinavian coast in recent decades. See HUGIN - SONDER -

STUDY by O. Bergmann. Inserted by the author. These two boats were now lying there in the secret underground boat harbor - and this in 1974! - and the foreign snoopers managed to get into one of the boats. They found documents, the logbook and detailed nautical charts of the coastal area of South America, with six places marked in a circle and the letter T (secret moorings?). After they had also noted the numbers of the boats, they decided the next day to

They tried to break in again the next day to get the documents and records as evidence. But that was not to happen. When they returned to their yacht, they compared the boat numbers with the known U-boat lists they had with them, which showed the whereabouts of the German U-boats.

Boats, sinking dates, handover to the Allies, etc. are recorded. The surprise was once again great, because the German submarines found there are officially considered sunk!

A fire suddenly broke out on the yacht, at the mooring chosen for the night, followed by an explosion. Only one of the ominous 'tourists' survived. The magazine carried out further research, which partially confirmed the accuracy of these statements, and was able to find out further details. For example, in mid-May 1948, another transport with 12 Germans is said to have arrived at the White Villa. Eyewitnesses claim to have recognised Dr. Josef Mengele and even Martin Bormann among them. 'Charlie', who has since died and was formerly part of the base crew, reported, among other things, that they originally had three boats belonging to the base itself, one of which was sunk near Florida (before 1945), and that they then reported the other two as sunk before the end of the war. That was the most important part of the two-part magazine series.

When I subsequently asked a former German submarine commander (Corvette Captain), who had been deployed in the Atlantic for almost the entire war years, about an underground submarine base on some Atlantic island, he denied it without hesitation: it never existed.

Now, by chance, I know something almost identical from a man from Hamburg who did not know this magazine article (!), but who went on holiday to this very Atlantic island (which I do not want to name for now) a few years ago. He not only knows this inaccessible southern part of the island, but also saw the isolated White Villa there with his own eyes, and called it also the same name of the owner (General.....) and reported nor from the rumors among the island's population of an underground German submarine base still existing there from the days of WWII

At first glance, one is inclined to reject the whole thing outright as a hoax, as stupid talk. But when placed in the overall context presented here, a more or less significant core content cannot be completely dismissed.

The more individual parts

In May 1983, reports appeared in the press that in the area Florida/Bahama/Caribbean a German, possibly 'escape submarine' was found by a salvage ship (see appendix). The 'Neue Revue' published a two-page report on this in issue no. 19 from 7.5.1983: "The Nazis' escape submarine", and interviewed the American salvage contractor Roger Miklos, who is said to have been on the Search for a Spanish treasure ship, now discovered by a German submarine:

In connection with the withdrawal, even more is unknown than one can generally imagine. Following the 30-page table: "Whereabouts of the German submarines" we also find two noteworthy pieces of information from Franz Kurowski: "For the boats with numbers U 2111 to 2113, U 2252 to 2295, only the acceptance dates are known, all of which are between July and August 1944."

Nothing is known about the whereabouts of these 47 boats. Other publications do not even know about these boats. They cannot be found in the Allies' sinking lists or information about captured ships!

NASA physicist Dr. Jonathan Wright is head of a special priority UFO research department of the American space agency NASA. He was previously a member of the UFO study that was conducted by the University of Colorado on behalf of the US Air Force.

In December 1970, he and his team were ordered to the Bahamas because NASA was constantly being visited by UFOs coming from this area. UFOs were swarming in the sky at Cape Kennedy/Florida, later renamed Cape Canaveral, during the American rocket launches. The Icelandic whaler and the mysterious German submarine

The following report from the evening newspaper 'France-So/V, Paris, confirms the existence of surplus German submarines at the end of the war. Almost one and a half years later, on 25.9.1946, the paper informed its readers following 'ÄFF cable report and striking headline across the entire newspaper width in astonishment:

"Almost a year and a half after the end of the war, a
A few days ago, a German submarine attacked an Icelandic whaler. It was a ship called "Juliana", which was sailing between the Malvinas Islands and the Antarctic zone and was attacked by a large tonnage submarine of the

The commander of the submarine approached the whaler in a rubber boat and, after boarding, asked Captain Hekla in a tone that admitted no contradiction for some of the fresh provisions of the "Juliana".

The captain of the whaler was forced to surrender to the German dismissed as a newspaper hoax. But today, forty years later, the overall picture.

The hoisted naval flag with a black border, as a visible sign of mourning for the defeat suffered, also fits into the then situation and, in my opinion, only underlines the credibility of the report. The incident occurred in Antarctic waters south of the Falkland Islands. It therefore seems appropriate to take another look at the connections between Antarctica and New Swabia and possible base, as explained in more detail in SECRET MIRACLE WEAPONS Part I

The South African daily newspaper 'The Star Johannesburg, reported on 24 November 1972 under the title: "Aerial search for mysterious submarine", about a submarine that had appeared near the north coast of Natal (South Africa north of Durban) and photographed submarine, which according to the superstructure belongs to a German Resembles WW11 submarine Even before the SAAF, the South African Air Force, launched an air search with a 'Shackleton' , the submarine had dived away and was never seen again.

Could all this be made up? If so, why always in the context of the German Reich?

The well-known magazine 'Heim und Welt', No. 12, ca. 1956/57 (the Unfortunately, the exact year is missing, but I have the two-page original report), page 3-4, reports under the title "Pirate submarine at work" about mysterious events in the South Seas, in the area of Fiji Islands. The introduction states:

> "Alarming news reaches us from the distant South Seas.
> ....the police are working feverishly and all coastal stations > and air bases are on alert What has happened? A series of strange incidents is making headlines, > where mysterious and ghostly-looking > Things happen."

From the long report we would like to extract only a few key sentences that interest us:

Machine Translated by Google

"Some pirate gang, apparently with modern equipment and probably using a submarine, has been making the South Seas unsafe for some time. Only recently, the American press agency United Press reported from Suva, the capital of the Fiji Islands, that Shell tanker No. 40 had disappeared without a trace after leaving the port of Suva.....

The series of spooky incidents began in the autumn of 1955 with the yacht Joyita.....

The last radio message from the freighter 'Arakarimo' was:

"Everything is fine on board. Today we spotted an unknown submarine, which went under again after a while. Could this be the key to the mysterious disappearance of both ships? Were foreign submarines causing trouble in New Zealand waters? And was the newspaper right when it spoke of mysterious warship maneuvers taking place behind the harmless backdrop of fishing flotillas?" ....

The Governor of Fiji made the following observation

"In the Kandaru Passage, about 35 nautical miles south of Viti Levu, the steamer Kowaiwar yesterday sighted a submarine of unknown nationality lying still in a surfaced state. Captain Williams of the Kowaiwar, a former war veteran, believes he has identified a Japanese or German submarine of an older design. Several Sunderland flying boats of the RAF (English Air Force), which began pursuing the mysterious boat shortly afterwards, returned without any results."

So much for the governor.

The following radio message came from another coastal ship in the area of the Tonga Islands: "In the lagoon of an atoll off the Tonga Islands we sighted a warship weighing perhaps 1,000 tons, reminiscent of a corvette from the last war. The ship had neither a name nor position lights or other markings and did not answer our flag signals or our wireless calls."

The 'Home and World' report goes further

"Eleven years after the end of the war

Captain Williams believed he had spotted a 'German or Japanese submarine'. This would mean that eleven years after the end of the war, there must still be ships with their crews on the move, approaching the capitulation on their own initiative.

Machine Translated by Google

This sounds surprising, almost improbable, but is now considered entirely possible by the New Zealand and British authorities after the disappearance of three ships and repeated sightings of mysterious warships. It is known that a large number of submarines were overdue at the end of the war and later had to be put on the list of missing persons.....

Perhaps those who disappeared during the last war have already established their own colony, a state, on one or more islands, of which no one in the civilized world suspects anything."

I consider post-war German submarine piracy in the South Seas, as was speculated by the anti-German newspaper 'Heim und Welt' , to be out of the question.
Just think of the description of the Icelandic whaler south of the Falkland Islands in 1946. The generally known soldierly, correct, Prussian, German attitude does not allow such a thing to happen.
to.

On the other hand, it cannot be ruled out that a small-scale spy war broke out at that time between ship units of a German South Sea base, which cannot be ruled out, and English, American and other groups of agents who, harmlessly disguised as yachts and fishing vessels, were on the heels of the Germans, searching for bases, observing them and with the aim of ultimately dismantling them.

In any case, something similar and much more is described in a book by Hanns Hart (pseudonym for Hannes Reiterlein) published in the 1950s, which has become very rare today, in a stirring novel style:

"Weapons for the German Atoll", from the Hanns Hart novel series. (35)
The popular view that novels are only for diversion and entertainment is perhaps often, but by no means always, correct. With quite a few novels, authors aim to depict things and events that they do not, or do not yet, consider appropriate to present in a factual form. It is difficult to determine what prompted H. Hart to take up his pen: entertainment, or information packaged as a novel. How the occupying state press censorship offices in the Federal Republic of Germany thought about it and dealt with the novel can be partially reconstructed in retrospect: Since it was no longer available in various libraries, I ordered the book 3 years ago via an interlibrary loan. I was notified that the book had arrived and wanted to pick it up. It arrived from the central library in Frankfurt "Please sign a document that you agree not to copy the book," said the young lady at the book checkout. "Excuse me?", as I thought I could take the book with me for 4 weeks as usual, I said: "You won't be able to check whether I'm copying it, so what's the point?" "I forgot to tell you that you can't take it with you either, you can only read it in the reading room and you're not allowed to copy it on the coin-operated copiers there." "Excuse me?" I was a little speechless. I hadn't wanted a rare book from the 16th or 17th century, which of course has to be guarded, but a novel that was only 30 years old. I looked at the book. It had a stamp from the original owner, a private lending library; a second one: "Text harmful to young people; prohibited for young people under 18." Very interesting, I thought to myself, when otherwise almost every porno book and character-destroying outpouring is considered just right for our youth. Later the novel must have been banned completely, because how else would the Frankfurt Central Office have come into possession of this private book collection? As we learned, Frankfurt must also receive a copy of the books that otherwise disappear from public libraries. The context presented in novel form is evidently withheld from the Germans because the occupying forces recognize it and take it seriously. Where would we be if the 'incorrigible', unreformed Germans found something that could give them hope? Here is a brief summary of the contents:

Since various states and their agents did not search intensively enough for a suspected German island base to the east, northeast of Australia, and were therefore unsuccessful, a group of Talmudic agents privately financed by Rockefeller, equipped with two modern speedboats, went on the hunt. They finally managed to get two Germans who were on duty outside the 'German Atoll' into their power. Tied up and loaded at gunpoint onto the two agents' speedboats, they were then forced to point the way to the German Atoll.

By the end of the war they had joined forces with submarines and German top Scientists set out and built their German Atoll on a remote, unknown South Sea island group. Research and weapons technology developments were advanced, new projectiles were tested in the sky and naval operations were carried out to protect the surrounding sea area against enemies. This group of islands, which number in the tens of thousands, cannot be attacked with conventional weapons, it is said. There is talk of mysterious German flying objects, of their flights to the South Pole, of German 'self-magnetic satellites', of atmospheric rotors, etc.

Long before this enemy surprise operation, so-called dummy bases had been set up in various surrounding sea areas using mirrors, radar screens and measuring beam traps, and it had been agreed that in the event of such a blackmailing capture, the troops would head for such a fake base. It was night, and the speedboats now approached one of these dummy structures on the instructions of the two prisoners. As soon as they approached the outer exclusion zone 1, the German atoll was automatically warned and was able to initiate relief measures. It was not long before an 'atmosphere rotor' sank to the surface of the water, completely silently and under the cover of darkness, a little distance away from the speedboat that had remained behind with the hostages. German frogmen then boarded the speedboat unnoticed and in a surprise operation they freed their comrades. The atmosphere rotor rises again and follows the second speedboat that has rushed ahead. Covered by a magnetic field, the compasses fail, and now completely powerless and defenseless, this too is forced to give up. The novel ends as follows

"Twenty-seven days later, a notice went through several world newspapers:

'The rumors that surfaced three weeks ago in the area of the Fiji Islands about an armed action by the so-called German Atoll did not stand up to the investigations immediately initiated by the British, American and French search teams. Instead, it turned out that rival arms smuggling gangs were obviously spreading this mystification in order to disguise their shady dealings. The wreckage of a speedboat found by the Swedish steamer 'Kalmar-Sund' and the debris of a twin-engine private plane washed up on the beach at Waikai (which the two Germans used for a time in the novel, by the way; inserted by the author) - we reported on this in detail last week - seem to confirm the version of the gang fight. ..." The story of U-859

Exactly on April 4, 1944, at 4:40 a.m., Lieutenant Commander Jan Jebsen set off with the German U-859 and an unusually large, 67-man crew on an extraordinary journey, which, after long cruises off Africa, Arabia and India, finally ended tragically and abruptly on September 23, 1944 on the other side of the globe. U-859 was sunk off Penang, in the Strait of Malacca, by the British U 'Trenachant . Only a very few survived.

Almost 30 years later, one of the survivors spoke on his deathbed about the secret cargo he was carrying: 33 tons of mercury filled into glass bottles and sealed in containers. After a long search, the boat was located and the mercury treasure was recovered.

Why these wanderings in the first place? Was the unloading of the goods to be secured planned several times at other locations? Was it perhaps on the way to the 'German Atoll' in the South Seas?

was sufficiently reported in the first part of this series

THE DEPOSIT MANEUVER

The previously described connections regarding the German restricted areas spread around the world have already brought us right into the heart of the issue; because these areas are inconceivable without a prior deportation.

We must not imagine that the most secret, most ominous and, in terms of planning, probably most ingenious of all military operations in world history took place over a period of just a few months before and a few weeks after the Wehrmacht's capitulation (the capitulation of the Wehrmacht, not the Reich. Hence the ceasefire without a peace treaty that has continued to this day, and above all the military occupation of East, Central and West Germany, as well as the death border with barbed wire and automatic gun systems right through the heart of Germany to this day. Thus, for Germany, the Second World War is not over, everything is still open). The construction of bases around the world, especially in the Antarctic, had been going on for several years during the war and, as the war situation worsened, turned into a withdrawal maneuver. It increased considerably at the end of 1944 and the beginning of 1945, especially in terms of material and asset transfers, and continued after the enemy occupation through the organized flight of selected and fit people up until the 1950s. Even after that, disguised as 'emigration and 'vacation trips' with no return, many things were possible.

Before Germany's enemies gradually became aware of the extent of the deposition in the post-war years, everything had happened. What was left to them was the grandiose campaign of lies and slander, fueled by hatred and now staged, with the aim of "re-educating the German people". The success was resounding: tens of millions, even 80-90% of us, were now made democrats and communists, and were mostly against ourselves, against our own people, fatherland, homeland (abolished terms), against our own culture, against our own thousands of years of history, as well as against our own past. In other words, we were made rootless, compliant tools of international powers in the East and West, and thus subject to their exploitation.

Not only the Allies operated globally in the war that was forced upon us (!), but also the Axis powers, and above all Germany. Apart from the English island and neutral Spain, almost all of Europe up to just before Moscow was temporarily under our control, just as today it is under the control of the USA and the USSR. German troops were in North Africa and considerable activities were being developed in South America, as already mentioned. German submarines were deployed in all the world's oceans, especially in the Atlantic. Units and special troops were also deployed in Greenland (see report in the appendix), in the far north of Canada and in the Arctic regions, and German naval units were making the Antarctic waters unsafe for the Allies.

And some of these special measures around the world had virtually nothing to do with normal war events. They took place on a side track of the war and were planned by the top leadership, usually only by the Führer himself, and the overall context was therefore only known to them. Not even the special staffs entrusted with carrying them out could have guessed what overall picture their individual task (let's say: preparing a German atoll in the South Seas) would one day fit into, because the principle applied from top to bottom: everyone is only allowed to know as much as is absolutely necessary for their task. Because it was not the enemy agents themselves who were the worst, but the many German traitor circles who often belonged to international secret organizations (Freemasonry, etc.) and were therefore useful to the enemy.

I have therefore referred to the global operations during the war years up to 1945 in order to express that the withdrawal in the last months of the war and afterwards was only partially necessary. Because the special troops, technical units, members of the Brandenburg Division (whose operations spanned the entire globe), the globally branched German agent network, members of the diplomatic corps, units of the Africa Corps, which had already been deployed worldwide during the war years, as we have already seen, only a portion of them returned in 1945 to the chaos of the occupied and bombed homeland, where little better could be expected for them than persecution, slander, starvation camps, torture and murder. In the course of the large-scale withdrawal, it was therefore obvious to bring these diverse groups together in an organized manner in the restricted areas.

A significant percentage of the 'Last Battalion' is likely to be recruited from these. The worldwide network was in place, contacts were made, land could be bought and reconstruction work could begin. The German actions outside of Europe were therefore also suitable precursors for the disengagement maneuver itself 94

Because the topic of deposition has already been dealt with in more than twelve pages in the first part of this series, only a few notes and additions will be made here:

SS Standartenführer Walter Rauff, who died last year in Chile, was head of the SD (security service) in northern Italy during the war years. Using these connections and in collaboration with Bishop Dr. Alois Hudal of Rome, who was a sympathizer for Reich Germany, he organized an escape and deportation route in 1945. This so-called 'Roman Route' had remote and hidden initial reception points throughout the Alpine region. From there, the refugees were sent on stage via Milan, where Rauff resided and organized, to Rome, where Hudal offered shelter in monasteries. Equipped by Rome with money, shipping papers and new passports, a select group were allowed to travel to South America via Tangier. A small group was only given the opportunity to be guided as far as Africa and the Arab countries, where they were then left to their own devices. Walter Rauff and his family also took this route - which existed until the 1950s and was later used less and less - to South America in October 1949 and settled in the southernmost city in the world, Punta Arenas. This escape route, which was already described in Part I, is described in great detail in W. Brokdorf: "Escape from Nuremberg; Plans and organization of the escape routes of the NS celebrities in the 'Roman Way' " (53).

I personally know an SS man who, although he had already arrived in Milan on this route, turned back because he said to himself, what am I supposed to do in South America? Nobody could be told what he might be needed for there; he had to find out for himself.

How difficult it was to recruit people again is also shown in my opinion by Dr. B. Frank (commander, Obersalzberg), who obviously did not know much about it when he was very cautiously approached on April 24, 1945 by the head of the SD, SS-Obergruppenführer Dr. Ernst Kaltenbrunner: "...I (Frank) did not know him (Kaltenbrunner) until then - (he) seemed confident. However, he seemed opaque to me, so I held back a lot, spoke of a new 'fighting period' having begun and that he wanted to see the Führer as soon as possible. But then he let it slip what had actually brought him to me. He wanted to know what had happened on the 'mountain' in the last 24 hours and what I intended to do next." Page 98

Dr. Kaltenbrunner was then - perhaps after further recruitment attempts (?) and meanwhile himself on the Roman Way (?) - on 12 May 1945 in Austria, above Altaussee (near Top litzsee) in the Wildenseehütte, and later in Nuremberg before the tribunal of the 'victors' ....

According to various estimates, between 50,000 and 250,000 refugees have reached the Roman Way - also called the 'Vatican Aid Line' and 'Bishop Hudal's Travel Agency' by the Jewish side . been conducted.

From Bremen there was a deportation route initially called BC route and later ABC (Argentina-Bremen-Chile).

Already in the last chapter it became clear that until the end of 1944 there was an airlift from Madrid to Buenos Aires, which was then connected by Danish airlift. Airplanes from Denmark. At the end of 1944
The Allies had reconquered France, which made the supply service to Spain increasingly difficult. This supply service was probably largely provided by the secret squadron
KG-200. The 2,000 German soldiers who were then ordered to the Ugha Mongulala tribe used a submarine route from Marseille (southern France) to the Amazon. Later, Argentina sent planes to Denmark, which then transported people and material to South America via Madrid and the Azores. The initial platinum route with submarines from Buenos Aires to Cadiz, in southern Spain west of Gibraltar, was later

Press reports - officially announced by the Reich government at the time, persistently represented by the 'witnesses' as well as by the 'National Press' in occupied Germany to this day, and also become an integral part of worldwide opinion, could nevertheless not be proven in 40 years.

The various reports about escape and deportation (see a small part of them in the appendix) are as contradictory as the information about death, suicide and subsequent cremation.
This too cannot be proven (always taking into account the ongoing situation and without new findings). There is no way to gain clarity in the normal way, neither on one question nor on the other, neither on the death in Berlin, nor on the deposition and escape, no matter how many books, files or newspaper reports on the subject are consulted.

It seems that everything was meant to be this way and not any other way. If we reduce the question to a problem of trust between leader and followers, the following statements need to be seriously considered and could help to clarify the situation:

In the Führer's speech on the 12th anniversary of the seizure of power, on 30 January 1945, the final sentence was:

> "However difficult the crisis may be at the moment, it will be mastered in the end through our unwavering will, our willingness to make sacrifices and our abilities . We will also overcome this hardship. In this battle, it will not be Inner Asia that will win, but Europe - and at the head of it will be the nation that has represented Europe as the dominant power against the East for one and a half thousand years and will continue to do so in the future:
>
> Our Greater German Empire, the German nation!"

from: Völkischer Beobachter; Combat paper of the National Socialist movement in Greater Germany", Berlin edition of 1 February 1945, p. 1

In his speech of 24 February 1945 on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the announcement of the party programme, Adolf Hitler ended with the two sentences:

> "My party comrades, 25 years ago I announced the victory of the movement! Today I prophesy - as always - of faith in our people - in the end the victory of the German Reich!"

Headquarters, February 24, 1945

from: 'Völkischer Beobachter', Berlin edition, 27 February 1945, p. 2

What is striking is the formulation 'at the end' used in both speeches, which is temporally imprecise and actually takes a longer period of time into account.

But this unbroken confidence is not only expressed in the last two speeches to the party and state, but also in the inner circle. Through Adolf Hitler's architect, Professor Hermann Giesler, we learn in his book "Another Hitler" how the Führer told Dr.

Kaltenbrunner said:

"My dear Kaltenbrunner, can you imagine that I could speak like this about my plans for the future if I were not deeply convinced that we will really win this war in the end ?"

In the book's chapter: 'We will win the war', this confidence, which dispels all concerns, is expressed several times:

"It was because he (Adolf Hitler) was so convinced, because he believed: We will win the war. I could not escape his conviction and willpower.

I cannot imagine that his high intelligence, his ever-alert mind, would not have seen and assessed the military situation just as clearly. And I am convinced that the sober and realistic General Jodl did not need to tell him in the late autumn of 1944 that the military catastrophe was approaching inexorably day by day. Adolf Hitler certainly saw the situation precisely, better and more clearly perhaps than anyone else, because he was able to take in the whole spectrum, covering all areas from raw materials to weapons, from the fighting power of the soldiers to strategic planning. I am also convinced that if it had only been about him, he would not have hesitated for a single day. What stopped him? Relentless rigidity? No - rather, the 'unconditional surrender'.

This cold formula of destruction could only be answered by him with unconditional resistance. Because this

Machine Translated by Google

'Unconditional Surrender' was not aimed at or limited to the elimination of Hitler and the National Socialists, it was not just about the 'system', not just about the Wehrmacht and its officers - it was about the German nation, about all of Germany....
- he was a deeply religious person! His path led him through a turning point in history, and he was convinced that it was his task to follow this path, that Providence had chosen him to do so."

Let us return to the question we raised earlier about the relationship: F ü hrer / G efolgschaft How outsiders and enemies judge this is completely irrelevant, as it only concerns the German people and those who have remained loyal to this day:

Taking into account the connections presented and made clear in this document, the question arises: did the leader of the Greater German Reich, Adolf Hitler, want to mislead his inner circle of followers, the loyal supporters of the movement and the entire people through deliberate deception at a time when the greatest need was beginning? Or did the people and their followers lack the necessary insight in the chaos of the beginning collapse, which would have been understandable, or even more so the necessary trust in the leadership to really take seriously the confidence in victory shown up to the very end?

Apparently there was no understanding that extraordinary situations also require extraordinary measures such as: deposing and misleading the enemy by feigning 'suicide in the Führerbunker'.

The next question, which is even less clear to answer, immediately arises: And what is today, 40 years later? The former Chilean ambassador Miguel Serrano gave the following answer to the question in an interview in the major South American daily newspaper 'EL PAIS' on Saturday 19 May 1984:

"They claim that Hitler is alive If this is true he would not now a frail old man ?
- If German scientists were able to create weapons such as flying discs, why shouldn't they work on genetic experiments? This removes the doubt about its existence. The flying disc factory was in Prague and, although it is not known whether it was built by the Russians or Americans, there is great doubt that this ever happened, otherwise none of these countries would spend millions of dollars to reach the stratosphere using the crude system of jet rockets. The flying discs, since they exist, have a propulsion system based on another science, that of anti-gravity."

As early as 9 February 1942, Adolf Hitler stated

"I am, I say it quite openly, a fool of technology. The one who always has the upper hand is the one who, with astonishing technical Page Innovations are coming" 275, (51)

But much earlier he had realized that Worldviews such as Marxism, for example, can only be eradicated with the help of a weapon after they have grown out of their beginnings, if these weapons are simultaneously the carrier of a sparking thought or idea:

"Conceptions and ideas, as well as movements with a certain intellectual basis, whether this be true or false, can, from a certain point in their development, only be broken with means of power of a technical nature if these physical weapons are themselves at the same time the bearers of a new, igniting thought, idea or worldview." 'Mein Kampf, p. 186/187

What are these flying discs, after all, other than superior, ingenious instruments of power that break intellectual resistance and promise salvation in the chaos of the 20th century, certainly not only for occupied Germany.

Scheibenform

Paris, 7. Juni

„Die angeblich immer wieder gesichteten ‚Fliegenden Untertassen' könnten ferngelenkte Flugapparate deutscher Konstruktion nach Art der V-Waffen sein." Diese Theorie vertritt soeben die bekannte Pariser Abendzeitung „France Soir" in ihrer neuesten Ausgabe.

Das Blatt stützt sich in dem groß aufgemachten Artikel auf die Aussagen eines jetzt in Tel Aviv lebenden 40jährigen deutschen V-Waffen-Ingenieurs namens Dr. Richard Miethe, der wörtlich erklärt haben soll:

„Ich wage zu behaupten, daß fliegende Scheiben, falls sie am Himmel kreisen, in Deutschland konstruiert, nach meinen Weisungen fertiggestellt und wahrscheinlich in Serie von den Sowjets nachgebaut wurden."

Dr. Miethe soll ferner erklärt haben, daß eine Neukonstruktion der V-Waffe in Scheibenform mit einer Reichweite von 21 000 km und Radarsteuerung mit der Bezeichnung V 7 gegen Kriegsende fabrikationsreif gewesen sei. Man habe diese ferngelenkte Scheibe mit großem Erfolg über der Ostsee erprobt.

Hitler habe sich jedoch erst nach dem Rheinübergang der Pattonn-Armee dazu entschlossen, die V 7 in Serienfabrikation in den unterirdischen Fabriken Süddeutschlands bauen zu lassen.

Nach der Schilderung des Ingenieurs erbeuteten die Sowjets bei der Einnahme Breslaus mehrere Antriebsaggregate dieser Waffe. Außerdem hätten sie drei seiner besonders auf die V 7 spezialisierten Kollegen nach dem Industriezentrum jenseits des Urals gebracht.

Antriebs-Aggregate der „Fliegenden Untertassen" 1945 in Schlesiens Hauptstadt erbeutet?

Die „Fliegenden Untertassen", die angeblich wieder vermehrt am Himmel beobachtet werden und auch durch die Spalten der Presse geistern, sollen nach einem Bericht des „8-Uhr-Abendblattes" in Hamburg die Fortentwicklung der deutschen „V 7" sein. Diese Angaben macht nach dem angeführten Bericht ein deutscher V-Waffen-Experte, Dr. R. Miethe, der z. Z. in Tel Aviv lebt. Er gibt an, daß bei der Einnahme Breslaus durch die Russen angeblich mehrere Antriebs-Aggregate der „V 7" den Eroberern in die Hände fielen. Die „V 7", eine scheibenförmige Konstruktion mit großem Aktionsradius, sei erprobt und bereits in Serienherstellung gewesen.

Es erhebt sich die Frage, ob die Angaben dieses aus Paris geschriebenen Berichtes stimmen. Vielleicht weiß oder erinnert sich einer aus der großen Zahl der Breslauer auf Grund dieser Meldung an eine Spur zu diesen außergewöhnlichen Antriebsaggregaten. G. K.

Betrifft:

Störung der Funktion elektrischer Geräte als Mittel der Kriegsführung.

Es wird angestrebt, auf der Feindseite eine Ausschaltung derjenigen Kampfmittel herbeizuführen, deren Einsatzfähigkeit auf der Funktion elektrischer Geräte beruht.

Unter diese Kampfmittel fallen:
Luft- und Landfahrzeuge mit einem Verbrennungsmotor mit Kerzenzündung als Antriebsmittel, das gesamte Nachrichtenwesen, sowie einige artilleristische Einrichtungen.

Zur Erreichung dieses Zieles wird eine Fernbeeinflussung der Funktic elektrischer Geräte auf folgende Basis vorgeschlagen.

Der Aufbau elektrischer Geräte setzt sich aus zwei Grundelementen zusammen, aus Spannungsleitern und Isolatoren. Störungen an elektrischer Geräten und Maschinen sind grundsätzlich auf Unterbrechungen in Spannungsleitern oder Überbrückungen von Isolatoren zurückzuführen.

Eine Überbrückung von Isolatoren z.B. durchbricht die Blockierung der Spannungwege und führt zur Bildung von Kriechströmen oder Kurzschlüssen, und verursacht als Auswirkung der letzteren Unterbrechungen in Spannungsleitern, sei es infolge durchschmelzen von Sicherungen und Zuleitungen, oder durch Zerstörung der Verbraucher selbst.

Durch Überbrückung von Isolatoren ist also die Möglichkeit gegeben jedes elektrische Gerät außer Betrieb zu setzen.

Es erwächst nun die Aufgabe einen, beim Aufbau sämtlicher elektrischer Geräte in Erfüllung ausreichend wichtiger Funktionen Anwendung findenden Isolierstoff durch Fernbeeinflussung unwirksam zu machen.

Auf der Suche nach einem hierfür geeignetem Stoff wurde gefund. , daß die Atmosphäre die erforderlichen Voraussetzungen in ausreichendem Maße erfüllt.

Der Isolierstoff Atmosphäre findet zwar als Solcher infolge der Natürlichkeit dieses Zustandes im Algemeinen keine besondere Beachtung, er bildet aber letztendendes die isolatorische Grundlage der gesamten Elektrotechnik, und es steht fest, daß eine Aufhebung der isolierenden Wirkung der Atmosphäre den Betrieb irgend eines elektrischen Gerätes, bekannter Konstruktion und Ausführung unmöglich macht.

Der gegenwärtige Stand der Technik bietet die Möglichkeit eine Beeinflussung des Isolierstoffes Atmosphäre im Sinne der zu lösenden Aufgabe durchzuführen.

Es ist bekannt, daß ultrakurze- elektrische Frequenzen unter Anderem auch die Eigenschaft entwickeln die von durchdrungenen Atmosphäre zu ionisieren, und damit eine umgekehrte elektrische Reaktion auslösen; das heißt mit anderen Worten, den Isolierstoff Atmosphäre in einen Spannungsleiter zu verwandeln.

Bemühungen zur wirtschaftlichen Nutzbarmachung dieser Erkenntnis ließen sich vor dem Kriege beobachten, und zwar handelte es sich hierbei hierbei um das Problem der drahtlosen Übertragung elektrischer Energien. Wenn vorwiegend aus patentrechtlichen Gründen auch keine ausführlichen Veröffentlichungen hierüber erfolgt sind, so kann die physikalische Grundlage dieses Problemes heute doch im wesentlichen als gelöst angesehen werden.

Bei einer Auswertung dieser Erkenntnis zur Realisierung des vorgeschlagenen Kampfmittels kann zu einem großen Teil auf diese Unterlagen zurückgegriffen werden. Es ist daher zweckmäßig zunächst Ermittlungen darüber anzustellen, welche Frequenzbereiche hinsichtlich ihrer ionisierenden Wirkung bereits näher untersucht, und welche Ergebnisse dabei erzielt worden sind.

Im Einzelnen sind für jeden infragekommenden Frequenzbereich möglichst unter Zugrundelegung verschiedener Sendeenergien folgende Feststellungen zu treffen:

1. Welcher Leitwert wurde ermittelt. a) Bei Wellenbündelung
   b) " Rundstrahlung
2. Welche wirksame Reichweite wurde erzielt.
   a) Bei Wellenbündelung
   Rundstrahlung
3. Welche Raumstreuung wurde bei Wellenbündelung beobachtet,(auszudrücken durch Angabe der Bündelquerschnitte in den Entfernungen X_a bis X_z von Richtstrahler.)
4. Welche Leitwertänderungen wurden bei zunehmender Streuung in den Abständen X_a bis X_z festgestellt.
5. Einfluß der Leitwertänderungen auf den Kontakteffekt pro Kontaktflächeneinheit.

Nach Klärung dieser 5 Punkte, sei es durch Ermittlung bereits vorliegender Ergebnisse oder durch Eigenversuche, kann ein zusammenfassender Überblick über den Umfang der Wirkung und Anwendbarkeit dieses Kampfmittels gegeben werden.

Da eine Klärung dieser Punkte unter den gegenwertigen Verhältnissen mit privaten Mitteln nicht durchführbar ist, im Interesse der Landesverteidigung jedoch von großer Wichtigkeit sein kann, wird nachgesucht, die erforderlichen Mitteln durch das Reich zur Verfügung zu stellen.

Vorgang: Mein Vortrag beim Reichsführer SS am 8.1.45

Standartenführer!

Die Prüfung des mir vom Reichsführer SS gelegentlich meines Vortrags am 8.1.45 übergebenen Vorschlages der Elemag Hildesheim für die Störung der Funktion elektrischer Geräte durch Ionisierung der Luft mit Hilfe von ultrakurzen elektrischen Wellen hat zu dem Ergebnis geführt, daß dieser nach dem augenblicklichen Stand der Technik nicht zu verwirklichen ist. Die Ausführungen der Elemag selbst lassen jedes tiefere Verständnis für die behandelten technischen und physikalischen Vorgänge vermissen, so daß es nicht empfohlen werden kann, diese Stelle mit der Durchführung entsprechender Forschungsarbeiten zu beauftragen.

Tatsächlich wird an der drahtlosen elektrischen Energieübertragung und deren Anwendung für militärische Zwecke seit Jahrzehnten eifrigst gearbeitet, bisher jedoch ohne greifbaren Erfolg.

Da ähnliche Anregungen immer wieder vorgebracht werden, habe ich einige namhafte Wissenschaftler um eine grundsätzliche Stellungnahme zu den angeschnittenen Fragen gebeten. Leider haben sich infolge der schwierigen Post- und Verkehrsverhältnisse die angeforderten Berichte verzögert, so daß ich Ihnen als Vorbescheid zunächst eine Beurteilung des Vorschlages der Elemag durch Herrn Prof. Dr. Meißner (Anlage 1), der auf dem Gebiet der elektromagnetischen Wellen über besondere Erfahrungen verfügt, sowie eine Stellungnahme des Leiters meiner Erprobungsabteilung, Dr. Badstein, (Anlage 2) vorlege.

Ergänzung zum Gutachten vom 27.1.1945 zum Erfindungsvorschlag der "Elemag", Elektro-mechanische Apparatebaugesellschaft m.b.H., Hildesheim, Goschenstr.16

Die hier gemachten Vorschläge sind insbesondere im ersten Teil nicht für den Fachmann bestimmt, sondern nur für den Laien. Es ist übrigens nicht zum erstenmal, daß in dieser Art eine Erfindung gemacht wurde, durch Fernübertragung elektrische Apparate unwirksam zu machen. Die Grundlage sollte auch damals sein, daß "die Atmosphäre in außerordentlichem Maße die erforderlichen voraussetzungen besitzt, daß sie durch Fernbeeinflussung als Isolierstoff ausgeschaltet werden kann." Im vorigen Krieg (-1916) mußten auf höheren Befehl trotz heftigen Einspruchs der Fachkreise mehrere Stellen an der Aufgabe arbeiten, durch Röntgen- oder irgendwelche anderen Strahlen ("Todesstrahlen") die Zündung in Flugzeugen unwirksam zu machen.

Deutsche Kampfgruppe noch auf Grönland?

Von U-Booten an Land gesetzt -- Seit fast sechs Jahren in der Schneewüste

Wien, 28. Dezember. In mehreren ausländischen Blättern erschienen in den letzten Tagen Berichte, die so phantastisch anmuten, daß man sie mit Vorsicht aufnehmen muß. Jedenfalls wird man ergänzende Meldungen abwarten müssen, um Klarheit darüber zu gewinnen, ob die Meldungen in allem und jedem stichhältig sind. Eskimos haben, so heißt es, dem Kommandanten einer amerikanischen militärischen Station gemeldet, daß sich auf Grönland noch eine etwa 150 Mann starke deutsche Kampfgruppe befindet.

Die „weiße Todesrotte"

Im Frühjahr 1942, also vor nahezu sechs Jahren, hatten Unterseeboote deutsche Soldaten in Grönland an Land gesetzt. Anführer der Gruppe war ein Hauptmann namens Hammerlein, der vor dem Krieg mehrmals an Polarexpeditionen teilgenommen hatte. Die deutschen Soldaten, die sich die „weiße Todesrotte" nannten, waren aufs beste ausgerüstet und mit den modernsten Behelfen versehen. Etwa 30 Kilometer von dem Hafen Angmagsalik entfernt, wurde eine Station errichtet, von der aus die Truppe Hammerleins meteorologische Meldungen nach Deutschland funkte. Mit Unterseebooten kamen später Lebensmittel, Arzneien und auch zwei Geologen, so daß man mutmaßte, die Deutschen wollen nach Uran suchen.

Den Berichten der Eskimos zufolge brachte ein deutsches Schiff später auch ein zerlegbares Flugzeug. Im Herbst 1943 erschienen in einer Eskimosiedlung 50 deutsche Soldaten, unter denen eine schwere Schlägerei entstand. Zwei der Soldaten, die durch den jahrelangen Aufenthalt in der Schnee- und Eiswüste Grönlands offenbar schon völlig zermürbt waren, verübten Selbstmord.

In den folgenden Jahren wurden noch mehrmals Lebensmittel, Arzneien und anderes Material von U-Booten aus an Land gebracht. Im Herbst 1944 kam der letzte Transport, mit dem auch 30 Mann an Land gingen.

Sie trugen den Aussagen der Eskimos nach andere Uniformen als jene Soldaten, die sich schon seit 1942 auf Grönland befanden und so vermutet man, daß es sich um SS-Leute handelte.

Feuergefecht mit Eskimos

Diese 30 Neuankömmlinge bezogen das gleiche Lager wie die 120 alten, hielten sich jedoch von diesen völlig abgesondert. Im Mai 1945, kurz nach der Kapitulation Deutschlands, verschwanden die 150 Deutschen aus der Umgebung von Angmagsalik. Die Eskimos glaubten, die 150 Mann hätten sich in amerikanische Gefangenschaft begeben, bis nun vor kurzem Eskimos nach der Rückkehr von einem Fang meldeten, daß die Deutschen sich noch immer auf Grönland befänden. Zwei der Grönländer waren, als die Deutschen ihrer ansichtig wurden, erschossen worden, die übrigen drei konnten flüchten und die Nachricht bringen, daß sie 170 Kilometer nördlich von Angmagsalik auf die Deutschen gestoßen seien.

Tote Nazigrößen in einem U-Boot-Wrack?

London. – In der Karibik haben amerikanische Taucher ein deutsches U-Boot aus dem Zweiten Weltkrieg entdeckt. Es ist ausgezeichnet erhalten, in seinem Inneren könnten die Überreste toter Nazigrößen sein, die 1945 nach Südamerika fliehen wollten, aber auch Kunstschätze und wertvolle Dokumente. Wie die Londoner „Times" berichtet, ist der Leiter des Bergungsunternehmens „Novad Salvage" in England gewesen, um Geld aufzutreiben. Das U-Boot, auf dessen Turm der Schriftzug „Hamburg 1944" zu erkennen ist, ist ein Typ, der eigens für die Flucht von Nazifunktionären gebaut worden war.

Gesunkenes U-Boot in Karibik gefunden

London (rtr). In einem in der Karibik aufgespürten gesunkenen deutschen U-Boot könnten sich laut einem Bericht der britischen Zeitung „The Times" die Leichen von Nationalsozialisten befinden, die nach Südamerika fliehen wollten. Das Schiff, das keine erkennbare Nummer trage, sei in 23 Metern Tiefe vom amerikanischen Bergungsunternehmer Roger Miklos gefunden worden, hieß es am Montag in der Zeitung weiter. Miklos befinde sich derzeit in London, um bei der britischen Regierung Interesse für eine Erkundung und Bergung des U-Bootes zu wecken. Miklos sei der Ansicht, daß es sich bei dem Schiff vom Typ der C-Klasse um eine Sonderanfertigung handle, in der sich nationalsozialistische Funktionäre möglicherweise mit Dokumenten, Gold und Kunstschätzen nach Lateinamerika absetzen wollten. Er habe bei seinen monatelangen Recherchen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland den Plan des georteten Bootes ehemaligen U-Boot-Kommandeuren vorgelegt. Diese hätten bestätigt, daß es einem Bootstyp ähnle, der zur Flucht von Funktionären bestimmt gewesen sei.

Hitlers allerletzter Fluchtweg aus Berlin

Tunnel vom Führer-Bunker zum Flughafen

Berlin (we) – Ist Hitlers geheimer Fluchtweg in Berlin-Kreuzberg entdeckt worden? Alles deutet darauf hin. Sprengstoff-Experten und Wissenschaftler untersuchen mit Baggern und Baumaschinen, die einzige Erhebung Berlins, den 66 Meter hohen Kreuzberg. Unter ihm haben Bauarbeiter ein weitläufiges Tunnel- und Bunkersystem aus dem Zweiten Weltkrieg entdeckt.

Anwohner berichteten gestern, daß das kilometerlange unterirdische Labyrinth von Bergleuten aus dem Ruhrgebiet nach Plänen von Hitlers Hauptarchitekt Albert Speer angelegt wurde. Es soll auch, wie Zeugen berichteten, eine Verbindung von der damaligen Reichskanzlei bis zum rund zwei Kilometer entfernten ehemaligen Zentralflughafen Tempelhof geben.

Nach Erinnerungen älterer Bewohner wurden kurz vor Kriegsende riesige Mengen an Munition in die Stollen transportiert. Wie gefährliche unterirdische Munitionsdepots auch heute noch sein können, hatte sich, erst im August dieses Jahres in Berlin-Tempelhof gezeigt: Eine Sprengbombe explodierte unter einer Wohnstraße, riß einen riesigen Krater und beschädigte mehrere Gebäude.

Bei den Untersuchungen, die noch mehrere Wochen, wenn nicht gar Monate andauern werden, haben die Experten der Bauverwaltung und der Technischen Universität Berlin einen sieben Meter unter der Erde liegenden Bunker sowie einen 100 Meter langen Tunnel entdeckt.

Dieser führt zu einem zweiten Bunkersystem, zu dem wegen meterdicker Betonwände bisher noch kein Durchbruch gelang. An einer weiteren Stelle entdeckten die Tunnelsucher zwei tadellos erhaltene Gänge, deren Enden allerdings verschüttet sind.

Ganz besondere Bedeutung kommt Hinweisen zu, wonach das Tunnelsystem vom Führer-Bunker im heutigen Ostteil Berlins bis zum Flughafen Tempelhof als regelrechte unterirdische Straße ausgebaut worden sein soll – groß genug für kleinere Autos. „Nach dem bisher freigelegten Tunnelsystem haben wir Vermutungen bestätigt erhalten, daß die ‚Organisation Todt' für Hitler einen allerletzten Fluchtweg aus Berlin gebaut hat", erklärten Experten der Kreuzberger Bauverwaltung. Sorge bereitet der Berliner Bevölkerung vor allem der mögliche Munitionsbestand in den Bunkern. Wisenschaftler der Technischen Universität prüfen jetzt mit modernsten seismischen und magnetischen Untersuchungsmethoden nach, wieviele Bomben noch in dem Bunkersystem liegen.

Neue Rätsel um Hitlers Leiche!

Von HELMUT VOSS

1984 sad. Oxford, 23. 9.

Adolf Hitlers Leiche wurde nicht verbrannt, sondern an bisher unbekannter Stelle im Berliner Tiergarten beigesetzt. Diese Ansicht hat der amerikanische Zahnmediziner Prof. Dr. Lester L. Luntz am Wochenende auf einem gerichtsmedizinischen Kongreß in Oxford vertreten.

Der Professor ist überzeugt, daß es sich bei den verkohlten Überresten, die die Russen 1945 vor dem Führerbunker in Berlin gefunden hatten, nicht um die Leiche von Adolf Hitler handelte. Er glaubt vielmehr, daß die Russen ein Hitler-Double fanden: „Albert Speer hat mir gegenüber die Möglichkeit eines Doppelgängers eingeräumt."

Der Professor untermauert seine These so: ● Die Sowjets identifizierten die Leiche nur anhand des Gebisses. Aber: „Es gibt bis heute keine Röntgenaufnahmen von Hitlers Gebiß, die über jeden Zweifel erhaben sind." Die im US-Nationalarchiv vorhandenen Aufnahmen seien äußerst fragwürdige Dokumente.

● Hitleradjutant Otto Guensche behauptete im Verhör, die Russen hätten nie Hitlers Leiche gefunden . . .

At a distance of 100 to 120 meters he sees a new Messerschmidt turbine

7 1/2 hours later, at midnight on April 30th to May 1st, 1945, Admiral Dönitz announced over the military radio that Hitler was dead and that he had taken over supreme command.

A few minutes later the German radio reported the same news.

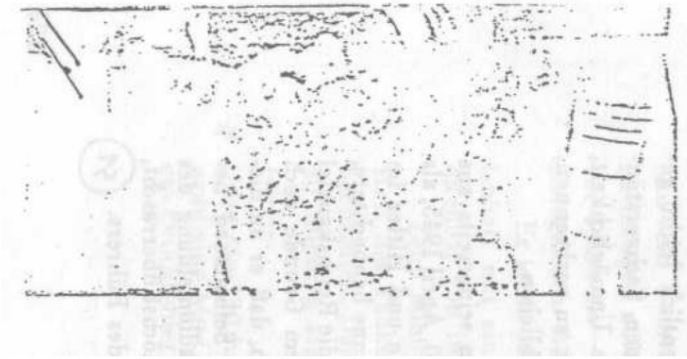
Goebbels also reported that the Führer was in the Valhalla a entered.

According to a report from the Soviet Information Office dated May 3, 1945, Fritsche said during his interrogation after his capture that Hitler, Goebbels and the newly appointed Chief of the General Staff, General of Inf. Krebs, had committed suicide.

Lieutenant Colonel Heimlich from the American The secret service, which checked all information about Hitler's death, came to the conclusion that Hitler, Eva Braun and Bormann were still alive.

There is not a single iota of evidence that Hitler is dead. The report (INS) also states that the American Army's investigation into the events during the last days of fighting has shown that it was extremely easy to escape from Berlin. Experts also pointed out that it is impossible to completely burn a corpse in the open air without leaving behind some residue.

Ing. B. excludes any error on his part and firmly assures that on 30 April 1945, when he landed at 4:15 p.m. and Hitler was in bright light of the setting sun, it was no longer possible to get into the Reich Chancellery. For this reason, it could never be true that he committed suicide in the Reich Chancellery that day. When Engineer B. heard Admiral Dönitz's radio message, he was extremely surprised and thought that the Führer had been in an airplane accident.



Reporter confirms Police Gazette articles revealing

by HARVEY WILSON

FOR the first time, an outsider has seen Adolf Hitler's super-secret hideout in the wilds of Argentina.

His eyewitness account of the impenetrable Nazi stronghold, confirms the startling facts first unearthed and published by the Police Gazette, twelve years ago.

Traveling through the mountainous region of [redacted] province—a sprawling wilderness of lakes, waterfalls, gigantic glacier caves and forested islands—Jack Comben, correspondent of the London Daily Express, discovered the last secret outpost of Hitler's Germany, 100 miles north of [redacted].

It was in 1952 that the Police Gazette, after having obtained top secret Allied Intelligence reports and information based on interviews with former members of the Wehrmacht, revealed that Hitler and his mistress, Eva Braun, had escaped from the ruins of Berlin.

When the defeat of the Third Reich loomed imminent, plans for Hitler's escape were drawn up by Martin Bormann, the Dictator's closest confident. The project was entrusted to Admiral Karl Doenitz, Nazi U-boat specialist and Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy, who was later to boast:

"The German submarine fleet is proud of having built for Der Fuehrer in another part of the world a Shangri-La on Land—an impregnable fortress."

This "impregnable fortress" to which Admiral Doenitz had alluded was in the heart of a huge slice of Argentina territory that had been purchased by Nazi agents in South America. This "Little Nazi Germany" covered over 10,000 square miles of ranchland (the size of the state of Massachusetts) in the provinces of [redacted] and [redacted]. And the armed camp, that was to become Hitler's hideout, was in a region north of [redacted].

Visits Nazi Outpost

Recently, in January, 1964, correspondent Jack Comben, journeyed to Bariloche to investigate reports of the Nazi outpost. Here is his report:

"I have come back from visiting the most extraordinary surviving outpost of Hitler's Germany in the world today.

"In a camp on the bank of the swift-flowing [redacted] River, [redacted]00 miles south of the Equator, in the heart of the Argentine, German men, women and children are living a strange and secret existence under steely discipline.

"Local people cannot penetrate into the camp, which lies at [redacted], 100 miles north of [redacted]. The inmates of the camp are forbidden to talk to strangers. All men in the camp wear Afrika Korps-style uniforms, with the same peaked caps that Field Marshal Rommel's elite army wore in the Western desert."

The camp is sealed off to all non-Nazis. No person without the proper credentials can set foot in it. Armed guards make sure of that. To further ensure secrecy, every piece of mail entering or leaving the camp is subjected to the most rigorous censorship.

"The camp," reported Comben, "seems to be completely under the control of the camp commandant, a gray-haired man called W[redacted] O[redacted], who is known as Der Hauptmann. I have been able to establish that O[redacted] was a high official in Hitler's communications organization. His right-hand man is E[redacted] F[redacted], a former SS officer."

Fake Suicide

When victorious Allied troops took over Berlin, the first reports out of the beleaguered city were that Hitler had killed himself in his bunker beneath the Reichchancellory. These reports said that Hitler and Eva Braun, whom he had married just before the fall of Berlin, took their lives in a suicide pact and that their bodies were then removed by trusted friends to the courtyard, drenched with gasoline and burned.

This version of what happened to Hitler and Eva was circulated throughout the entire world—but Allied Intelligence soon disclosed that the "suicide" was a hoax.

Members of Hitler's staff, who saw him a few minutes before his alleged death, contradicted each other as far as the suicide report was concerned.

Fake suicide

When the victorious Allied troops took over Berlin, the first reports from the besieged city were that Hitler had killed himself in his bunker next to the Reich Chancellery. These reports said that Hitler and Eva Braun - whom he had married shortly before Berlin fell - took their lives in a suicide pact, and further that their bodies were then taken to the courtyard by loyal friends, doused with gasoline and set on fire.

This version of what happened to Hitler and Eva Braun was spread all over the world; but 'Allied intelligence' soon revealed that the 'suicide' was a hoax.

Members of Hitler's staff who saw him a few minutes before his alleged suicide contradicted each other as far as the suicide was concerned. They all stressed that when Hitler called them to say goodbye , he did not behave like a man who was about to kill himself.

"He seemed more like a man about to go on a journey than a man about to die," one explained. And all the members of Hitler's staff admitted that they did not actually see their leader die.

Colonel WF Heimlich, former head of US Army intelligence in Berlin, who was in charge of the official investigation into Hitler's disappearance, told the Police Gazette in an exclusive interview.

"I could not find any evidence of Hitler's death. He had plenty of opportunity to escape. There was an airfield and many planes at his disposal."

Scientific tests

Furthermore, scientific tests conducted by Col. Heimlich and his investigators proved that the suicide story was a deception war..

"Analyses of the blood stains on the sofa on which Hitler reportedly killed himself," Heimlich said , "revealed that the stains did not match the blood type of Hitler or Eva Braun. There were no bullet holes in the sofa or in the wall behind it."

In addition, Col. Heimlich has taken X-rays of Hitler's

Machine Translated by Google

Teeth obtained from the dictator's dentist. These would have removed any doubt if teeth belonging to Hitler had been found on the burning grounds. But no such piece of evidence could be found.

Determined to turn over every stone in his investigation to learn the fate of Hitler, Col. Heimlich had a crack U.S. intelligence team conduct a needle-in-a-haystack search of the Reich Chancellery grounds. "First," he said, "all the rubble was cleared away. Such items as destroyed machine guns, ammunition, helmets, uniforms and pieces of wood were examined."

No clues found

"A bomb crater four metres from the entrance to the bunker was the primary target," explained Colonel Heimlich. "Two sieves were set up, one made of wire mesh like a chicken coop and behind it a second, much finer, with 12 mm holes.

Every shovelful of dirt from the bomb crater was poured through the fine sieve in the hope that some small piece of evidence showing the presence of a human body would quickly be found."

"The X-rays of Hitler's head gave us relevant clues about his dental structure, and even a tooth might have been enough to identify his body. But after days of excavating an ever-expanding area, we found no sign of any bodies, and, more importantly, no trace of fire.

Based on this site investigation, I sent my report to Supreme Headquarters in Frankfurt/ Main, along with pictures and supporting evidence indicating that there was nothing there to support the theory of Hitler's death."

And besides, no woman's body was found in the ruins, although it was suspected that Eva Braun had died with Hitler and their bodies were burned side by side in the courtyard.

How Hitler fled

The Police Gazette was informed by a reliable source that Hitler flew out of Berlin on the night of April 30, 1945. He fled the city in Be-accompanied by a woman and flew in a Fieseier Storch. It was reported that they carried several suitcases and travelled to a remote Nazi submarine station in Norway. There, a fully equipped submarine was waiting for them.

On July 10 of the same year, Spruille Braden, American ambassador in Buenos Aires, received a telephone call informing him that two German submarines had just arrived in Mar del Plata (Argentina).
were.

"I acted immediately," he later told the Police Gazette in an exclusive interview. "That same hour I sent two of our best intelligence people to Mar del Plata. They called me and said that there was only one submarine in the harbor - but they confirmed that two German submarines had arrived.

For 24 hours the Argentine authorities refused to allow our agents to board the remaining submarine. They were also not allowed to speak to any member of the crew. When Captain Otto Wermuth, the 22-year-old commander, was finally asked, he reported that it was just a normal routine trip.

But he would not explain why he had not surrendered to the Allies on May 8, when Germany surrendered. He would not reveal why he had 54 men on board instead of a normal crew of 18 or 19. He would not discuss his cargo, which was unloaded before my men (meaning the US agents; the translator) got there. Nor would he explain the luxuries on board - there were 540 cartons of cigarettes (submariners do not smoke on board) a cupboard full of champagne, wine, Scotch whisky and German liquor."

Was this the submarine that took Hitler and Eva Braun to Argentina brought?

This mystery remains unsolved.

Mysterious cargo

A month later, another submarine docked in the same harbor, the ambassador told the Police Gazette, and again he dispatched intelligence agents to the scene. "Again," he said, "they began running in circles. This time, men and cargo had vanished into thin air."

were.

Our intelligence officers were extremely burdened in their duties in Argentina by the complete lack of cooperation with the government. In reality, the Argentine authorities protected the Nazis and consistently concealed information that would have been useful to us .

We were never able to ascertain the full extent of Nazi infiltration in the country. We traced $400 million of Nazi capital to Buenos Aires. Just then it disappeared. One of Hitler's main agents was Ludwig Freude, who was entrusted with secret funds. Since we knew that he was a contact for General Friedrich Wolfe, Nazi military attache in Argentina, he was our number one target. Freude's son was one of Peron's close friends, and for many years his private secretary.

I tried to deport Freude to Germany, where we could have captured and interrogated him. To no avail. On September 15, 1945, Argentine Foreign Minister Cooke informed me that, despite the importance of the charges against Freude, the State Department was powerless to deport him.

Braden then reported to Washington that the Nazis had real fortress in the area around San.....as a built a refuge for Hitler and his inner core of Nazi followers.

"I sent our agents there to investigate," Braden recalled sadly. "They were mocked by the German guards and ordered to leave. We were never allowed free movement in the area."

That was in 1945. Since then, various efforts by researchers to penetrate the Nazi fortress have failed, until recently the reporter of the London Daily Express received the first eyewitness report confirming the revelations of the Police Gazette 12 years ago.

Flying disc sightings around the world

For those readers who in the past have hardly dealt with the subject of flying discs at all , shall her aNumberofthemostknown andalso most spectacular events - which have been described in the 'UFO'- part are already described as the classic cases are known - in general.

Officially, the first Appearance of 'flying saucers' are always the conn Year bythe Businessmanand Private pilot Kenneth Arnold near Washington nine foreign Flying and vis-à-vis Pr called saucer-like. Again and again the year 47 as the Year of thetoday so-called 'UFOs can, however, presumably between war events andUFO

The first step was to create a temporal distance between the two phenomena. However, since many reports from the year 1946, Scandinavia and also reports war about events from the classic years are clearly available, cases are prefixed:

Cordon Creighton, former English diplomat, later Adjunct Director the Magazine: "Flying Saucer Review," explained in an interview about his first sighting:

"That was actually in China, in 1941. At that time I was First Secretary at the British Embassy I was taking a walk along the banks of the Yangtze River when suddenly we saw a 'flying saucer.'.... Three years later, in 1944, I was in the United States, in New Orleans. And I was reading in the newspapers the reports of the war in Europe. What amazed me was that the pilots of fighter planes or bombers were talking about being pursued by

Fireballs language At that have I started,

To collect newspaper clippings about the 'flying saucers'. But in 1944 they were not called that yet, that came only in 1947." p. 197/198

U.S. Marine Major Keyhoe:

"The first official reports appeared in 1944.

or 'sauerkraut meteors', depending on which front they appeared over. These early UFOs appeared both singly and in formation. Apparently, their purpose was close observation of the air war's combat operations. Countless times they flew at our bombers and fighters, circling them at high speed. The intelligence officers suspected a new German weapon and checked the related reports after the end of the war. But they found no trace suggesting a secret type of aircraft (A Keyhoe error or one of the usual disinformation; in 'Geheime Wunderwaffen' I. Teil, was the secret Flying disc development inGermany during the war years; author's note). The phenomenon was inexplicable to both the German pilots and the Japanese aviators.

(Is understandable, after all, if they were classified as 'wonder weapons' under 'top secret'; author's note)." S. 47/48

No information was available on what keeps these balls like stars in the sky what is inside them or what presumably their purpose might be." S. 72

The weekly magazine 'Neue Weltschau', No. 10 of 6 March 1980, wrote in a report about 'Ghost planes the from thousandsof People at 29.1.1980 via Klagenfurt and large parts of Austria were seen among others:
"Older residents admittedly remember the numerous UFO observations that took place over Klagenfurt and Carinthia during the Second World War - we reported extensively about it - and the whole incident is just as reminiscent of those mysterious 'Air Defense Battle of Los Angeles' (this was also mentioned in our report), when, also during World War II, dozens of planes suddenly appeared on the coast, believed to be attacking Japanese fighters They came under fire, were visible in the spotlight, and several were reported shot down. The fire spell lasted for hours

- the next morning, however, there was no trace anywhere of these mysterious invaders, who of course had not been Japanese, because at that time they could not fly so far.... Something similar was observed over Sweden in 1945/46, so-called 'ghost rockets', some of which flew over the sky with a loud noise, but were neither German, nor English, nor Russian (this can only mean that they had no corresponding nationality markings). For how else could one have known that at that time; author's note). Some of them allegedly crashed, but nothing was found, although American generals who had arrived in a hurry made every possible investigation together with their Swedish colleagues.

From this report, we will first detail the incident over Los Angeles and later the one over Sweden. At February 25, 1942, about 15-20 unidentified enemy flying objects appeared over the California metropolitan area of Los Angeles, and the FLAK positions stationed around Los Angeles opened fire on them.

The London Times of 26.2.1942 reported this incident as follows:

See also the document (SECRET- stamped), reproduced in the Appendix, kept secret for 30 years (until May 3, 1972), "Memorandum for the President (Roosevelt)," by Chief of Staff Gen. C. Marshall. The document makes clear the event taken seriously by the highest authorities. It states:

1. Unknown Aircraft were probably via Go

Angeles, and were fired upon by batteries of the 37th CA Brigade between 3:12 and 4:15 a.m. with 1430 rounds of ammunition.

2. About more than 15 aircraft between 'very slow' to 200 miles and flying between 3000 and 6000 meters altitude were involved.

3. No bombs fell.

4. No troop losses in our country (USA).

5. No aircraft was shot down.

6. Army or Navy aircraft of the Americans were not in action.

"Frankfurter General Newspap 20.10.1979: "The 'foo fighter,' a small ball like the one used during the World War II is said to have appeared on both sides, was apparently a reconnaissance aircraft and unmanned."

"Die Welt", Hamburg, of 3.10.1950 reports a case where these balls had a diameter of only 30 cm.

Of course, there have been not only unmanned but also manned flying discs or flying bullets, even during the war years.

"In World War II and the Korean War, 'foo- fighters' (unidentified lights or objects that accompanied bombers or fighter planes on their missions) were fairly commonplace." S. 241

For the Canadian scientist and Jean Prachan, UFO events begin with the researchers, sixin Formation flying Lights years 1944, amer Atomic Research Center in Hanfort/ Washington inspected. Here is his somewhat abridged report:

"Many researchers have been amazed at how many Reports fro theimmediate Sur Nuclear power and missile bases. The numerous and so plants reports are accurate that the coincidence can be excluded.

Supposedly it started in 1944, a year before Hiroshima and Nagasaki.... At that time, in the United States and in Germany feverishlyand strictl secret Research the Atomic ready for use.

The American research center was the base Hanford in Washington State. The place was 'separated from World cut off', and only a handful of high officials knew about it. In March of this year, young pilot Jim Emeri flew over this area at the controls of his PT19. Little did he know that the fate of the world was being played out a few hundred yards from here. Suddenly, Emeri noticed that he was being followed by half a dozen 'lights' flying in formation. Curious, he approached to a distance of 300 meters and found that the objects were quite sm diameter of about three meters. The pilot counted above the Columbia River a total of seven objects.... It is likely that this report by Rufus Drake, former officer at Hanford is not the first, as technicians employed at Hanford have seen objects in the sky there on several occasions.

These 'visits' were repeated like this often that they have to AuthoritiesAttention excited and a Investigation was ordered. The employees of the center was However, on this occasion, it was decided to treat this affair with the utmost discretion.

A retired officer who had been at Hanford in 1944 reported: 'The order was superfluous, since our activities were top secret anyway. But we had discussed the things among ourselves, of course. We didn't think of flying saucers, but rather of enemy spies. That worried us the most, because we could not imagine

How so//te he know that there is a top secret research center in this region Besides, these 'planes' seemed to do incredible things. So people preferred not to think too much about it. Some even claimed that they were all ghosts, optical illusions or whatnot. It was not until three years later that people started talking about flying saucers. There

Rufus Drake's detailed report, "Secret U.S. Nuclear Facilities Monitored by UFOs; Saucers over Hanford/Washington," appeared in 'UFO Report,' Spring, USA, pp. 38-41, 60-62.

The following occurred in the Bermuda area in December 1944:

"In Europe, the war was in full swing; the Americans had already landed in Italy and were fighting the Germans doggedly in the air and at sea; both sides were suffering heavy casualties. In order to reduce losses to the 75th U.S. Air Fleet left December seven American bombers entered the United States. After a stopover in Bermuda to refuel, flew they continued. 480 km from Kindley Field, the formation suddenly encountered numerous strange meteorological phenomena. They lasted only about a minute; nevertheless, the planes were shaken as if by the fist of a giant. Of the seven planes, only two returned to Bermuda; there was no trace of the other five." S. 33

Various reports about these foo- fighters (enemy fighter planes) of the war years could be cited here. At almost all front sections they were flown by

German as well as from allied side observed They appeared via troop concentrations, over warships airfields, over harbors , over sections of the front and observed the respective battles. As a rule, they a deactive behavior. However, they occasionally flew into Allied bomber and fighter formations, thereby causing great confusion, the formations came to disintegration, then they pursued individual aircraft and circled them. A front experience of Lieutenant Colonel R.M. from Austria, which he reported to me personally, shall be described in short form:

In late 1944, said lieutenant colonel and his unit were in the vicinity of Metz, France, retreating to Germany. In the sky, they observed an in Directio Germany flying American Bomber group, the like usual Operational to bombing of German cities had. Suddenly saw R. M. and also his comrades, like a bright point of light flew into this bomber bunch, and maneuvered within it in rapid zigzag flights. In a few moments, about 15-20 planes fell out of the formation and crashed, burning. The general reaction to this event was, 'At last the wonder weapons are coming.' But the wonder weapons did not come, at least not to affect the course of the war.

U.S. Maj. Keyhoe, who was given permission at the Pentagon to Review who wanted to obtain files on the Foo Fighters, arguing was that this particular data would be performed still the Secrecy. S. 103

After the surrender of the German Wehrmacht, May 1945, Foo-Fighters were still observed sporadically over the East Asian theaters of war. Approximately with the end of World War II by the Japanese surrender, 2.9.1945, ends also the allied Designation Foo Fighter at Allied source material in this regard. Understandable, because II. W.K. was de facto to be regarded as finished, consequently 'enemy fighters' as the correct German translation reads, could no longer exist. The foreign flying objects sighted especially frequently over Sweden and Norway in the following year 1946 were now called - probably in

The known americ.
Commentator Frank Edwards knew about the 1946 events over the Northern European countries as follows:
"But in the spring of 1946, fireworks erupted in the night skies of the Scandinavian countries and northwestern Russia, observed night after night by thousands of people: faint objects flitting across the sky, often hovering, then changing course and speed so suddenly that this was highly beyond the capabilities of terrestrial aircraft.

Althoug first as 'Rockets reported, result itsel finally that they could by no means be such.
Once there was no exhaust, then at times they moved too slowly to hold themselves as a rocket like that. Third, they flew in formations, breaking them up and changing positions, and most importantly - they moved completely silently!" S. 25

Another source reports over 9 pages in the chapter: 'The invasion of the 'Ghost Rockets' over Scandinavia in 1946' among other things as follows:

"In 1946, hundreds of press notes on the subject of 'ghost rockets' ran over the Associated Press teleprinters, the United Press, the Reuter Agency and the New York Times. Only in recent years have documents come to light that were previously kept secret by Swedish and British military services.... "On July 27, the Swedish generals decided to announce no more sightings to the press. The correspondent of the London 'Daily Telegraph' cabled to his office the news that since July 29 the Norwegians had also begun news censorship. Nevertheless, direct reports continued to reach the press - proof that the time of these phenomena was far from over." S. 113

"A correspondent for the 'Christian Science Monitor' wrote on August 22, 7946, that by now not only the sighting locations but also the reports themselves were subject to strict secrecy.

Aime Michel, INCLUDE French UFO-Research Service a Specialist, explains in an interview:

"At that time I already had in my files all - I say all on purpose - French newspaper clippings about the observations in Scandinavia, 1946. At that time I believed, like all the world, that they were captured German planes which the Russians were trying out over the Baltic Sea." S. 199

The Soviets complained in their magazine 'New Times' on 3.10.1946 that the press agency Reuter had spread the news in the West that they were conducting rocket tests from occupied East Germany, and were working on the further development of the German V-2. In the process, the Soviets only from 1947 and with the help of abducted German scien theGerman construction V-tists began with.

500 flying discs over Farmington !

On March 17, 1950, at 11 o'clock in the morning, Sheriff Mc Graw was suddenly called outside. The skies of the U.S. oil town of Farmington in northwestern New Mexico were teeming with flying discs. Also on the radar screens of the air surveillance one had discovered the gigantic swarm of strange flying objects in the meantime. The sheriff estimated that there must be about 500 unknown objects, and they flew onto the hermetically sealed nuclear exclusion zone of the United States. The same was repeated at about the same hour on March 18 and 19, 1950.

objects in the sky.

'Whatever they were,' the paper reported, 'they caused a huge sensation in our town which is only110 air miles from Los Alamos' (Los Alamos has research and testing facilities for atomic disintegration).

This alarming event had marked the press conference of April 4, 1950, in Key West, at which Acting President Harry S. Truman declared:

For that, the armed forces had the responsibility of controlling the airspace over the nation and, by its very nature, anything that wanted to move in that airspace. But UFOs could not be controlled. So the decision was whether to admit that there was something in the sky that could not be controlled, despite all the billions of dollars that had been earmarked for it, or whether it was better to deny the existence of this whole problem while studying it closely and looking for ways to deal with it. One chose the second alternative." S. 227

Jagd auf Lichtflecke

Nacht-Düsenjäger verfolgen mysteriöse Gegenstände

Washington, 28. Juli

Von einer ergebnislosen Jagd auf nicht identifizierte „Objekte" am Nachthimmel über Washington kehrten zwei Düsenjäger vom Typ F 84 nach einstündiger Flugdauer auf ihre Einsatzhäfen zurück. Die Maschinen waren aufgestiegen, als auf den Radarschirmen des Flugverkehrskontrollzentrums Washington vier bis zwölf „mysteriöse Gegenstände" erschienen waren. Dieses wurde am Montag vom Oberkommando der amerikanischen Luftstreitkräfte in Washington bekanntgegeben.

Die „mysteriösen Gegenstände" wurden zuerst von Radargeräten auf dem Zivilflughafen Washington erfaßt und waren auch mit bloßem Auge zu erkennen. Das Verteidigungsministerium schickte sofort mehrere Offiziere des Geheimdienstes, darunter erfahrene Zivil- und Militärpiloten, zu dem Flughafen, die die fliegenden Gegenstände gleichfalls auf dem Radarschirm beobachten konnten. Die „Objekte" wurden auf den Schirmen jedoch nur als „sich bewegende grellweiße Lichtflecken" ausgemacht.

Unmittelbar danach erhielten zwei Nachtdüsenjäger F 84 den Befehl zu starten und sich den geheimnisvollen Flugapparaten zu nähern. Einer der Piloten sichtete die Lichtflecken und steuerte darauf zu. Trotz einer Eigengeschwindigkeit von über 1000 Stundenkilometern konnte er jedoch keinen der Lichtflecken einholen. Bald darauf verschwanden sie spurlos. Der andere Düsenjäger, der durch Sprechfunk in das Gebiet der fliegenden Objekte dirigiert wurde, bekam keinen der „Lichtflecke" zu Gesicht.

Während der Sprecher der Luftstreitkräfte die Möglichkeit einräumte, daß die Beobachter einer optischen Täuschung, einer „technischen Merkwürdigkeit" oder einer anderen „verrückten Sache" zum Opfer gefallen sein könnten, bestand der Sprecher des Flugsicherheitsdienstes darauf, daß es sich „mit Sicherheit" um „feste" fliegende Gegenstände gehandelt habe. STRANGE OBJECTS IN U.S. SKY

OBSERVATION BY RADAR

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

WASHINGTON, JULY 22

United States Air Force officials, who have been checking the many recent reports of "flying saucers" submitted to them from various parts of the country, are to-day investigating reports that seven to 10 "unidentified aerial objects" were noted on radar screens here early on Sunday morning. These objects appeared to be over Andrews Air Force base, in Maryland.

The Air Force announced last night that the objects had appeared on the radar screen in the air route traffic control centre at the National Airport, first on one section of the screen, and then, soon afterwards, on another section, which showed them moving in a different direction. Their speed was only 100 to 135 miles an hour, which is very slow for "flying saucers." One pilot watched the objects for about 12 minutes as he flew from Washington to Martinsburg, in West Virginia. Another pilot reported that a brilliant light had followed his aircraft from Herndon, in Virginia, to within four miles of the National Airport.

The case of Reinhold

On 7. and 9.11.1957 the daily newspaper 'Rheinpfalz' see appendix, reported about the Californian grain merchant R. Schmidt who had direct contact with an alien spaceship and its crew in Kearney, Nebraska, USA on 5.11.1957.

Two years later, in 1959, Schmidt reported in his booklet: "Im Raumschiff zur Arktis - Zwischenfall in Kearney", the German edition was published by Ventla-Verlag, Wiesbaden-Schierstein, detailed via hisexperience . Reinhold Schmidt

"The men were wearing street clothes, were approximating 1.80 m tall and weighed an estimated 80 kg. The two Women appeared to be about the same height, weighed about 58 to 60 kg, and I estimate their age to be about 40." S. 11
"They all spoke English to me - as it seemed to me - with a German accent With each other they spoke High German, which I could understand, since I had graduated from a school where German was spoken and taught as well as English; and I could speak, read and write German at that time." S. 13

"While on board the ship, I was told not to start my car until they were completely out of sight, or it would not move at all. This was the first time I learned that the ship had stopped my car." S. 14

Many of Schmidt's statements, including this last quote, let realizethathis Experience prob hardl could be faked. According to many eyewitness and newspaper reports, it is indeed the case that the ignition of the engines, as well as radio, fail in the vicinity of these flying objects. Even the enemy radar systems can be influenced in this way.

that on the radar screens the same can not always be perceived.

The January issue 1983, of the magazine 'Waffen-Revue' has shown in a report of several pages with many documents from the last years of the war, that the GERMAN REICH was busy at that time with the ignition interruption of enemy engines (article: "Die geheimste Waffe des 2. Weltkrieges; Motorstoppmittel", p. 7711-7736).

The Jewish writer couple Blum brings in the book.
"Beyond Earth: man's contact with UFOs," a report by the Technical Intelligenc Departme theU .S. strategic Luftwaffe, London, 1944, stating:

"We received alarming reports from various places that bombers returning from Germany always more complained about mysterious engine failures. ... After fruitful discussion among intelligence specialists, we concluded that the Germans were using a new secret weapon that was interfering with the electrical system of our bombers."
S. 67

But back to our 'UFO contact man' Reinhold Schmidt A large number of reporters came from many US states - after earlier, probably on the initiative of of the local Police chief in Kearney, an interview with the Schmidt about television was aired - to log his. About 16 hours experience he had to report Spee and Reply stand.
But the very next day, probably on the instructions of higher governme or military Services -wasour Grain trader detained without warrant, and later admitted to mental hospital.

But Schmidt remained and stubbornly defended his experience, already in the whole which had become well known. One saw country therefore forced probably also because of his meanwhile high profile, to set him free again after a few weeks. Schmidt's initial speculation about the origin of the spaceship, but later proved to be wrong:

"In fact, my own thought at the time was that it was a Russian ship, manned by German scientists (many of whom, as we know, were deported to Russia after 1945; author's note.)" S. 75

On page 27 it is reported that on 5 Feb. 1958 again

Contact with the spaceship took place when he drove about 32 km west from Kearney over a country road, and his suddenly trolley stopped again. To his astonished Question, how one could have found him then, is explained to him:
due to his brain impulses. They went up for a short flight and then declared that they wanted to come back, which they did on August 14, 1958. To 16.15 now the flight went to the Arctic Circle and the Arctic. At times they reached 65,000 km/hr, explaining that "the plane could go much faster, but the distance would not be great enough to really give it free rein.... This same ship can be used as an airplane in the air, as a ship on the water, or as a submarine under the water." S. 39

At northern Arctic gifted she withthe Spacecraft for about 4 hrs, at 100-120 m diving depth, under the water surface:

"While we were below the surface of the water, I saw something that has never been disclosed to the public until now. I wrote to Washington and asked permission to publish this report. But until the day I wrote this down, I heard nothing from the Pentagon. Since I assume there is no reason for further secrecy, I will make these announcements now. We observed two Russian submarines, which were made a map of the bottom of the ocean to establish bases from which they could fire projectiles toward any part of the world without giving warning and without making noise. The space friends told me that our government knows of this activity because three of our submarines are stationed there, and because one of our small reconnaissance airships and some of our larger aircraft have flown over this area. The space friends told me that they will not allow the Russians to do that. They explained that - if we couldn't stop the Russians from attacking the world from under the water without warning and without making a sound -.

they would do it themselves. I am sure that they will are determined." S. 40/41

To one, fromthe Great powers, or the Back then planned Nuclear was the American Schmidt explai "They also said that they would not allow a nuclear war. They made it clear that they are impartial and will not side with any country, but that they will not stand by and watch our planet destroyed by nuclear bombs either.

This means will fro great low umbrella that covers a large area and not only cleans our air, but at times destroys even the mechanism of the bomb." p. 41

So much from Schmidt's experience report. The statements about atomic bombs and nuclear war will be discussed in more detail later.

Mass sighting in Florence

"On October 27, 1954, mass sightings also occur in Italy. On a hotel terrace in Piazza San Marco in Prato, two men, Cenaro Lucchetti and Pietro Lastrucci, see in the sky two 'luminous spindles' followed by a fiery white trail. A 'UFO' cross over the Vatican!

On November 6, 1954, about 100 'flying saucers' stayed in the sky over Rome for more than two hours (from 11 am to 1:30 pm). At exactly 12 o'clock, 40 of them formed a huge cross in the sky, in such a way that two groups formed a big 'V'. Each V consisted of 2x10 flying discs. These two V-formations flew with their tips towards each other. When these two formations were together with the tips, they stopped motionless.

Fear and terror in Petrozavodsk!

From Sept. 20, 1977 to Feb. 20, 1978, a UFO as large as a soccer field appeared 5-6 times a month over the Soviet city of Petrozavodsk (population 185,000) on Lake Onega, northeast of Leningrad.

One of the largest newspapers in the USA, the 'National Enquirer' reported about it in detail on April 18, 1978, after the two chief editors of the million-dollar paper William Dick and Henry Gris had traveled to Moscow, Leningrad and the city of the event itself especially for this event. Thanks to their good contacts with journalists there and SovietScientists we owe their detailed report.

The National Enquirer wrote:

"The Soviet Governme appointedimme a scientific research at the highest level and put a security bar on this investigation. However, the Enquirer managed to pierce the cloak of official secrecy surrounding this incident and obtained exclusive interviews with a reporter from Tass, the official Soviet news agency an Soviet Top Scientists to Lead." No. 251, June 1978, p. 7

Now on this 20th Sept 1977 afternoon 4pm the following happened. A huge 'UFO' appeared over the city for about 12 minutes and sent out golden rays of light, which fell on the city like spray and burned coin- to egg-sized holes in cobblestones of the streets and in windowpanes of many houses. It is also said that five intense rays of light from the huge object were directed at the city, and Petrozavodsk was enveloped in this golden light during these 12 minutes. Literally, the W. Dick and H. Gris report states:

"Window panes with holes of various sizes caused by the UFO's light beams were seized by government researchers" op. cit.

Th Correspondent theSovietNewsAgency TASS, Nicolai Milov, the hundredsof Citizen in Petrozavodsk interviewed, described one of the holes, something larger than a chicken egg, which was burned into the window pane of an apartment building. Amazingly, the piece of glass that was cut out remained whole and was found on the floor in front of the window. The pane was transferred to Moscow as part of the investigation. Milov literally to the Americans:

"After interviewing them (the eyewitnesses; author's note), there was no doubt in my mind that I had met people here who had been confronted with a tremendous event.

Some were hysterical... As a Group fro dockworkers who were working in the port saw the UFO, they ran away screaming: 'This is the end!' They believed to recognize in the body a nuclear weapon which had been sent out by your country (USA) and could explode any moment over their heads. They were out of their minds with fright." op. cit.

With the many other 50-70 mm holes it was similar. The separated circular pieces of glass seemed to be on the edges like melted and lay either on the window sills orat thefloor . double glazed Windows remained both panes - apart from from the separated round pieces - undamaged. According to this 12 minutes Event via the Capital the north russia Provinc Karelia, hoveredthe strange Flying slow in Direction Port/Onega-Seedavon . Vladimir Azhazha, Moscow physicist, oceanographer, author and Lectur and former Soviet Submar Commander stated:

"The object flew low over the harbor and hovered above an anchored ship 142 meters long. A comparison with the length of the ship led to the conclusion that the diameter of the UFO was 104 meters. As the UFO flew toward Lake Onega, many drivers took up pursuit. The UFO hovered motionless over the lake. After a while, a smaller object separated from the main body, fell straight down and disappeared under the water. At that moment, the main body (the UFO) suddenly started moving and quickly disappeared into a cloud bank."
op. cit.

The Enquirer report goes on to say:

"A senior editor of TASS reported that the news agency received over 1500 letters inquiring, 'How safe is it still to be in Petrozavodsk to stay or travel there?' Before TASS was able to respond Letter RSVP could, were the Writing s Government moved in. Also Fro Eyewitness accounts were brushed aside, the TASS editor told the Enquirer. ...

Professor Felix Zigel, Russia's top expert on UFOs and a teaching professor at the Moscow Aviation Institute, an academy where Soviet cosmonauts receive their specialized training, also thinks the object is a UFO. 'Without a doubt,' he told the Enquirer. 'It had all those characteristics.' " op. cit.

However, in the further UFO appearances over Petrozavodsk in the following months, no more holes were burned in street pavements and window panes. The full National Enquirer report of April 18, 1978, appeared, translated into German, in UFO News, June 1978, No. 251, p. 7

Analyses of the windows under an electron microscope at a Moscow institute yielded an astonishing result: the usual window glass, which is not crystalline in itself, in this case exhibited a crystalline structure on the surface of the circular sections.

On the night of August 23, 1981, appeared 17 huge

Flying accomp fro abou a Dozen smaller objects over the Soviet capital Moscow and burned there 70-100 mm round holes in 60 window panes. A detailed report also appeared in the National Equirer in April 1982. German translation, UFO News No. 275, August 1982, page 1.

Rho Sigma, pseudonym of a German scientist, who worked at the V-2 rocket test site in Peenemünde before 1945, and after 1952 under Wernher von Braun at the American space agency "NASA" was employed, writes in "Research in shackles", on the complex of secrecy:

"Few Months after the CIA had been incorporated, a highly significant U.S. Air Force service directive, numbered AF-200-2, was put into effect in August 1953 This service directive literally stated that 'the percentage of unidentified reports must be reduced to a minimum.' It was coupled with service directive JAN AP-14 (abbreviation for Joint Army Navy Air Publication; author's note), which dispose Tha any Communi or Distribution fro information about 'unidentifieds' by members of the U.S. Air Force is a serious offense punishable by up to 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine. All other U.S. branches of the armed forces were placed under the authority of the U.S. Air Force in UFO matters by additional service orders ... All local services were authorized only to release information on UFO reports with known explanations to the press or other interested parties; reports classified as 'unknown'

By "known explanations" are such as: it was the PlanetSirius; Venus; cloud reflections; or light reflections; it was a balloon rising; or a particularly fast and high-flying aircraft or ignited sump gas; etc. meant. Actually unknown Objects, unidentified, that is =UFOs' were onl to the so-called "BlueBook Commission of Inquiry to be sent.

Ing. A. Geigenthaler, author and UFO researcher, writes about the Air Force orders:

"There have been several Air Force orders over the years. were issued, all of which ran under the designation AFR 200. Thus the order AFR 200-2 of 26.8.1953 contains among other things that to the public only jokes and erroneous reports about UFOs may be given. All real reports are secret to the superior Services to be Pieces of evidence must, if possible, be sent immediately by ATIC (Air Technical Intelligence Center; author's note) to be flown into Dayton." S. 89

"A disadvantage of particular tragedy was the fact that. at Grun AF 200-2 service no Notifications of radar detections of unidentified objects by the Air Force radar operators to the press or the public. Nevertheless, such reports of UFOs during observation sometimes reached the public in a roundabout way and were then usually officially denied the next day..." S. 180

The text of the Air Force order of Dec. 24, 1959 (the title page bears the date of Sept. 14, 1959), translated into German, reads as follows:

"On 19 September 1966, the service directive AFR 200-. 2 modified and is now called 80-17." p. 90

Regarding the modified Air Force Service Regulation AFR 80-17, Charles Berlitz, grandson of the Berlitz School founder, writes in "The Bermuda Triangle."

"The service directive aims to: '...determine whether the UFO poses a possible threat to the United States, and to use the scientific and technical measurement and testing data that investigations of UFO reports have yielded.'

Although the service regulation makes the reassuring statement, 'The majority of UFOs reported to the Air Force have turned out to be commonplace or familiar objects that pose no threat to our security,' it adds 'It is possible that foreign powers could develop missiles of revolutionary appearance and propulsion.' The assertion that 'so-called UFOs often turn out to be aircraft.' is somewhat paradoxical, for immediately after it states, 'Except when aircraft are the cause of a UFO report, the provision of this regulation states that aircraft shall not be reported.'.... The service regulation further provides, 'Each commander of an air base shall establish a UFO observation post.'..."
The order also contains instructions on what information the commander of a base may give to the press." S. 127

"Shortly after the completion of Project Blue Book, a letter was issued by the Pentagon stating 'The Responsibility for the airspace defense of the United States mandated (.....) Consequently, ADC is responsible for unknown aerial phenomena reported in any manner, and the United Army-Navy-Air Force Publication (JANAP-146) facilities provided for the publication of reports originating from nonmilitary sources."

So even though in the eyes of the Air Force flying saucers don't exist, it would still like to know if people are seeing them. Yet under JANAP-146, severe penalties were threatened to anyone who disseminated information obtained about unidentified objects So UFOs are still shrouded in a cloak of mystery - or a conspiracy of silence." S. 226

Was the "marriage of convenience" really over after World War II? Admittedly, in the first post-war years, one side suspected the other of having made better war-technological spoils, even of having come into possession of the so-called wonder weapons. But this mutual suspicion was found to be unfounded after a few years, and since then the "marriage of convenience" stronger and firmer than ever before, which will become apparent in the following, even if the media propagate the opposite and even drivel about the so-called East-West conflict.

UFO Secrecy a Plander "Invisible Government"

The plan for concealment of the flying disc facts, of course, does not come from the lower echelons of the military, the press, politics, science, authorities and departments of the Eastern and Western states, but in each case from the very top, from the governments, or rather, from the "secret powers", behind the governments. Engineer, Dr. h.c. Rho Sigma (pseudonym),

Member of American Institutesof Aeronautics and Astronautics, writes:

"The one informed radio commentator Frank Edwards has stated bluntly 'The orders for secrecy regarding UFOs come from the top. The Air Force is simply the whipping boy, the executive body." S. 188

The magazine "Esotera" comes in its detailed, multi-page article "Geheimsache 'Fliegende Untertassen'" likewise on the causers of the cover-up to speak:

"The fact that the Central Intelligence Agency is not just any secret service - as most countries in the world maintain it and as it is often naively imagined, especially in Europe - but that even the highest government circles in the USA cannot escape its global power is explained in the book by David Wise and Thomas B. Not once US Presidentshave the Power, the Flight gyro facts at air. In a related Article: "Is America concealing the truth from the world?", writes the "Neue Revue" of 2.2.1980, p. 3:

"Carter, then still governor of the state of Georgia, testified: 'I was in Leary, Georgia, with ten members of the Lions Club in early October 1969 to give a talk. During a break, we suddenly caught sight of the UFO. It was bright and large like the moon, shimmering first bluish then reddish, and came within 300 yards of our group. We were able to observe the eerie object for almost ten minutes before it disappeared into space again.'

The statement of the President of the United States at that time already led to bitter debates during Carter's election campaign, which ended only when he pledged to have all the country's secret archives about UFOs opened in case of his victory. He did not do it until today.

Is Carter afraid, like all his predecessors since 1945, that the whole world will panic when the truth finally comes out?"

Radio commentator andjournalist Frank Edwards: "Repeated Air Force statements, usually issued after each series of conspicuous sightings, describing UFOs as nonexistent, led many press organs to believe at the beginning of 1954 that these claims were true. For in January 1954 there were only two Sources of importance for UFO information: Airline pilots and my radio program on the 'Mutual Network' station. The systematic eradication of these two factors was therefore immediately undertaken." S. 234/235

Edwards reports further, that on 17 Feb. 1954 in the Roosevelt hotelin Hollywood, betweenofficers of inte theRepresentativesofthePilotsAssociation civil airlines, a conference had taken place, with the purpose of getting pilots to cooperate in a "matter of extreme importance to the government."

"Civilian pilots were urged each time a UFO was sighted to notify the nearest military airport by radio and not to make public statements about such incidents. This request was immediately passed on to the pilots by the airlines..... By mid-1954, therefore, most if not all civilian airlines in the United States had adopted special rules for handling reports of UFOs. In the article in the "Bild-Zeitung" of November 22 , 1980:
"UFOs: green orbs tracked seven passenger planes",

"The airline 'Iberia' banned its pilots from speaking".

The weekly newspaper "Die Zeit," May 27, 1954, p. 7 reports in the article "Is the Earth Under Control?":

"On July 29 (1952: author's note), General Samford, the head of the Secret Service, told an elite group of journalists that of the reports on the 'saucers,' the fifth part was necessarily credible; but that, according to the theory of the physicist Menzel, it must be an aerial phenomenon act, the bytemperature inversioninhigher air layers.

The effect of this official statement was unexpected: the highly qualified Pilots sent questionnaire back, and wrote to that effect that they would not report anything more if they were believed at the Pentagon to be unable to distinguish 'ground clutter' from real objects."

It is quite possible that this reaction of the pilots was intended. Because in the book "Flying Saucers - Enigma in Space", chapter "Conspiracy of Silence" is reported about the years 1947/48 and the attitude of the Pentagon as follows:
"The Pentagon no longer seemed to want information confirming the existence of UFOs, only statements that they did not exist. This attitude was confirmed in February 1949, when the code name of the thena 'Resent (Investigation Project for "UFOs"; author's note) was transformed. The new project was joined only by people who followed the new policy of dismissing any report of UFOs as a misidentification or presenting them as a figment of the imagination." S. 147

The weekly magazine "The New Age" reports, on the view of Earl Clancarty, member of the English House of Lords:
"Count Clancarty is firmly convinced that between the USA and the Soviet Union concerning the unidentified flying objects, as the UFOs are called with full name, a secret silence agreement exists" No. 31/1980, p. 9

Frank Edwards comes to similar conclusions as the English Count Clancarty:

'UFOs' - Moved into space

With the terms: "extraterrestrial beings", "UFOs come from the universe", "extraterrestrial visitors", etc. is inextricably linked the name Donald E. Keyhoe. One could call him therefore completely correct also the father of the extraterrestrial theory. Keyhoe, former major of the US Marine Corps, was friends with polar explorer, Admiral Richard E. Byrd, the head of Operation High Jump to US Marine Antarctica in 1946-47. Major Keyhoe was Fliegers personal adjutant of the world-famous become director Charles Lindbergh, undavanced later to for years of NICAP (National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena) to the National Research Committee on Aerial Phenomena.

Wi The increased occurrence of the so-called saucers in the first th years after the Second World War caused nervousness, the uncertainty, and insecurity among U.S. military command on the other regarding the Question: sho man the Public only say?, strongly noticeable.

It isavery natural human Weakness, to suppress oppressive and unpleasant things from the own as well as from the consciousness of others for the time being. The most obvious method in this area of events was, at least initially, to claim that these repeatedly sighted saucer-like flying spinning tops exist at all.

for the time being also diligently this method. But one had to get be clear from the outset that these alone will not be able to Year to promising its could.
Major Keyhoe begins his globally publicized book wit the following in Text reproduced in facsimile

"Throughout the last year, I've been working behind the scenes at the Pentagon, the War Department building in Washington, watched as the Air Force grappled with the dangerous question:

WHAT TO TELL THE PUBLIC ABOUT THE FLYING SAUCERS?

Sin 1951 isa selected Group high government officials have been briefed by Air Force intelligence on the saucers, and many a former skeptic has left those highly confidential meetings with serious worry lines after listening to the intelligence officers' revelations."

There is a big difference between the questions:

I) Where come the flying Saucers really?

II) WHAT TO TELL THE PUBLIC ABOUT THE FLYING SAUCERS?

Th Problem or Question themilitary Leadership circles (II) already shows that the answer to this question will hardly have anything in common with the actual origin of the flying discs.

On question l, in the first post-war years, there was, as also later and even today, in the U.S. Department of Defense probably no ambiguity:

"At the Pentagon at that time (meaning the dramatic incident in January 1948 in which Officer Thomas Mantell died after a collision with a flying disc), they were still convinced that the mysterious flying objects were the secret weapon of an alien but thoroughly terrestrial power, and they were horrified by the fear that the United States might one day be brought to its knees by them," writes Esotera magazine, p. 516, 1975

But this is about question II. It was Major Keyhoe who, at the end of the 1940s, when more and more Americans believed in the existence of flying saucers, took up the saving idea of the Air Force Intelligence Corps (ATIC):

"A callup survey of American cities found that one in four U.S. residents believes in the existence of the 'Flying Saucer' Then the American magazine 'True' dropped a journalistic atomic bomb: 'For 175 years, Earth has been under observation by living, intelligent beings from another planet.'

That was the conclusion drawn by aviation expert Donald E. Keyhoe after eight months of investigative work for the magazine.

In his book published in the early fifties:

'Flying Saucer from outer Space', or in the 1954 German edition: 'Der Space closer ', writes Keyhoe itself: "In 1949,after months of collecting True, in which I expressed the view that the saucers were probably interplanetary machines." S. 21

The initial and also understandable reluctance of the Pentagon against this new space theory - they still wanted to stubbornly stick to the denial pursued so far was increasingly in Keyhoe 's favor:

"In early 1952, the respected million-dollar illustrated magazine 'Life' surprisingly appeared with an article, 'Did we fro the World Space?' The Magazine had abandoned its original attitude of amused skepticism and seriously believed in the reality of flying saucers after reviewing the research material. The article had been written with the support of the Air Force. The 'Life' editors, who had interviewed well-known rocket researchers, astronomers and astrophysicists, came to the conclusion that they must be inter-planetary vehicles." Der Spiegel No. 17/1954, p. 27

It is easier to support a deliberately misleading theory with secret facts. Why one should tell also just here the whole truth to the public? Where, at least with the most essential events of the Second World War, the world public is almost exclusively occupied and deceived!

The preface of his book already indicates that he is a member of the military:

"Dear Sirs,

we acknowledge your letter regarding a planned book on "Flying Saucers" by Major Donald E. Keyhoe, Marine Corps of United States.

We in the the air know Major Keyhoe as long association and his cooperation with the Air Force in the investigation of unknown flying objects give him the qualification as a leading capacity in this field of investigation. All observation reports and other information he cites were released by Air Force Technical Intelligence at his request and made available to him.

The Air and the the underneath investigating authority, Committee Blue Book, are aware of Major Keyhoe's conclusion that the "flying saucers" came from another planet. The Air Force has never denied this possibility. Some committee members believe that there is an alien, natural phenomenon, as yet totally unknown to us. But if the obviously "Impossible," Fahrney replied flatly. "That was just a hasty reaction without careful consideration. The Soviets could not possibly have had such a head start on us in '47-even today-no matter how many German specialists they kidnapped to Russia. No, no. Either there are no saucers - and these reports are difficult to refute - or they are of interplanetary origin." S. 54

Even as early as the forties and fifties, apart from the usualSightings andEvents inAirspace Flying discs - mostly landed in lonely areas - and often observed only by individuals. Sporadically direct contacts have also taken place, in some cases with conversations in the local language. In the serious takers, fro reliable People created In the protocols of experiences there was with overwhelming majority always talk about tall (approx. 1.80 m) people of white race similar to us as flight disk crews, so that - however starting from the today usual extraterrestrial theory - is correctly concluded in the book 'Astrobiology':

"In itself, it is just a joke that the various 'Contacts', who have already wanted to see UFOs land, always saw beings of strange celestial bodies coming out, which looked exactly like the colleague or the colleague from the office next door. The allegedly on the earth so far landed planet beings resemble according to information of all 'Kontaktler' the European-North American type of white race. Not a single black, yellow, red, blue or green planetary human has been sighted so far. The body dimensions correspond exactly to ours. In this point we may go even further than the representatives of the UFOlogy. It would be downright absurd to assume that intelligent beings from strange worlds show such surprising similarity with us." S. 20

Already at that time, when the world press increasingly went over (had to go over?) the 'official, official' assumption of the extraterrestrial origin into its UFO reports flow

Very carefully Frank Edwards formulates what he thinks of these invented or reworked contact reports with strange beings:

The observers may well be quite real flying discs, and at Landings alsotheir normal looking but crews have seen and also reported, what the media make of it, that becomes 'public opinion', and not the real facts.

The example of Dr. Hynek will be used to show how the term 'little green men' alone came into being J. Allen Hynek - who Frank Edwards claimed had "a special talent for solving UFO-related problems 'obliquely'" page 172 - is a professor of astronomy at the

This glow is also the subject of songs and stories such as the 'lantern man,' 'fox fire,' and 'will-o'-the-wisp.' After learning more about this swamp gas from other Michigan scientists, I decided to offer that as a possible explanation to reporters."

Mind you, the scientist Hynek is not at all concerned with therefo whatwere theseappearances actually. Hi only deals with the question, what can I offer as a possible explanation! Hynek writes further:

"The press conference, however, left no time for erudite discussion - it was a circus. The cameramen wanted me here, the newspaper people there For a while, both groups dragged me back and forth

Everyone expected from me the clearest and most spectacular interpretation of the phenomena. They wanted

When I distributed a statement explaining the swamp gas hypothesis, many reporters ignored that I saw it as only one possible explanation. I watched in horror as one journalist skimmed the paper, underlined the word 'swamp gas' and ran to the phone.

Not only did many reports the next day definitely describe burning swamp gas as the cause of the Michigan lights - they also implied that it was the cause of many other UFO apparitions. I left town as quickly and secretly as I could." S. 168

'OBJECTS' OUTSTRIP JETS OVER CAPITAL

Spotted Second Time in Week by Radar, but Interceptors Fail to Make Contact

By The Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, July 27—The Air Force said today that jet fighter planes had made an effort to intercept unknown objects in the sky over Washington last night after the objects had been spotted by radar, but that no direct contact had been made.

It was the second time within a week that unidentified objects had been observed in the vicinity of the nation's capital, but no planes were sent up on the previous occasion, last Monday.

The Air Force said that at 9:08 o'clock, Eastern daylight time, last night the Air Route Traffic Control Center, operated by the Civil Aeronautics Administration, had picked up by radar "between four and twelve unidentified objects over the Washington vicinity."

The C. A. A. notified the Air Force and two jet fighter-interceptor planes were ordered up to make a check. These planes came from a base at New Castle, Del., about ninety miles from Washington.

The jet planes themselves appeared on the C. A. A. radarscope at 11:25 P. M. and were guided in on [illegible] objects.

Dear Sirs:

This will acknowledge your letter of recent date regarding a proposed book on "flying saucers" by Major Donald E. Keyhoe, U. S. Marine Corps, retired.

We in the Air Force recognize Major Keyhoe as a responsible, accurate reporter. His long association and cooperation with the Air Force, in our study of unidentified flying objects, qualifies him as a leading civilian authority on this investigation.

All the sighting reports and other information he listed have been cleared and made available to Major Keyhoe from Air Technical Intelligence records, at his request.

The Air Force, and its investigating agency, "Project Bluebook," are aware of Major Keyhoe's conclusion that the "Flying Saucers" are from another planet. The Air Force has never denied that this possibility exists. Some of the personnel believe that there may be some strange natural phenomena completely unknown to us, but that if the apparently controlled maneuvers reported by many competent observers are correct, then the only remaining explanation is the interplanetary answer.

Very Truly Yours

Invasion „fliegender Untertassen" in Frankreich und Deutschland?

Von unserem Pariser Korrespondenten

Hu. Paris (Eig. Bericht). In Frankreich sind in der Nacht von Montag auf Dienstag fliegende Untertassen in großer Zahl beobachtet worden. Zahlreiche Menschen in verschiedenen Teilen des Landes, aber auch in Holland, der Schweiz und der Bundesrepublik berichteten, gegen 1.15 Uhr nachts helleuchtende, im allgemeinen in westöstlicher Richtung fliegende Objekte gesichtet zu haben. Einige Augenzeugen geben sogar an, eine ganze Gruppe von fliegenden Untertassen habe sich geräuschlos und schnell in großer Höhe vorwärts bewegt. Daß es sich bei den Beobachtungen um Halluzinationen handelt, ist ausgeschlossen, weil auch die Besatzungen von acht Passagierflugzeugen, die sich zu der genannten Zeit über französischem Staatsgebiet befanden, dem zentralen Flughafen (Kontrollturm Paris-Orly) meldeten, sie hätten hellstrahlende Flugobjekte gesichtet.

Die Beobachtungen der Flugzeugbesatzungen wurden an so entgegengesetzten Punkten wie Straßburg und Marseille gemacht, so daß bloße Luftspiegelungen nach allgemeiner Überzeugung ausscheiden. Nachdem vom Kontrollturm in Orly in den frühen Morgenstunden des Dienstag die Beobachtungen der Flugzeuge zunächst bestätigt wurden, ist im Laufe des Vormittags ein offenbar von militärischer Seite veranlaßtes Dementi herausgegeben worden.

Es scheint aber festzustellen, daß die zivilen Luftkontrollbehörden die militärische Luftverteidigung alarmiert haben, nachdem es ihren eigenen Radargeräten nicht gelungen war, die unbekannten Flugkörper zu erfassen. Von militärischer Seite hat man anscheinend ebenfalls keinen Erfolg gehabt. Vom amerikanischen Luftwaffenhauptquartier für Europa wurde bestätigt, daß man die unbekannten Flugobjekte ebenfalls auf den Flugplätzen Ramstein und Spangdahlem gesichtet hat, aber aus ungenannten Gründen nicht mit Radar erfassen konnte.

Auch an Bord von zwei englischen Schiffen, die sich im Kanal zwischen England und Frankreich beziehungsweise vor der niederländischen Küste befanden, sind die fliegenden Untertassen festgestellt worden. Das Observatorium von Meudon bei Paris hat für die Beobachtungen in der Nacht zum Dienstag eine einfache Erklärung bereit. Wenn es sich nicht um Kometen gehandelt habe, so meint das Observatorium, dann seien die zahlreichen Beobachter fliegender Untertassen wohl Augenzeugen des Eintritts eines sowjetischen Satelliten in die Erdatmosphäre gewesen. Der Feuerschein sei entstanden, als der Satellit durch die Berührung mit der Luft zerrieben wurde.

Von verschiedenen Orten Südwestdeutschlands aus ist zur gleichen Zeit ein „unbekanntes fliegendes Objekt" am Sternenhimmel gesichtet worden. Es wurde vom Bodenseegebiet und vom Schwarzwald aus kurz nach ein Uhr früh beobachtet. Drei Werkschutzangehörige einer Konstanzer Firma beschrieben den Gegenstand unabhängig voneinander als etwa zehn Meter langen, rotglühenden Flugkörper, der langsam von West nach Ost geflogen sei. Nach Ansicht der Beobachter war er weder ein Meteorit noch ein Flugzeug. Er habe einer glühenden Rakete mit langem Schweif geglichen.

Sehr geehrter Herr [redacted] Walter

Ich habe jetzt eine Antwort auf das Schreiben erhalten, das ich in Ihrem Namen an das britische Verteidigungsministerium gerichtet hatte und in dem ich um Information über UFOs und andere rätselhafte Himmelsphänomene gebeten hatte.

Bedauerlicherweise gibt es im britischen Verteidigungsministerium keine Stelle, die allein mit der Aufgabe betraut ist, das Vorkommen von UFOs aufzuzeichnen, und es gibt auch keine Mitarbeiter, die sich diesem Thema während ihrer gesamten Arbeitszeit widmen. Die über dieses Thema existierenden Unterlagen fallen unter den Public Records Act, was bedeutet, daß erst 1993 die ersten Unterlagen freigegeben werden. Deshalb muß ich Ihnen mit großem Bedauern mitteilen, daß ich Ihnen nicht behilflich sein kann.

Man hat mir jedoch mitgeteilt, daß es keine Beweise gibt, die darauf hindeuten, daß die Beobachtungen, die man über Großbritannien gemacht hat, außerirdischen Ursprungs waren.

Ich wünsche Ihnen alles Gute für Ihre Studien und verbleibe

mit freundlichen Grüßen

Geheimnisvolle Stahlkuppel im ewigen Eis

Alle elektrischen Bordgeräte der Flugzeuge fielen aus — Amerikaner stehen vor einem Rätsel

Die in den fast ständig zugefrorenen Häfen Alaskas stationierten amerikanischen Marineaufklärungsflieger sind vom Kommando der Luftüberwachung in Alaska alarmiert worden. Seitdem kreuzen sie tausende Kilometer weit über den Nordpol, um an einem in ihrer Karte eingetragenen Punkt nach einer geheimnisvollen Stahlkuppel zu suchen. Ein strategischer Bomberverband auf Manöverflug hatte diese Kuppel vor einem Monat zum erstenmal 1000 Seemeilen nordöstlich der De-Long-Inseln im ewigen Eis gesichtet.

Der Pilot des damals im Probeeinsatz befindlichen Strahlentriebwerkbombers berichtet: „Der monotone Flug über die endlosen Flächen des ewigen Polareises wurde plötzlich unterbrochen. Ich wies meinen Bordfunker auf eine stählern glänzende Kuppel zwischen Eisbarrieren hin, die sich 3000 m unter uns türmten. Die Kuppel war blaugrau und drehte sich wie der gepanzerte Gefechtsturm einer Festung oder nach Art eines Radargerätes. Wir peilten das Ding an und funkten. Dabei gingen wir auf 800 m herunter. Da sahen wir deutlich wie die Kuppel sich auf einer Drehscheibe oder einer Riesenwelle bewegte. Plötzlich mußte man unsere Funksignale vernommen haben. Die Kuppel drehte sich nicht mehr und verschwand blitzschnell wie ein Fahrstuhl in der Tiefe. Darüber schoben sich waagrechte Schotten, auf die sich von der Umgebung nicht zu unterscheidendes Eis getürmt war."

Der Funker dieses Bombers berichtet, daß während des ganzen Anfluges auf die geheimnisvolle stählerne Kuppel im Nordpolareis sämtliche elektrischen Bordgeräte unmittelbar nach dem Funkanruf für Unbekannt ausfielen. Diese Beobachtung im ewigen Eis ist wahrscheinlich höchst sonderbar. Die Stellen des Aufklärungskommandos in Alaska fragen sich, ob es sich um einen vorgeschobenen Beobachtungs- und strategisch wichtigen Posten einer anderen Macht handelt? Das Eisgebiet, wo die Bomberbesatzungen die Wahrnehmung machten, ist umstritten. Die USA und die UdSSR beanspruchen es für sich. Es gilt als „Exklave des Geophysikalischen Jahres".

Besonders zu denken gibt der Ausfall aller elektrischen Bordgeräte. Sollte mit radiotechnischen Störmitteln, die sogar die Tourenanzeiger zittern ließen, etwa alle Positionsmessungen unmöglich gemacht werden? Seit der Meldung der Bomberbesatzung führten Aufklärer 19 Patrouillenflüge über dem mysteriösen Gebiet durch. Aber 1000 Seemeilen nordöstlich der De-Long-Inseln klart das Wetter nur selten auf. Dort unten zwischen Schneesturm und peitschendem Eissturm müßte die geheimnisvolle Stahlkuppel liegen.

Seitdem die Entdeckung gemacht worden ist, melden die verschiedensten Küstenstationen Alaskas Funksignale, die offenbar verschlüsselt sind und die aus besagter Gegend zu kommen scheinen. Flugzeuge, die die „Funkspur" aufnahmen, kamen bald in die Nähe der genau festgelegten Position. Immer wenn sie sich jedoch über mehr als 20 Meilen der „versenkbaren Station" nähern, schweigt der rhythmische Morsetakt. Das strategische Kommando Alaska nimmt an, daß es sich um eine geheim gehaltene Forschungsbasis einer unbekannten Macht handelt. Dort, im unzugänglichen Nordpolgebiet einen militärischen Stützpunkt zu unterhalten, wäre nach Meinung der Amerikaner unsinnig, es sei denn, andere hätten das Problem der Versorgung in der „Wildnis der Eisbarrieren" gelöst und wüßten, Fernraketen während der 333 Sturmtage im Jahr von dort auf die Reise zu schicken. Beobachtungsflieger der Luftwaffe und Marine hoffen, im Interesse der Sicherheit, schon recht bald das Rätsel des geheimnisvollen Punktes lösen zu können.

Die Streitkräfte Spaniens nehmen Berichte über Begegnungen mit Ufos ernst

Grüne Männchen in Spanien?

ROLF GÖRTZ, Madrid

„Doch alles Schwindel, die Geschichte mit den fliegenden Untertassen. Wir haben keine gesehen. Nicht Ufos haben unsere Maschine zur Landung gezwungen, sondern irgendein technisches Versagen." So wetterten 109 deutsche und österreichische Fluggäste des TAE-Charterfluges Frankfurt — Palma de Mallorca — Teneriffa. Ihre Caravelle war nicht auf den Kanarischen Inseln, sondern bei Valencia gelandet. Was die Passagiere bis dahin nicht wußten: die spanische Luftwaffe hatte zu ihrem Schutz vier Phantom-Jäger in den Nachthimmel geschickt. Ein Geschwader-Kommodore hatte die unbekannten Flugobjekte und den Hilferuf des TAE-Piloten Tejada ernst genommen.

Planmäßig war die Maschine des Charter-Unternehmens „Spanische Lufttransporte" (TAE) in Palma de Mallorca gestartet, mit Kurs auf die Kanarischen Inseln. Über Evisa entdeckte die Besatzung auf dem Radarschirm mehrere Signale, die sich „merkwürdig schnell näherten". Flugkapitän Tejada rief den Kontrollturm des Flughafens Valencia an: „Sind Flugzeuge auf unserer Route?" Antwort: „Nein, keine Meldungen." Dann sahen Tejada und der Kopilot „rote schillernde Lichter, die sich irgendwie verrückt bewegten" (Tejada).

Die Besatzung hatte das Gefühl, daß unbekannte Flugobjekte ihre Caravelle verfolgten. So bat Tejada den Kontrollturm von Los Manises bei Valencia um Landeerlaubnis. Gegen elf Uhr nachts rollte die Maschine dort aus. Kurz vorher brauste eine Staffel von vier Phantom-Jägern über den Platz — und die unbekannten Flugobjekte verschwanden wie auf Kommando.

Flugleiter des Kontrollturmes und Angestellte und Arbeiter auf der Piste bestätigten, was die Piloten gesehen hatten: ein rotes Licht, das sich über dem Kontrollturm aufhielt, ein zweites über der Piste, ein drittes über dem nahe gelegenen Militärflughafen. Alle in etwa dreitausend Meter Höhe. Ein viertes Licht kreiste in größerer Höhe über der gesamten Region.

Ohne sich über die Beschaffenheit der Lichterscheinungen zu äußern, nehmen die spanischen Luftwaffenoffiziere die Ufos ernst. Auch die Marine sammelt Beobachtungen. Der Journalist Benitez erhielt für seine Zusammenstellung mehrfach Berichte von Luftwaffe und Marine.

Aus diesen Berichten geht klar hervor, daß die spanischen Streitkräfte an der Existenz unbekannter Flugkörper nicht mehr zweifeln. Allerdings werden nirgendwo Flugobjekte von anderen Sternen, überirdische Wesen — gar die kleinen grünen Männchen — als Urheber dieser Erscheinungen erwähnt. Sorgfältig werden jedes Mal Marinemeteorologen eingesetzt, die ergründen sollen, ob irgendwelche meteorologischen Erscheinungen hinter den unbekannten Lichteffekten stecken könnten. Immerhin scheint sich das Interesse der Ufos auf strategische Punkte zu konzentrieren. Gibt es bemannte oder unbemannte Flugsonden, deren Existenz die Großmächte bisher verschweigen und die sich bereits gegenseitig beobachten, fragen sich denn auch die Skeptiker.

Auf ganz anderem Gleis reisen die fanatischen Storys über die kleinen grünen Männchen, die aus soeben gelandeten Apparaten klettern, spanisch sprechen und manchmal gar nicht klein und grün sind. Sie tauchen vor allem in jenen entlegenen regenfeuchten Dörfern des Baskenlandes auf, wo man früher sehr intensiv an Hexen glaubte. (SAD)

Geheimnisvolle Flugkörper über Argentinien

Glaubwürdige Augenzeugen — Brennstoffproben werden untersucht

Buenos Aires, (dpa) Argentinien soll in der letzten Zeit von einer Invasion fliegender Untertassen heimgesucht worden sein. Eine Reihe von vertrauenswürdigen Personen berichtete über „leuchtende Körper", die ein ungewöhnlich starkes Licht ausstrahlen. Übereinstimmende Aussagen liegen aus Mendoza, Corboda und Bahia Blanca in der Provinz Buenos Aires vor.

Die seltsamste Geschichte berichteten zwei Brüder. Sie fuhren in einem Lastwagen, als sie in hundert Metern Entfernung von der Straße auf dem Erdboden einen Gegenstand erblickten, der so ähnlich wie ein Eisenbahnwagen oder ein Omnibus aussah. Er hatte etwa 20 Öffnungen, aus denen abwechselnd starke Lichtstrahlen blitzartig hervorbrachen. Die beiden Brüder gingen auf den Gegenstand zu, der sich aber steil in die Luft erhob, als sie sich ihm auf etwa 70 Meter genähert hatten. Dabei zeigte es sich, daß es in Wirklichkeit zwei Fahrzeuge waren, die sich in der Luft von einander trennten und rasch davonschwebten. Später fanden die Brüder an der Landestelle des Flugkörpers Brandspuren am Boden. Die Erde war steinhart, das Gras niedergedrückt und Insekten versengt, außerdem fanden sie Spuren einer grauen Flüssigkeit, die wahrscheinlich vom Brennstoff des Fahrzeuges stammte. Erdproben und Proben der Flüssigkeit wurden von der Universität Bahia Blanca der Marinestation Puerto Belgrano und der argentinischen Atomkommission untersucht. Bisher wurde lediglich die Untersuchung der Bodenproben der Universität Bahia Blanca bekannt. Danach enthielt die Erde Spuren von Pottasche-Karbonat und Kalk, die sich in jener Gegend an keiner anderen Stelle fanden.

Unbekannte Flugkörper über Sydney

Rundfunk und Zeitungsredaktionen mit Anrufen überschwemmt

Mehrere hundert Menschen überhäuften am Wochenende in Sydney die Radiostationen und Zeitungsredaktionen mit Telefonanrufen, nachdem über Neusüdwales eine Formation heller, sich schnell bewegender Flugobjekte gesichtet worden war. Von der australischen Luftwaffe wurde dazu mitgeteilt, daß in dieser Zeit keine Flugzeuge in Formation über Neusüdwales aufgestiegen seien.

Mister Richardson aus Leppington schildert seine Beobachtung mit den Worten: „Es war eine unheimliche Erscheinung. Kein Geräusch, nur eine ständige Bewegung von acht Lichtern in geschlossener Formation. Sie waren zu schnell für Flugzeuge und zu langsam für einen Meteor."

In Washington hat die Luftwaffe der Vereinigten Staaten mitgeteilt, daß 363mal in der Zeit von 1947 bis 1965 nicht identifizierte Flugobjekte gesichtet worden seien. Es sei aber kein Anhaltspunkt dafür gegeben, daß die Flugkörper nicht von der Erde stammen. Der Luftwaffe seien in diesem Zeitraum 8908 Berichte über „Fliegende Untertassen" und andere Flugobjekte bekannt geworden.

Fliegende Untertassen über Rom

Rom, (upi) Mindestens ein Dutzend Menschen berichteten gestern, eine fliegende Untertasse über Rom gesichtet zu haben. Obwohl die Personen die Erscheinung an verschiedenen Stellen der Stadt und in den Albaner Bergen beobachteten, gaben sie eine im wesentlichen übereinstimmende Schilderung des unbekannten Flugobjekts. Die Luftfahrtbehörden von Rom teilten jedoch mit, daß die verschiedenen Piloten, die zu der Zeit der Erscheinung über Rom flogen, die Untertasse nicht gesehen haben. Auch auf den Radarschirmen konnte der Flugkörper nicht ausgemacht werden.

Flugkapitän berichtet über neueste UFO-Sichtungen

Flugkapitän Denis Wood von „British Airways" hat Zeugen und kann den offiziellen Auftrag zur UFO-Verfolgung vorweisen. Somit ist er erhaben über Zweifel, an dem, was er im Sommer 1976 beim Flug von London nach Faro in Südportugal beobachtete. „Ich sichtete mit der gesamten Crew meines Flugzeuges zwei zigarrenförmige Flugobjekte (UFOs), die die Größe je eines Schlachtschiffes besaßen. Ich habe mir mehrere Monate zum Überdenken auserbeten, aber nun muß ich doch bekennen, daß wir alle uns entschlossen haben, zu diesen UFO-Sichtungen zu stehen, wenn wir diese riesigen Flugkörper auch nicht erklären können. Vielleicht war es ein Materialisierungs-Phänomen, mit dem unsere Wissenschaftler noch nichts anzufangen wissen. Ich frage mich seitdem nun aber täglich, welche Mächte es sind, die sich auf diese Weise in unserem Luftraum bewegen und was sie eigentlich vorhaben..."

Flugkapitän Denis Wood hat 20 Jahre Flugerfahrung. Und er hatte die UFOs nicht etwa selbst entdeckt und gemeldet. Vielmehr war seine Crew von der Flugkontrolle Lissabon aufgefordert worden, auf ein unbekanntes Flugobjekt zu achten. „Und dann tauchten die weiß leuchtenden Dinger schon vor meinen Augen auf. Unglaublich, rief mein Co-Pilot im gleichen Augenblick aus. Ihm blieb 20 Sekunden der Mund offenstehen. Das ist eine lange Zeit. Es sah aus, als handele es sich um ein großes Mutterschiff, aus dem zwei zigarrenförmige Gebilde zur Erkundung starteten."

Unabhängig voneinander sagen Besatzungsmitglieder und Fluggäste aus, es habe sich um vollkommen feste Körper von der Größe von Schlachtschiffen gehandelt. „Ich verstehe nicht, daß man beim Vorhandensein mehrerer Augenzeugen und aufgrund des Auftrags zur Verfolgung durch den Kontrollturm von Lissabon immer wieder versucht, uns einzureden, es habe sich wohl um Satelliten, Ballons, seltsame Wolken oder Lichtreflexionen gehandelt. Schließlich können wir nicht dafür, daß die Forschung im dunkeln tappt und Wissenschaftler keine Erklärung finden. Mein Co-Pilot meint, diese Flugobjekte hätten vor der Materialisierung offensichtlich die Zeitwand durchstoßen und seien dadurch erst in unser Wahrnehmungsvermögen gelangt..."

Die Objekte waren auch auf dem Radar sichtbar. Sie wurden sogar von einer anderen britischen und einer portugiesischen Maschine gesichtet und gemeldet. Als Kapitän Wood von Faro zurückflog, waren die zigarrenförmigen Luftobjekte immer noch da, in deren Mitte sich nach Fernglasbeobachtungen ein „Zentrum metallenen Glänzens" ausmachen ließ.

Kapitän: Objekte auch auf dem Radar

London. (dpa) Die Besatzung einer Maschine der „British Airways" hat zwei zigarrenförmige Flugobjekte (Ufos) gesichtet, die die Größe von Schlachtschiffen besaßen.

Dies wurde am Freitag in London durch Aussagen des Flugkapitäns Denis Wood, der 20 Jahre Flugerfahrung hat, und seiner Crew bekannt. Sie hatten die unbekannten Objekte im Sommer letzten Jahres beim Flug von London nach Faro in Südportugal beobachtet.

Die britische Maschine war von der Flugkontrolle Lissabon aufgefordert worden, auf ein unbekanntes Flugobjekt zu achten. Kurz darauf sahen Kapitän Wood und seine beiden Offiziere im Westen ein weißleuchtendes rundes Objekt. Während sie es noch beobachteten, materialisierten sich in der Nähe dieses Objekts zwei riesige zigarrenförmige Gebilde. „Sie waren absolut solide und schätzungsweise von der Größe von Schlachtschiffen", erklärte Kapitän Wood. „Vermutungen, daß es sich um Ballons, Satelliten, seltsame Wolken oder Lichtreflektionen handelte, sind für uns ganz unakzeptabel."

Die Objekte waren auch auf dem Radar sichtbar und wurden auch von den Besatzungen einer anderen britischen sowie eines portugiesischen Flugzeuges gesichtet und gemeldet. Als Kapitän Wood von Faro nach London zurückflog, waren die beiden „Zigarrenschiffe immer noch da. Dann jedoch verschwanden sie vom Radarschirm".

Die "New York Times", das wohl größte und führendste alliierte Publikationsorgan mit erheblichem meinungsbildenden Multiplikatoreffekt, mit Auswirkungen auf fast alle Medien "demokratischer" Staaten in Ost und West, kam in vergangenen Jahrzehnten nicht umhin, Meldungen über Unbekannte Flugobjekte zu veröffentlichen.

Ein von Jahrzehnt zu Jahrzehnt immer stärker unter den Nägeln brennendes Problem, das schon lange nicht mehr völlig verheimlicht, wohl aber entschärft, entstellt, lächerlich gemacht und weggedeutet werden kann.

Die N.Y.T. und mit ihr andere führende Journaillen der internationalen linksgerichteten "Einweltler" haben hier ganze Arbeit geleistet. Die jeweils kleineren Zeitungen, haben sich gemäß ihren großen Vorbildern im Stil, in der Meinungsausrichtung und Argumentation bestens angeglichen.

In den Jahren 1946-1981 sind in der N.Y.T. trotz Vertuschung und Tiefstapelei über 300 Zeitungsberichte zum Thema "UFO" erschienen.
Den jährlichen "The New York Times Index"-Bänden sind die Anzahl der Artikel entnommen und hier tabellarisch wiedergegeben. 1946 unter dem Stichwort: "Rockets" (Ghost Rockets), 1947-57 unter "Flying Saucers" und 1958-1981 unter dem Stichwort: "Unidentified Flying Objekts (UFO)".

Die OSI, eine Neben- bzw. Unterorganisation des US-Geheimdienstes CIA, hat schon im Jahre 1952 - wohl nach vorherigem Auftragn 'von oben' - auf wissenschaftlicher Grundlage, Vorschläge erarbeitet, wie das Phänomen der 'Fliegenden Untertassen' am zweckmäßigsten zu behandeln sei. Gemäß dem vorliegendem Auszug: zum einen in militärischer Hinsicht, zum anderen bezüglich der anzuwendenden Informations-Taktik in der Öffentlichkeit.
Ob das gesamte 'Memorandum' nach dieser 25-jährigen Geheimhaltung freigegeben wurde oder nur dieser Auszug, und somit der restliche Teil immer noch geheim behandelt wird, konnte augenblicklich noch nicht festgestellt werden.

Köln: 2 Phantomjets jagten Ufo

Von W. SCHLAGEHAN und B. VOGT

Polizei-Hauptmeister Rolf Behrmann (41) hatte das „Objekt" schon zweimal gesehen: Es schillerte farbenprächtig, stand über Köln, zog dann davon. Zwei Phantoauf. Weiter Seite 6.

Ufo drehte immer nach rechts

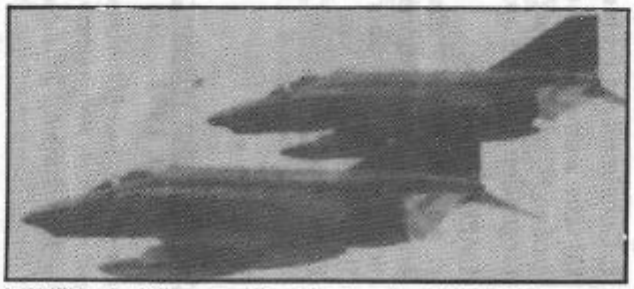
Fortsetzung von Seite 1

Polizei-Hauptmeister Behrmann und Kollege Uwe Capitanio (27) sahen das Ufo zum erstenmal am Freitagmorgen um 1.55 Uhr über Köln. Es war rund, drehte sich immer nach rechts, war etwa doppelt so groß wie ein Stern. Mal glitzerte es dunkelrot, mal gleißend weiß, dann wieder blau, auch mal grün. Ganz langsam zog es in Richtung Süden, stoppte dann, flog wieder nach Norden.

Um 2.27 Uhr dann ein Funkspruch an alle Autobahn-Wachen: „Das unbekannte Flugobjekt ist auf dem Radar in Düsseldorf gesichtet worden." Polizei-Hauptmeister Behrmann: „Kurze Zeit später sahen wir dann zwei Phantom-Düsenjäger, die im Morgengrauen den Himmel absuchten."

Um 5.20 Uhr war das Ufo verschwunden – und kehrte am Samstagmorgen pünktlich um 1.55 Uhr zurück. Behrmann: „Wir hatten schon drauf gewartet. Wieder das gleiche Schauspiel."

Ob das Ufo auch gestern nacht erschienen ist, weiß man nicht – der Himmel war wolkenverhangen.



In 11 Kilometer Höhe zogen diese Phantoms über Köln Schleifen, suchten das Ufo. Die Jagdbomber können bis zu 7,2 Tonnen Raketen und Bomben tragen.

Vier fliegende Untertassen wurden über der nordamerikanischen Stadt Salem fotografiert

Westliche Reporter und sowjetische Wissenschaftler berichten über eine unheimliche Begegnung:

„Goldene Todesstrahlen! UFO griff russische Stadt an"

f. h. Petrosawodsk, 15. April

„Ein geheimnisvolles Flugobjekt beschoß die Stadt mit Todesstrahlen. Die goldfarbenen Strahlenbündel schnitten Löcher in die Straßen und Fenster. Sie versetzten die 185 000 Einwohner der nordrussischen Stadt Petrosawodsk in Angst und Schrecken."

Diesen sensationellen Bericht veröffentlichten zwei namhafte Reporter in Amerika, nachdem sie in Moskau mit Weltraum-Experten und Mitgliedern der Akademie der Wissenschaften gesprochen hatten.

Eine riesige Muschel

Über den mysteriösen Zwischenfall, der lange geheimgehalten wurde, erfuhren die Journalisten diese Einzelheiten: „Wie eine riesige Muschel, aber größer als ein Fußballfeld, stach das Ufo erstmals am 20. September, vier Uhr nachmittags, aus den Wolken über dem Onega-See. Zwölf Minuten schwebte es regungslos über dem Hafen. Plötzlich schossen Strahlenbündel zur Erde."

Der Korrespondent der amtlichen sowjetischen Nachrichtenagentur TASS, Nicolai Milow, interviewte Hunderte von Einwohnern in Petrosawodsk und bestätigte: „Das Loch, das die Strahlen in eine Fensterscheibe brannten, war etwas größer als ein Hühnerei. Das herausgeschnittene Stück war wie mit einem Diamanten herausgelöst. Es wurde zur Untersuchung nach Moskau geschickt."

„Das ist das Ende"

Im Hafen erzählten Arbeiter dem Reporter, sie seien beim Anblick des Ufos weggelaufen und hätten geschrien: „Das ist das Ende!" Der Wagen eines Arztes soll während des Ufo-Angriffs aus unerklärlichen Gründen außer Kontrolle geraten sein.

Memorandum für US-Präsident Franklin D. Roosevelt, vom 26. Febr. 1942, von Stabchef, General George C. Marshall bezüglich des Luftalarms und der feindlichen Flugobjekte über Los Angeles, Kalifornien. Das Memorandum, mit zwei SEKRET-Stempeln versehen, unterlag der 30-jährigen Geheimhaltung. Freigabestempel 3. Mai 1972. Kopie des Originals aus dem Militär-Archiv. MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT:

The following is the information we have from GHQ at this moment regarding the air alarm over Los Angeles of yesterday morning:

"From details available at this hour:

"1. Unidentified airplanes, other than American Army or Navy planes, were probably over Los Angeles, and were fired on by elements of the 37th CA Brigade (AA) between 3:12 and 4:15 AM. These units expended 1430 rounds of ammunition.

"2. As many as fifteen airplanes may have been involved, flying at various speeds from what is officially reported as being 'very slow' to as much as 200 MPH and at elevations from 9000 to 18000 feet.

"3. No bombs were dropped.

"4. No casualties among our troops.

"5. No planes were shot down.

"6. No American Army or Navy planes were in action.

"Investigation continuing. It seems reasonable to conclude that if unidentified airplanes were involved they may have been from commercial sources, operated by enemy agents for purposes of spreading alarm, disclosing location of antiaircraft positions, and slowing production through blackout. Such conclusion is supported by varying speed of operation and the fact that no bombs were dropped."

Ein kugelartiges Mittelstück nimmt die Besatzung auf, ein auftriebfördernder flacher Ring ist zentrisch um das Mittelstück angeordnet, der am Außenrand viele in ihrer Wirkungsrichtung verstellbare Düsen aufweist. Durchmesser des Flugkörpers 44 m. Kann unkonventionelle Flugbewegungen auf der- und Hochachse ausführen; soll 1944 bereits 2000 km/h und 12 000 m Höhe in wenigen Minuten erreicht haben. Ähnliche französische Konstruktion wurde nach dem Kriege bekannt. Die deutschen Entwicklungen gingen wahrscheinlich vorwiegend in russische und amerikanische Hände über. Abb. > Ufo.

A.A. GUNS IN ACTION AT LOS ANGELES

A FALSE ALARM

NEW YORK, Feb. 25

Anti-aircraft batteries went into action over Los Angeles last night for the first time since the war began. The first alert was sounded at 2.25 a.m. (Pacific time). Almost immediately anti-aircraft fire began, and about 30 searchlights roved over the sky, concentrating in a few minutes on a vague object high in the air. Meanwhile the city and all the surrounding country went into a black-out. The firing of guns ceased at 3.30 a.m. At 4 a.m. it was resumed for a time. The "all clear" was not sounded until 7.19 a.m.

This afternoon Colonel Knox, Secretary to the Navy, said it was "just a false alarm"; there were no aeroplanes over Los Angeles.

During the alarm the police arrested three Japanese suspected of sending flashlight signals.

SUPREME HEADQUARTERS, Dec. 13 (Reuter)—The Germans have produced a "secret" weapon in keeping with the Christmas season.

The new device, apparently an air defense weapon, resembles the huge glass balls that adorn Christmas trees.

There was no information available as to what holds them up like stars in the sky, what is in them, or what their purpose is supposed to be.

Die verschiedensten Formen solcher Flugscheiben-Formationsflüge wurden in den letzten Jahrzehnten beobachtet und auch fotografiert.

Am 25. August 1951 plauderten Dr. Robinson, Geologie-Professor an der Universität von Texas, Dr. Oberg, Chemieprofessor, und Prof. Ducker, Spezialist in Ölfragen, auf der Terrasse eines Hauses in Lubbock. Plötzlich sahen sie 20 leuchtende Lichter in V-Formation mit unglaublicher Schnelligkeit geräuschlos von einem Ende des Horizonts zum anderen ziehen. Das Ganze dauerte nur Sekunden. Und während sie noch lebhaft diskutierten, flog eine zweite Formation vorbei. Zwölf ähnliche Gruppen beobachtete Prof. Ducker vom August bis November vorigen Jahres. Hunderte von Menschen sahen sie mit ihm. Ein Student, Carl Hart, filmte sie. Fünf Bilder zeigen 18 bis 20 leuchtende ›Dinge‹, heller als die Venus. Die US-Luftwaffe untersuchte die Bilder. Es ist kein Schwindel, sagte sie. Es waren auch keine Düsenflugzeuge. In jener fraglichen Zeit überflog kein Flugzeug jenes Gebiet. Was war es also? (27)

KOREA "FLYING SAUCERS" REPORT

FLASHES OF BLUE LIGHT

WASHINGTON, FEB. 19

The Department of the Air Force stated to-day that an investigation has been ordered into reports from several members of the crews of two United States bombers that they saw objects resembling "flying saucers" while on missions over Korea. This is the first time for several months that such objects have been prominently in the news, the Air Force having earlier discounted reports of similar phenomena said to have been seen in the United States.

The objects reported over Korea are described as globe shaped, bright orange in colour, and emitting occasional flashes of bluish light.

Geschäftsfahrt eines kalifornischen Händlers — US-Luftwaffe alarmiert

Washington (UP). Das Radarnetz der amerikanischen Luftwaffe ist in Alarmbereitschaft versetzt worden, um auf sogenannte „nicht identifizierte Flugkörper" zu achten. Bisher wurden aber keine derartigen Gegenstände registriert, teilte ein Sprecher mit. Inzwischen gehen bei amerikanischen Dienststellen immer neue Berichte ein, in denen von der Beobachtung unbekannter Flugkörper, die meist wie Zeppeline ausgesehen haben sollen, die Rede ist.

Einem kalifornischen Getreidehändler namens Reinhold Schmidt ist, wie er erzählt, der Vorzug zuteil geworden, ein derartiges Raumschiff betreten zu dürfen und mit seinen Insassen gesprochen zu haben. Auf einer Geschäftsfahrt stieß Schmidt nach seinem Bericht auf ein silbern glänzendes Ding, das wie eines der kleinen Luftschiffe der US-Kriegsmarine aussah. Es sei über dreißig Meter lang, zehn Meter dick und etwa fünf Meter hoch gewesen. Als er noch 20 Meter von dem „Raumschiff" entfernt gewesen sei, habe sein Wagen den Dienst versagt.

Schmidt sagte, er sei aus seinem Wagen gestiegen und auf das Ding zugegangen, das da auf vier Pfählen ruhte. Dann wurde eine Treppe ausgefahren. Zwei Männer seien erschienen und hätten ihn angeleuchtet. Für eine Sekunde habe er sich nicht rühren können. Dann sprachen die beiden Männer, erzählte Schmidt. Anstelle der Marssprache, die er erwartet haben mochte, will er aber Deutsch und Englisch mit deutschem Akzent vernommen haben.

„Wir haben hier eine kleine Weile zu tun — warum wollen Sie nicht hereinkommen?", fragten die „Raumfahrer" nach Schmidts Angaben. Er sei der Einladung gefolgt und habe im Innern des Flugkörpers noch zwei Männer und zwei Frauen vorgefunden. Er sei durchsucht worden und nach 20 Minuten angeregter Unterhaltung habe er die Flugmaschine verlassen, die dann lautlos aufgestiegen sei. „Sie werden später erfahren, was wir hier tun", hätten die Besatzungsmitglieder noch zu ihm gesagt.

Nach den Polizisten, Soldaten und Autofahrern, die bereits vor Tagen mysteriöse Flugkörper gesehen haben wollen, hat sich jetzt ein Radio-Ingenieur gemeldet, der in der Nähe des amerikanischen Raketenversuchsgeländes in New Mexico ein eiförmiges Flugobjekt gesehen haben will.

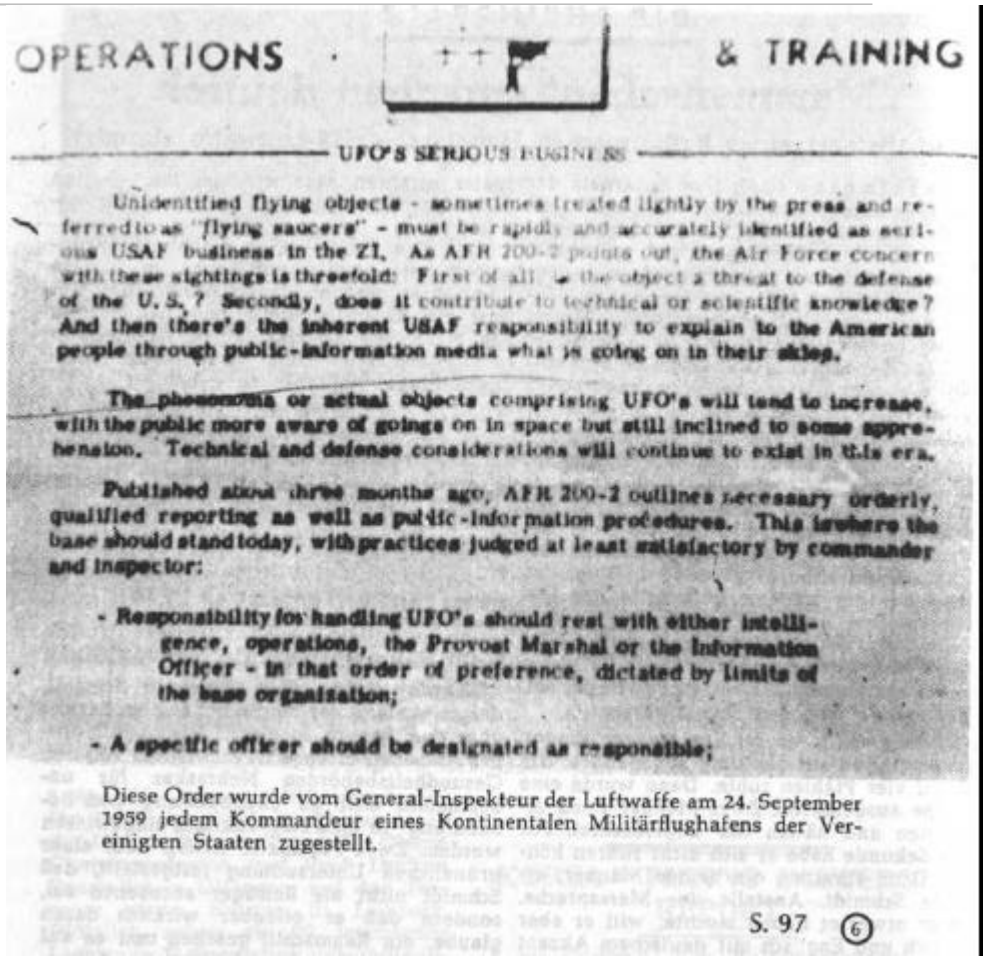
Vom Raumschiff in die Nervenklinik

Kearney (USA), (UP). Reinhold Schmidt, der am Anfang der Woche mit seinem Bericht über den Besuch in einem Raumschiff großes Aufsehen erregte, ist inzwischen von den Gesundheitsbehörden Nebraskas für unbestimmte Zeit zu „Beobachtung und Behandlung" in eine Nervenklinik eingewiesen worden. Zwei Psychiater hatten nach einer gründlichen Untersuchung festgestellt, daß Schmidt nicht als Betrüger anzusehen sei, sondern daß er offenbar wirklich daran glaube, ein Raumschiff gesehen und es auf Einladung der Besatzung besichtigt zu haben.



OPERATIONS & TRAINING

UFO'S SERIOUS BUSINESS

Unidentified flying objects - sometimes treated lightly by the press and referred to as "flying saucers" - must be rapidly and accurately identified as serious USAF business in the ZI. As AFR 200-2 points out, the Air Force concern with these sightings is threefold: First of all, is the object a threat to the defense of the U. S.? Secondly, does it contribute to technical or scientific knowledge? And then there's the inherent USAF responsibility to explain to the American people through public-information media what is going on in their skies.

The phenomena or actual objects comprising UFO's will tend to increase, with the public more aware of goings on in space but still inclined to some apprehension. Technical and defense considerations will continue to exist in this era.

Published about three months ago, AFR 200-2 outlines necessary orderly, qualified reporting as well as public-information procedures. This is where the base should stand today, with practices judged at least satisfactory by commander and inspector:

- Responsibility for handling UFO's should rest with either intelligence, operations, the Provost Marshal or the Information Officer - in that order of preference, dictated by limits of the base organization;

- A specific officer should be designated as responsible;

Diese Order wurde vom General-Inspekteur der Luftwaffe am 24. September 1959 jedem Kommandeur eines Kontinentalen Militärflughafens der Vereinigten Staaten zugestellt.

Polizist fotografierte unbekanntes Flugobjekt

Amerikanischer Kongreß soll Untersuchung einleiten

Bad Axe/Michigan. (ap) Scharen von unbekannten Flugobjekten müssen den amerikanischen Staat Michigan überquert haben. Einem Luftwaffenstützpunkt bei Detroit wurden Sichtungen aus fünf verschiedenen Landesteilen gemeldet. Beim Sheriff des Kreises Hillsdale liefen so viele Beobachtungsmeldungen ein, daß es nicht mehr gelang, darüber Protokoll zu führen.

Überall wurden die Beobachtungen von Streifenpolizisten bestätigt. „Sie können nicht alle Vorstellungen haben", meinte ein höherer Polizeioffizier. Übereinstimmend wurde berichtet, daß die Objekte blau leuchteten und sich auf und nieder bewegten. Ein Beamter will ein Objekt von schätzungsweise zwei Meter Durchmesser in etwa 60 Meter Höhe über den Baumwipfeln beobachtet haben. Es habe sehr helle rote, blaue und weiße Lichter gehabt und sich entfernt, als er sich genähert habe.

Der republikanische Fraktionsführer im Repräsentantenhaus, Gerald R. Ford, forderte im Fernsehen von Washington aus eine Kongreßuntersuchung der Angelegenheit. Viele zuverlässige Bewohner des Staates Michigan hielten es für angebracht, daß die Regierung etwas unternehme und ihnen nicht nur eine ausweichende Antwort gegeben werde wie von der Luftwaffe, die die Erscheinungen als Sumpfgas abgetan hatte.

Selbst in der unmittelbaren Nähe des Luftwaffenamtes für die Untersuchung unbekannter Flugobjekte, bei Dayton, wurde ein solches Objekt von einem Polizisten gesichtet. Der Beamte berichtete, daß er das Objekt fotografiert habe. Der Film soll von der Luftwaffe ausgewertet werden. Der Flughafen von Toledo erhielt ebenfalls mehrere Sichtungsmeldungen. Ein Beobachter auf dem Flugplatz erklärte jedoch, er habe weder mit bloßem Auge noch auf dem Radarschirm irgendetwas wahrgenommen.

Rätsel um „fliegende Untertassen"

Jugoslawische Experten bemühen sich um Identifizierung seltsamer Objekte

BELGRAD (dpa). Jugoslawische Experten bemühen sich gegenwärtig, das Rätsel um die in verschiedenen Teilen Jugoslawiens gesichteten angeblichen „fliegenden Untertassen" zu lösen.

Mehrere Bauern hatten nach ihren Aussagen einen unbekannten Flugkörper über dem Berg Komovi in Montenegro beobachtet. Er sei so niedrig geflogen, berichteten sie, daß die Abgasflammen Wälder in Brand gesetzt hätten. Tatsache ist, daß die Wälder in Flammen standen und der Brand erst nach 24 Stunden eingedämmt werden konnte. Bewohner der Stadt Ivangrad, ebenfalls in Montenegro, wollen mehrere unbekannte Flugobjekte gesehen haben, die sich in symmetrischen Kreisen bewegten, ihre Höhe änderten und schließlich rasch davonflogen. In der ostserbischen Kleinstadt Golubac behaupteten mehrere Bewohner, sie hätten einen „Himmelskörper" beobachtet, der eine erheblich größere Geschwindigkeit als Düsenflugzeuge gehabt habe.

Rund 100 Einwohner von Pristina, der Hauptstadt der autonomen Provinz Kosmet, berichteten, sie hätten einen sternähnlichen Flugkörper von ungewöhnlicher Helligkeit gesehen. Verglichen mit einer zum selben Zeitpunkt sichtbaren Düsenmaschine sei er „in großer Höhe" und mit viel höherer Geschwindigkeit geflogen. Dutzende von Menschen hatten in den letzten Tagen „fliegende Untertassen" auch über Zagreb, Belgrad und anderen Gebieten des Landes gesehen. Am Dienstag hatte bereits in Sofia ein unbekannter Flugkörper Aufsehen erregt, der grell leuchtete und mit bloßem Auge über der Innenstadt sichtbar war.

„Ufos nur Luftströmungen“

Sowjetforscher weist ausserirdischen Ursprung zurück

Sowjetische Wissenschaftler wollen jetzt eine natürliche, in ihren Einzelheiten allerdings noch rätselhafte Erklärung für unidentifizierte Flugobjekte (Ufos) gefunden haben. Scheibenförmige Strömungen in der Atmosphäre, die im Augenblick der Verwirbelung mit Staub für kurze Zeit sichtbar werden. Professor Grigory Barenblatt vom russischen Institut für Ozeanographie erklärte dazu, daß innerhalb dieser Strömungsscheibe unabhängige Luftstrudel mit hoher Geschwindigkeit zirkulierten – vergleichbar mit einem in den Meeren beobachteten Phänomen. Aber, so fügte er hinzu: „Die Ursache dieser turbulenten Vorgänge ist bisher ein Rätsel geblieben.

Begonnen hatte die Geschichte der Ufos vor nunmehr 35 Jahren am 24. Juni 1947 mit dem Privatflieger Ken Arnold, der behauptete, in den USA über dem Mount Rainier neun riesige glühende Scheiben von Untertassenform gesehen zu haben. Seitdem sind Zehntausende von Ufo-Meldungen um die Welt gegangen. Bei exakter Nachprüfung hatten sich durchaus irdische Erklärungen gefunden: fliegende Wetterballone, Flugzeuge und Wolkenfetzen im Schein der bereits untergegangenen Sonne, Reflektion von Schiffs-, Auto- und Flugzeugscheinwerfern an Dunst- und Wolken-Schichten, auch elektrische Entladungen.

Eine Zunahme der Staubteilchen kann nach dieser Darstellung den ganzen Strudelmech-

anismus mit einem Schlag beenden und die Scheibe abkippen lassen. „Damit brauchen wir uns auch nicht mehr länger um eine Interpretation für das urplötzliche Verschwinden der Ufos zu bemühen, denen ja die Fähigkeit zur unmittelbaren Beschleunigung auf Lichtgeschwindigkeit (300 000 km/h) nachgerühmt wird.“

Die amerikansiche Luftwaffe hatte für das Verteigungsministerium in Washinton bis Ende der sechziner Jahre 12 618 rätselhafte optische Phänomene untersucht. Der Verdacht, daß einige dieser Erscheinungen außerirdische Flugobjekte gewesen sein könnten, ließ sich nie bestätigen. 701 Objekte aus dieser Untersuchungsreihe galten allerdings auch nach deren Abschluß als nicht identifiziert. Sinnestäuschungen und keine Gefahr für die nationale Sicherheit – so lautete damals das allgemeine Fazit.

Unter dem Hinweis auf dieses Ergebnis lehnte die amerikanische Weltraumbehörde (Nasa) vor viereinhalb Jahren auch eine Aufforderung des damaligen US-Präsidenten Jimmy Carter zu einer neuen Untersuchung ab. Carter selbst hatte noch als Gouverneur von Georgia berichtet, er habe einmal ein Ufo gesehen.

Preface

"The Fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."
-Proverbs 9:10

Some scholars who spend time in a study of the occult may come away from their research struck by the delusion that diabolical forces have become more powerful than God.

The fact is, God permits evil as a punishment for transgression against His Laws and Statutes. If the demonic seems to have ever greater energy in our time, it is only because we live in an era more ignorant and arrogant than any other in history.

Our people are drowning in the fraud dispensed by the public schools, the corporate media, socialistic bureaucrats and phony churchmen. We are inundated by military madness, violent crime, birth control, abortion, feminist careerism and the erosion of the Patriarchal headship principle of the Bible; the abandonment of elderly parents, the destruction of the innocence of children by constant exposure to televised misery and degradation; the deliberate falsification of the teachings of Christ by pastors who seek to avoid the persecution His servants must face (John 15:20), and who thereby suppress those New Testament truths which the rulers and powers of this world find offensive.

Millions of men and women who, just twenty years ago, were decent, caring, family and community-oriented Christian people, are now alchemically transformed into beasts who care for nothing but money and television.

We modern people are incurring the wrath of God. The cup of that wrath is filling up. God's vengeance and punishment will make any Satanic terror or supposed "power," seem like a farce staged in a playpen, by comparison. AIDS and other unimaginably potent plagues are multiplying. The weather is becoming hostile. Even the sky is shedding its protective canopy of ozone. Scripture says the fear of the Lord, not the fear of the devil, is the beginning of wisdom.

There is hope, however. Our nation, so polluted and sick, can be renewed and purified: "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves and pray and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin and will heal their land." (2nd Chronicles 7:14).

For true Christians, the victory is already won, a victory that was designed from the beginning of time: "Come ye blessed of my father, possess you the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." (Matthew 25:34).

The key to partaking of the victory, is the grace of God by faith in Jesus Christ and the living of that faith as Christian separatists:

"Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing and I will receive you." (2nd Corinthians 6:17).

Nature Or Gnosis?

Divine Creation and Its Counterfeit

A description of Anthony Shaeffer's protagonist in the film The Wicker Man: "...tearing around in dizzying circles trying to 'solve' it, never able to guess the true plot beyond it although the evidence of it lies all around him." --Cinefantastique.

"Almost all people of all eras are hypnotics. Their beliefs are induced beliefs. The proper authorities saw to it that the proper belief should be induced, and people believed properly."--Charles Hoy Fort

"As the mountebank delivered his harangue, the clown would repeatedly poke his head out from behind the curtain, making fun of everything his master said, parodying his patter and twisting the meaning of his words. The mountebank played the perfect straight man, meanwhile. Here he was, trying so hard to hawk his wares, and his own assistant was doing everything possible to undermine sales.

"The merriment was of course intentional. While the clown seemingly encouraged the public not to buy the proffered merchandise, the mountebank knew full well that the bystanders would easily be converted into customers as soon as they forgot that they were, in fact, supposed to be buying. Once the audience had been effectively hypnotized, once its judgment and willpower had been weakened, the real sales pitch could begin..." -- J.H. Towsen, Clowns.

"Hoodwink: A symbol of the secrecy, silence and darkness in which the mysteries of our art should be preserved from the unhallowed gaze of the profane." -Dr. Albert Mackey, 33rd Degree Freemason, The Encyclopedia of Freemasonry.

In a study of mind control and psychological warfare, it is not enough to simply review the latest technology of coercion, the most recent gadgetry and techno-junk littering the hardware and supply depots of governments and cults.

Far more dangerous than these appliances is the praxis behind them, the underground current which informs the modern project and this modern era. For life in our modern era is little more than life in an open-air mind control laboratory where a form of human alchemy has emerged to transform the mass of targeted percipients--targeted merely by virtue of their being urban dwellers plugged into the electronic and digital pageantry of the Establishment's system-of-things.

And what sort of creature inhabits the modern domain? Who is the modern man? The puppet-masters say he is the smartest, most advanced individual to ever strut the planet, the most relatively liberated being in history. But Louis-Ferdinand Celine said it well, "What does the modern public want? It wants to go down on its knees before money and before crap!"

The public have been trained to do this by two principle methods: direct "speaking" archetypal messages of pure terror ("psychic driving" as the CIA's Dr. Ewan Cameron termed it), encoded in massively publicized "lone nut" mass murders, and the sinister flattery heaped upon them by their masters in the cult of civilization and progress.

The acid test of a human being's freedom and will to protect the quality of his life, lies in a person's attitude toward his oppressor. What is modern man's attitude toward Wall Street and the bankers, toward Dan Rather and the ignorance-bestowing media and advertising man, toward Lincoln and Truman, FDR and Reagan, George Bush and Johnny Carson, Exxon and Monsanto?

As one writer has observed, "The most amazing thing about the American people is that they are constantly defending their worst betrayers." Who then is the modern man? He is a mind-bombed patsy who gets his marching orders from "twilight language" key words sprinkled throughout "his" news and current events. Even as he dances to the tune of the elite managers of human behavior, he scoffs with great derision at the idea of the existence and operation of a technology of mass mind control emanating from the media and government. Modern man is much too smart to believe anything as superstitious as that!

Modern man is the ideal hypnotic subject: puffed up on the idea that he is the crown of creation, he vehemently denies the power of the hypnotist's control over him, even as his head bobs up and down on a string.

What we observe in the population today are the three destructive symptoms of persons whose minds are controlled by alien forces: 1. Amnesia, i.e. loss of memory. 2. Abulia, i.e. loss of will. 3. Apathy, i.e. loss of interest in events vital to one's own health and survival. Amnesia, abulia and apathy are nearly-universal among us today and gaining a greater foothold with each passing day.

Japanese philosopher George Ohsawa stated that there was only one incurable sickness--arrogance. If a patient does not regard himself as sick he cannot submit to a cure. The arrogant man does not need to see--he already sees almost everything and what he thinks he has yet to learn, he believes "the experts" will one day show him. Who are these "experts"? They are not really doctors of the soul. They do not have the man's interest at heart. They are in fact his worst enemies, his most cunning manipulators who lead him to do their bidding like any slavemaster since Egypt.

Flattery: The First Principle of Mind Control

Why then does he revere them? Because they flatter him. This is the first secret of mass mind control and can be observed as the foundation stone of virtually every false religion, party, cult, philosophy, system and training. How can modern man free himself when he is told that he is already a demi-god, that the problem lies only in finding a pure enough economic or political system worthy of his high-minded brilliance?

If we look closely we will see that this mind control principle is so basic and simple it is almost stupidly so, to the point that we marvel that anyone would be seduced by it. But it is all a matter of attention, as we saw in the parable of the mountebank and the clown. Arrogant hypno-patsies have been told by their masters that they are "Demi-gods" and demi-gods are never deceived or distracted. They're too smart! And by their arrogant self-satisfaction they blind themselves to the simplicity of the device that ensnares them and that is when "the real sales pitch begins."

What the Alchemical managers have bred over a millennia is a human race of the most wretched stupidity and ignorance unrivaled in thousands of years. These blind slaves are told they are "free" and "highly educated" even as they march behind signs that would cause any medieval peasant to run screaming away from them in panic-stricken terror. The symbols that modern man embraces with the naive trust of an infant would be tantamount to billboards reading, "This way to your death and enslavement," to the understanding of a traditional peasant of antiquity.

I doubt any medieval man would have much difficulty in feeling a sense of overwhelming foreboding in the face of the Soviet hammer and sickle symbol. Yet most modern, literate people obviously don't know a thing about what that symbol actually represents except on the most profane level as the implements of the farmer and the worker.

Satan is the Ape of God

The sickle symbolizes Saturn, also known as Chronos-Saturn or as the Greeks called it, Demiurgos, the operating engineer of the universe as opposed to the Creator of that universe. In the reign of Saturn we see exorbitant building and modeling activities and this is reflected in the masonic reference to their god as the "Big Builder" or "Architect." This sounds reasonably attractive, many of us can appreciate magnificent buildings and splendid projects along those lines but as usual there is more to it than this.

This Saturnian-masonic "edifice-complex" ultimately is building against the grain, against nature, though at the beginning, in the early eras, nature's forces are manipulated with a knowledge which requires the greatest intimacy with her ways as reflected in the various megalithic structures in the British isles, Europe and ancient America. There is beauty, simplicity and power in this early technology and modern enthusiasts have mistaken the knowledge and sensitivity to natural forces intrinsic to this technology as indicative of a positive force at work.

Actually, with some crucial exceptions, the rise of the megaliths marked the rise of the Hermetic Academy into its dominant physical phase. The theory is that the megaliths "pin down" natural forces, helping to subdue nature's most savage furies. We marvel today at the Hoover Dam but that symbol-laden construction is but a crude parody of the technology of the megaliths which helped to "dam" the wildest forces of nature.

The construction of the megaliths, heralded by New Age types as marvels of ancient ingenuity and cooperation with nature are actually the first physical evidence of the end of Eden, of that period on earth when humanity lived as the servants and friends of God's natural creation, as nomads and hunter-gatherers.

The error of modern enthusiasts for what they regard as the magical, Merlinesque, harmonious time of the Druids and Stonehenge is ignorance of the fact that the historical period they idolize was itself immersed in a tampering technology and materialism which essentially marked a revolutionary break with the natural order.

According to John Michell, "...the first revolution of Olympus marks the first deviation from the primeval ways of men...presided over by Cronus, otherwise Saturn." This revolution marks the end of man's Edenic relationship with the natural world. Hence forward man is alienated from nature by means of the Saturnian "scythe" which symbolizes the sense of separation from God's natural creation that man experienced after the Fall.

Man began his peregrination away from Eden through his conceit that he would "become as god." Yet, as soon as he left the Divine Plan for the occult process his stated objective became the Kabbalistic tikkun olam or "repair of the world," via the intervention and imposition of human brain power--the very ego-maniacal device that caused the separation from God's natural Eden in the first place. Repair of the world indeed--a world the Kabbalists had only just ruined!

After the Saturnian division, Hermetic man saw himself as separate and, inevitably, above nature, though always quick to identify himself as nature's benign shepherd. This mighty, occult shepherd-king figure has emerged in history under the forms of Arthur, Merlin, Pendragon, and Prestor John. He is the personification of the manipulation of nature by secret technology on behalf of a secret hierarchy which, if known at all, is always careful to present itself as the supreme friend of divine creation.

If the expulsion from the Garden of Eden--that is to say the literal alteration of man's circumstance of living solely upon God's bounty and providence--was the result of Satanic intervention, why has it not dawned on us that civilization is itself Satanic?

In the Hermetic-masonic tradition the secret identity of Satan is the force represented in occult lore as emanating from the star Sirius, the so-called dog star, Canis major. In the secret tradition of the Freemasons, Sirius is overwhelmingly identified with a single primary attribute, the bringing of civilization to earth.

The heirs of this magical current were saluted by the Illuminist and master-alchemist Comenius in his 1668 book The Way of Light, dedicated to the first scientific organization in Western history, Britain's august Royal Society. In it, Comenius addressed the first formal scientists as "illuminati" and outlined their scientific purpose, "...which is to secure...the empire of the human mind over matter."

In a key Rosicrucian description of the City of Utopia it is shown to be dominated by science and mechanics and more ominously, by the medical dissection of cadavers, in other words by the hyper-analytical obsession of Rationalism with dead matter and measurement.

The "utopian" city of the Rosicrucians is before us today: New York and Los Angeles--Babylon the Great. And it was planned in 1668 and long before.

We have forgotten the depth of the roots of the modern disease. We have accepted the pop-pap than anything that pre-dated the more obvious rapacity of modern industrial pollution was natural or magical (the notion of magic being identified with the pristine). Hence we have denied ourselves knowledge of the beginning of the rise of the cryptocracy. John Michell:

"It is their immediate concern, having eaten of the tree of knowledge, to apply all their newly acquired arts to constructing a facsimile of the Garden, a model paradise..."

But there already was an architecture prior to man's imposition of his structures and interventions, this was the architecture of the natural landscape as shaped by God. To claim that to have left it as it was would have been barbarous and backward is symptomatic of the diseased occult mind and its gigantic egotistical pathology.

As long as it was left as God created it, it was paradise. Due to our blindness we feverishly cooperate with the imposition upon the earth of our own version of "Eden" which always ends in the creation of Babylon, of hell on earth. Historian John Michell:

"Settlement leads to the establishment of social hierarchies, to specialization, the development of arts and sciences, the building of temples and houses. For millions of years men, essentially the same as we are now, lived without these and presumably without feeling the need for them...Tacitus described a German tribe that lived entirely without artificial shelter...the phenomenon of successive towns built around the same sacred place, the spirit of which became the foundation deity, receiving the sacrifices offered in expiation of the crime of settlement and giving the law by which the city was governed. Implicit in this law was a contract between man and God by which the first was permitted a conditional (and limited) use of land for agriculture and building in return for duties and observances paid to the second. So it was understood by the founding fathers of cities.

"But as cities expand these limitations become more onerous and neglected with the result that, in the language of apocalypse, the ...city becomes Babylon, the parasitic whore and proceeds toward destruction. In this belief the...(traditional) element in ancient Rome objected to...expansion beyond the original city boundaries, considering it a breach of the foundation contract.

"Such counsels were of course ignored, and in consequence Rome, following the career of all previous empires, became Babylon indeed...civilization tends to grow more elaborate and to make ever greater demands on the earth that sustains it. There comes a time when the old natural devotion to the earth...is exchanged for...the desire to increase the products of the earth by artificially stimulating its fertility. This stage is marked in history by the appearance of sun gods...divinities of reason, intellect and centralized government, whose legends refer always to their victories over dragons... (i.e. nature)."

This policy of "artificially increasing the earth's fertility and multiplying the gifts of its spirit, instead of accepting what is given by nature," is evident in the staking of the earth in symbolism, as is seen in the motif of the knight spearing the dragon, which is sometimes viewed as the pinnacle of the victory of light over dark.

But we should also be aware that there is an alternate, occult reading of this image. This Arthurian symbol has been celebrated by pagans and Freemasons as a sign of man's usurpation of natural creation. The staking process is seen by them as a means to "pin down" the heretofore flowing character of the energy of creation, so as to be harnessed and bled by Stonehenge-like technology, in order to give greater and greater resources to man. Michell:

"The appearance of the sun god signals the introduction of a technology that aims to alter the natural channels of the earth spirit and to stimulate its energies for the benefit of an increasingly large settled population...From all that has recently been discovered about the scientific knowledge and methods of the megalith builders, it appears that their system was in the magical tradition of Egypt, Babylon and the ancient East...At Delphi, by spearing the serpent and localizing its energies, Apollo raised the productivity of the oracle...Every ancient standing stone is like the omphalos in the Temple of Apollo, driven into the head of the telluric serpent current, fixing and augmenting the (earth) energies which had formerly fluctuated.

"Yet in the end the system became onerous and ineffective, demanding at least as much from the people as it gave in return...Here is revealed the inevitable betrayal by any institutionalized system of technology of the people who have come to depend on it...The land (had) become more productive, the people richer and more numerous--until, under the influence of cyclical changes in the heavens, the flow of spirit began to withdraw from the temples and take other paths.

"The latter-day priests, having neglected the principles of the old astronomical science by which the temples were first sited and planned, and no longer sensitive to the earth's spiritual energies, could only resort to more frantic invocations, attended by ever increasing sacrifice, in attempts to repeat the former results. And thus followed, as it has on many occasions and at many places over the world, a reaction against the artificial and ever more futile proceedings of the magicians and a return to simpler ways."

It is at this juncture in history that the pre-Christian people of Europe were Christianized. The willingness of these hardy, comparatively far more natural and attuned people than we moderns, to render themselves susceptible to Christianity is misunderstood today.

The assumption is that Christianity simply deceived and coerced the hardy pre-Christian Europeans into the fold. But early Christians like St. Patrick were accepted because they rid the pagan people of what Michell terms, "the final excesses of a degenerate priesthood, whose altars demanded ever more sacrificial blood before they could evoke response" from the "earth energies."

Michell's nostalgia for the "old astronomical science" of the Saturnian magicians who supposedly did the rituals properly, is misplaced. Manipulation is manipulation, whether clever and precise as in earlier times, or lazy and forgetful as in the era when it would be overthrown by Celtic Christianity's gospel of simplicity.

Mr. Michell can't bring himself to unambiguously condemn the original tamperers, the ones who, after all, started the whole journey to Babylon and hell on earth in the first place. These mystical Adams and Eves are referred to by Michell as "good people" attempting to re-create heaven on earth on the Saturnian model of a "golden age."

But John Michell ought to know that paradise existed once on earth and was destroyed by these "good people." Attempts to artificially re-build it are not only the height of artifice and insanity but also, as Arthur Machen and H.P. Lovecraft hinted, perhaps indicative of something far more ominous: preparation of the earth for reinhabitation by demonic entities once expelled.

The mythical Satanic bringer of civilization to earth was supposed to be an alien from the star system Sirius, around whom the Egyptians and all subsequent Hermetic systems constructed their elaborate and obsessive religio-astronomic observances. This star Sirius also served as an astronomic secret code, an allegory of the illusory quality and inherent "trickiness" of the material world.

In astronomic magnitude, Sirius is approximately thirty-five times brighter than our sun. It is regarded in the highest occult circles as analogous to the "hidden god of the cosmos," for, just as the star Sirius' true magnitude is dwarfed by the sun of our solar system by means of the illusion generated by distance, so too is the influence of Satan in the world obscured behind a welter of churches and lip-service to the teachings of Christ.

The emblem of the All-Seeing Eye above the unfinished pyramid is the representation of the eye of Sirius, of its omniscient surveillance.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the fanatical degree of attachment the priesthood of Egypt and all subsequent related Hermetic traditions had for Sirius. The entire calendar year of the Egyptians was based upon the rising times of this star.

"The heliacal rising of Sirius was so important to the ancient Egyptians...that gigantic temples were constructed with their main aisles oriented precisely towards the spot on the horizon where Sirius would appear...The light of Sirius would be channeled along the corridor (due to the precise orientation) to flood the altar in the inner sanctum as if a pin-pointed spotlight had been switched on.

"This blast of light focused from a single star was possible because of the orientation being so incredibly precise and because the temple would be otherwise in total darkness within. In a huge, utterly dark temple, the light of one star focused solely on the altar must have made quite an impact on those present. (Robert K.G. Temple, The Sirius Mystery, Futura paperback edition, p. 87).

According to the astronomer John A. Eddy, the rock circle located near Lovell, Wyoming, known as the Big Horn Medicine Wheel is aligned with the rising of Sirius ("Astronomical Alignment of the Big Horn Medicine Wheel," Science, June 7, 1974).

"The heliacal rising of Sirius was also important to other ancient peoples. Here is a description by the ancient Greek poet Aratus...of the rising of Sirius (often known as the Dog Star as it is in the constellation Canis, or Dog): 'The tip of his [the Dog's] terrible jaw is marked by a star that keenest of all blazes with a searing flame and him men call Sirius.'

"Throughout Latin literature there are many references to the 'Dog Days' which followed the heliacal rising of Sirius in the summer. These hot, parched days were thought by that time to derive some of their ferocity and dryness from the 'searing' of Sirius." (Temple, pp. 87-88).

Further on in this study we shall see that a key ritual sacrifice intended to imprint the Group Mind of the masses of the 1970s--the Son of Sam serial murders--involved the widely disseminated claim that the "mad" killer(s) had taken orders from a dog named Sam. The capture of one of the killers in the cult, David Berkowitz, coincided with the coming of the Dog Days of summer, August, 1977.

In Satanist Albert Pike's eighth degree of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, the focus of worship is on the "blazing star" as symbolized by the pentagram and Pike identifies Sirius, in his Morals and Dogma, as the grand builder of architecture.

John Michell: "The alchemists aimed to recapture the spirit of Mercurius as the mobile agent in their operations, and they spoke of 'fixing' it, using the imagery of the stake driven through the earth serpent, by which means their predecessors, alchemists of elemental cosmic forces, had attempted to raise the subtle spirit of the earth. All these good people shared the noblest ambition, to invoke again the golden age on earth.

"No doubt in time they did much to promote human convenience and comfort, and civilizations have been humanized by such efforts; but their falls have thereby only been delayed. For the human spirit, like the spirit of the earth, is a natural wanderer and does not forever accept domesticity.

"Attempts to fix nature's volatile principle will always be made; and the spirit may for a time accept the ways imposed upon it by human nature in its material aspect. But sooner or later it will prefer its own ways, and will take them, whatever obstacles are put in its path." (All John Michell quotations are from his book, The Earth Spirit, Crossroad Publishing Company).

So we observe that Saturn and his "golden age" architecture (both mental and physical), came only after the end of Eden, after Saturn-Sirius had separated the unity of heaven and earth by means of his fateful sickle.

What do we have behind the cover story about a worker's paradise in the Soviet Union? We have the sickle, the very occult symbol of the bisection of heaven and earth, the very symbol of the destruction of Eden by demonic, accelerated material and temporal decay and false philosophies which generate division (between humanity's sense of itself and identification with God's divine creation) under cover of slogans of unity.

In other words we have a grotesque mockery of the very principle touted. This macabre arrogance borders on the clownish for those initiates (or self-initiates) who have the wit to see it.

Inducing the Double-Mind

Have you ever noticed how television and print media will scream themselves hoarse in news documentaries, editorials and heavy analytical pieces about "rising pornography, crime, violence, gunplay" etc.? And yet in the same TV Guide announcing the latest special on "The Crisis of Sex and Violence in America" will appear an advertisement for Miami Vice, the "show that brings you the action and excitement you've come to expect" etc.

Or your newspaper will condemn sex and violence in the loftiest terms but there in the entertainment section is a half-page advertisement for a new "action" movie accompanied by a photo of women in string bikinis and high heels fondling automatic pistols and machine-guns.

There is the official attack on sex and violence. There is the official attack on Satanism. And yet, one need not be Sherlock Holmes to detect that the very themes which Orthodox Officialdom condemns with its right hand, its left-hand--Counterculture Officialdom--disseminates.

Lt. Col. Michael Aquino works for U.S. Army Military Intelligence. He is also the leader of the Temple of Set, a group characterized as satanic by the Official Orthodoxy of the System. Aquino, in a letter to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Feb. 6, 1989 responded to the attacks on his organization by a supposedly scandalized culture that is itself Satanic:

"If teenage gangs may experiment with what they believe to be 'occult rituals,' blame should be laid squarely at the feet of the media which glamorize occult violence to youth. I specifically refer to the movie industry, with offerings of increasingly gory and violent 'splatter' films such as Nightmare on Elm Street (with its child-molestor hero Freddy), Halloween, Friday the 13th, etc.

"Note that such films usually include several sequels also targeted at children, and Freddy now has his own weekly television series! And parents wonder where children are getting all their bizarre, occult ideas? Please turn on your television sets any evening or examine even the 'PG' horror movie offerings at your local video store--much less the 'R' category."

The mechanism of prissy, six o'clock TV news show put-downs and "exposes" of the very Satanic sex and violence which are lustily celebrated on the same channel on their ten o'clock movie is sheer hypocrisy of the most blatant and perverse form. It is not concealed.

Yet we cooperate with it. We are its prey. Both sides--light and shadow--have magnetic attraction for us. The Official Orthodoxy allows us to indulge our good sense about ourselves as people who can still be outraged.

Meanwhile, the Establishment's Official Counter-Culture allows us to indulge our "guilty pleasures" as they are--once again--openly referred to by a pair of syndicated TV-movie critics. Pleasure--as distinct from joy or happiness--is almost always enhanced by the patina of the forbidden, and having reassured our persona of our essential goodness by sharing in the condemnations promulgated by the Official Orthodoxy, we can then fling our selves headlong into guilty indulgence of the very themes we agreed were execrable when condemned on the nightly news.

The collective occult schizophrenia--or mass insanity, if you will--extends to Judeo-Christians who condemn Satanism as a concept when presented in church forums, TV chat shows and police seminars, but who relax and divert themselves with Satanic television and videos.

Modern people are fascinated with exposes of sex, violence and Satanism and fascination is itself a form of mind control if we recognize that oftentimes obsessive treatments of these themes under the guise of "exposing them" are the very means of inducing interest and involvement in the occult. People who never hear about Satanism, extreme violence and extreme pornography are unlikely to become involved with Satanism, violence and pornography.

Those who fill their heads with morbid fascination with lurid media depictions of evil in the world, under the pretense of putting an end to such evil, are actually part of the process which precedes its wider acceptance. The film The Exorcist is instructive in this vein. Under the guise of exposing Satanism, it brutalized its audience with pornography and a powerful occult milieu.

Roman Polanski's popular Hollywood film, Rosemary's Baby, was also presented from the vantage of supposedly "exposing" the danger of Satanism, but has accurately been called "the best advertisement for Satanism ever made...an allegory of the birth of the demonic eon."

Polanski has himself been implicated in child molestation. It has also been alleged that he videotaped pornography involving children and animals for sale to a private network, possibly in association with Charlie Manson, whose followers ritually sacrificed Polanski's wife, Sharon Tate, and her unborn baby. Tate herself may have been involved in the occult, possibly the Process Church of the Final Judgment, a Satanic group which Manson was also associated with (see Painted Black, Harper and Row edition, pp. 115-116 and The Manson File, pp. 168-172).

Of course no matter what her affiliations, Sharon Tate's murder was a heinous crime. It is interesting to note that while much is made of the murder of her unborn baby as being the most horrible part of the Manson gang's occult violence, women who pay physicians to kill their unborn babies are not regarded as guilty of any Satanic act, heinous or otherwise.

Was the sacrifice of Sharon Tate's unborn baby somehow a ritual precursor of the coming mass sacrifice of unborn children, which was subsequently legalized by the U.S. Supreme Court?

The media puts us on intimate terms with the devil by immersing us in his spectacular, electronic "videodrome" kingdom. Was it by some sort of "tele-vision" that Satan tempted Christ?

"The devil...showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time...All these will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me" (Luke 4:5; Matthew 4: 8-9; emphasis supplied).

The double-mind--the profoundly disturbed mind at war with itself and ignorant even of that fact--is a characteristic of the scapegoat-patsy "lone nut" cult-killers--and of the American people in general. For, in this time-frame of ours, we are initiated into their Cult solely by means of our exposure to the electronic videodrome. And thus, our prospects become the same as those of David Berkowitz, Mark David Chapman, Arthur Bremer or James Earl Ray. In the 19th century the phenomenon was termed "masonic apoplexy." Today it is called zombieism.

Masonic Double Mind in Vatican Two Catholicism

Consider the modern Catholic Church under Popes John XXIII and Paul VI which, taking a leaf from the Elizabethan, Anglican Archbishop Thomas Cranmer, announced publicly an enlightened, new universal "reform" born of Vatican Council II's spirit of "renewal and openness," hence forward to be marked by a new reverence for lay involvement, dialogue and democracy.

But just as Cranmer sneered at the common peasants who dared to protest the repression of the traditional liturgy Cranmer had claimed they no longer wanted, the Vatican Two Catholic Church, in the name of new freedoms, also suppressed, against the wishes of the common people, the old liturgy. It was outlawed and a modern liturgy designed by the Freemason Annibale Bugnini, and "luhv" rhetoric to justify the suppression, in the name of "the people's wishes," followed it.

Cranmer murdered en masse the English Catholic peasants who rose in defense of the old liturgy. Cranmer massacred them and crushed their peasant uprising which became known as the Western Rising (cf. Michael Davies, Cranmer's Godly Order and Evelyn Waugh, Edmund Campion).

This Protestant inquisition is seldom mentioned nowadays in keeping with the masonic strategy of tarring only the Catholic Church with the brush of "inquisitor" and thereby building up Protestanism as the exclusive "true Christianity." They have presented this false picture to the world because Protestantism was the chosen vehicle through which Freemasonry infiltrated Christianity.

Protestants, not just Catholics, persecuted and executed thousands of Anabaptists (the forerunners of today's Mennonites and Amish). Michael Servetus, a dissenting mathematician, was burned at the stake in Switzerland by Calvinists.

According to contemporary adherents of paganism, the 16th century covens of Wicca sided with the Protestant Queen Elizabeth against the Catholics, in appreciation of her having awarded Satanist John Dee, the founder of Freemasonry, high office in her government (Howard Rheingold, "The Pentacle and the Wand," Whole Earth Review, Spring,1992, p. 61).

The French Revolution of 1789, or Reign of Terror as it is more appropriately known, was a masonic war against the Catholic church and the Catholic people of France; a war conducted with all the instruments of torture and all the atrocities of an inquisition.

The masonic hanging judge, Jean-Baptiste Carrier, ordered the execution of 13,000 Catholics, who were drowned in the Loire River in boats specially designed for that purpose.

On Dec. 23, 1793, the masonic General Francois Westermann attacked the Catholic village of Savenay, killing hundreds of Catholic women and children. Westermann bragged that he had "trampled children under horses' feet and massacred women who will no longer give birth to brigands."

In 1794, another of the generals of the French Revolution, the Freemason Louis-Marie Turreau, ordered the slaughter of 109 Catholic children in the village of Lucs-sur-Boulogne.

In the western section of France, in the area around Nantes known as the Vendee, hundreds of thousands of Catholics were slaughtered by the masonic government of the French Revolution. Thousands of their religious leaders were also killed in Paris and other areas for their opposition to the suzerainty of the masonic cryptocracy.

A great deal has changed since then however. Today the Vatican is as firmly in the pocket of the Freemasons as are many Protestant institutions. Pope John Paul II, presented in the masonic media as a "strict conservative," is actually an agent of One World, New Age Luciferianism. In 1986 he convened a world council of religions, including African devil-worshipers, Buddhists and Muslims, at a church named after the Apostle Peter, in Assisi, Italy.

According to the New York Times (Oct. 28, 1986), "The Buddhists, led by the Dalai Lama, quickly converted the altar of the Church of San Pietro by placing a small statue of the Buddha atop the tabernacle and setting prayer scrolls and incense burners around it." (The Dalai Lama of Tibet is revered as a "God-King" by his followers).

Sincere Christians of all denominations condemned the Assisi rite. Protestant leader Dr. Carl McIntyre called it, "the greatest single abomination in church history." Catholic Bishop Marcel Lefebvre labeled Pope John Paul II's actions in Assisi, "The supreme imposture, the culminating insult to Our Lord...a diabolical act."

Thus we observe the conflict between truths perceived deep within and lies people force themselves to assent to in public. "In the name of the people" the wishes of the people are overthrown. Is there a reason this double-mind has been induced? If someone is making us deliberately mentally ill, it may be that this is done so that we will look to that someone for "healing and relief."

The Bovine Herd

Into the double-mind breach step the elite managers of the masonic, Hermetic Academy who through symbol and word manipulation can temporarily unite our persona and anima, thus lifting an immense burden from us, relieving us of our stress and confusion. This function can easily assume, in the minds of the subject-patients, a god-like status. I submit this status is characterized by the use of the term "They" in our society, as in "Why don't They come up with a tire that will never wear out or a cure for cancer?" As in "They have a cure for cancer but the doctors would lose too much money so They have suppressed it." Or "They say the CIA killed Kennedy and he was fornicating with Marilyn throughout his presidency."

"They" write the movie scripts and the billboard slogans. "They" have the money and the power and control of the illusion machine. "They" can cure cancer or withhold the cure. They reveal the secrets behind assassinations and scandals. What will "They" do next? How will "They" program the show today? Let's sit back, watch and find out.

Since we choose to refuse to genuinely heal the rift between the two sides of our mentality by the tough means of repudiating our lying public persona and taking action on the understanding of our true self, we relinquish autonomy to those who make it appear that they can heal us at no great cost or trouble on our part. Never mind that "They" are also the ones who implanted the rift in the first place. The point is "We" have little or no power. We cannot act. We cannot invent. We cannot cure. We must wait and see what happens. We must see what They make happen.

The final coffin in the nail of our free will is the fact that we ourselves know in our heart of hearts that the above is false. That it is We the People who have the power and the responsibility and that we could crush Them tomorrow if we chose to. They are only an illusion, every bit as ephemeral as the patter of a carnival sideshow bunco artist beckoning to us from the other side of the hootchie-kootchie tent.

But if we overthrew them tomorrow we would have to write our own scripts. We would have to heal ourselves. We would have to admit the colossal waste and loss and destruction of the past years which our laziness and folly have made possible. We would have to experience the pain of being alive and responsible. We would have to start acting like men and women instead of as slaves and weaklings.

The Hermetic Academy is confident, and not without reason, that we will offer no substantial, meaningful resistance to their imperium. Why?

The foster mothers of the human race, at least in the West, are cows. Perhaps we've imbibed so much of their fluid that we have become cows, terrified of freedom and its responsibilities. Epistemologist Charles Fort once remarked, "I think we're farmed."

According to the secret tradition of the Hermetic Academy, the "tree" of the Knowledge of Good and Evil in the Garden of Eden was a psychedelic mushroom, stropharia cubensis.[+] These mushrooms grow only in cow dung.

[+] The symbol produced when that knowledge finally goes completely out-of-control is also a "mushroom," the mushroom-shaped cloud emitted upon detonation of an atomic bomb.

Church Fathers Who Didn't Do Tricks with Mirrors

There are essentially two forces competing for the hearts and minds of mankind. The first is the old force of the orthodoxy of the Church and the Throne, reaction and authority. Those who regard themselves as dissidents and rebels against the Establishment have been taught by the Official Counter-Culture that it is from this direction, from the ancien regime that we can expect to encounter the greatest threat to liberty. We've been trained to expect that the threat to freedom comes from Christian religious and ethical orthodoxies, based on faith and authority.

But any half-way competent student of deception will know that the greatest potential threat always comes from the unsuspected direction. In this case from the force that is mis-identified and masked, that force which is fascism with a human face.

Perhaps more important, there is one key principle of the psychology of mass mind control missing from the old model of authority embodied by the early Fathers of the Christian Church: they did not flatter and they did not come in disguise. The core of orthodox Christianity's belief system was anti-occult to the marrow: it was the bad news about human nature.

Not so the "revolutionary liberators," from the Soviet communists, to the New Age groovers, who have announced the delivery of humanity from the clutches of Reaction and Orthodoxy. Of this "Church" of the Official Counter-Culture, Louis-Ferdinand Celine observed in Mea Culpa, his seminal essay on Bolshevism:

" Since the end of religions, before this new (modern) altar, they have been swinging incense; they have been intoxicating man with the sense of his own importance, with all manner of rigmarole. Man has been made the whole Church. No longer can he see anything with clear eyes. He is cracked! He believes anything that is told to him, just so long as it is flattering to him...

"The practical superiority of the great Christian religions was that they did not try to sugar-coat the pill. They did not try to throw dust in the eyes; they were not looking for voters; they never felt the need of ingratiating themselves; they did not wiggle their tails in an effort to please. They just seized Man in his cradle, and broke the bad news to him, without reservation. They told him, 'You little shapeless stinker you, you can never be anything but filth. By birth you are nothing but merde. Do you hear me, you? That's the evidence, that's the principle of everything...However, maybe...maybe...in scrutinizing the matter more closely...you have got one little chance of winning a bit of pardon for being as you are--so filthy, so excremental, so unbelievable...

"That is, if you can hold your chin up in the face of all the sorrows, all the afflictions, all the ordeals, miseries and tortures you will have to face during your lifetime, whether it be long or short. Always with perfect humility! Life, you louse, is just one long bitter ordeal! Don't get out of breath! Don't expect noon to come at two o'clock! Just try to save your soul, that is something in itself! Maybe at the end of this Calvary of yours, if you get to be a regular fellow, a hero in keeping your trap shut, you may be saved by these principles...

"But even that is not a sure thing...one little hair's breadth less filthy when you come to croak than when you were born...But don't take too much for granted! That's the whole story! Watch your step! Don't speculate on first and last things! For a turd that is the maximum!...'

"That was seriously spoken. By real Church Fathers, who knew the tools of their trade, and did not try to do tricks with mirrors."

Even the parties that claim to be antidotes to the excesses of the degraded spirit of modernity--Populism and democracy--are thoroughly modern and actually serve as bridges to that tyranny we have been taught to revere as the source of our liberation. Populism and democracy are based on the same notion of statecraft as the enemy they claim to oppose, predicated upon the flattery of man and human nature, in order to pimp for votes and influence.

Masonic Dogma of 'Perfecting' Creation

In the opposite corner from Church and Throne, is the philosophy which describes itself as "The Rite of Perfection." This is the alternate name for the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, the most powerful masonic order in the world. This is the occult philosophy of not only the Novus Ordo Seclorum--the so-called New Order of the Ages--but also of the Elizabethan Age and long before it as well.

This is the intellectual conceit that the universe--God's natural Creation--is going to be "perfected" by the god-like intervention of the omnipotent human intellect, symbolized by the pentagram.

This is the belief which informs the entire occult project from the Pythagorean to the Enlightenment and is made all the more astonishingly pathological when one recalls that this mission was approached at a time in history when the earth was abundant with vast tracts of virgin forests, oceans and jungles, organic soil and produce and pure air and water. Yet in the midst of this pinnacle of throbbing natural, pristine beauty and purity the Rosicrucian initiate Robert Fludd dedicated himself to the "regeneration of the (natural) world."

The standard disinformation intended for the uninitiated has always been that Fludd was speaking metaphorically, about the spiritual plane. Actually, Fludd was doing both: addressing himself to the literal manipulation of nature by human brain power as well as to the consequences of such "regeneration" in the realm of "magic" and spirit.

This philosophy emerged in the open in Europe with the Renaissance and it is also true, as historian Frances Yates writes, "...it was in its origins that the occult philosophy of the Renaissance had inspired some of the most exquisite productions of Renaissance culture." In other words, in the majestic incense of Renaissance art there is also the whiff of the sulfurous.

The "Luhv" Tyranny

This malodorous current is evident in Rabelais' Abbey of Theleme--the philosopher's paradise where one rule alone is law: fais ce que voudras or "do your own thing." See the grotesque mockery behind this claim of Rabelais. He, like his occult forbears, is a Saturnian, a follower of the scythe-wielder who, in allegory, first tore apart primordial paradise, the unity between heaven and earth, but now here is Rabelais as a spokesman for the epitome of Renaissance enlightenment offering us...a paradise!

If Chronos-Saturn destroyed a divine Eden---Saturn being the force of time, decay and the progress of matter (or Second Law of Thermodynamics)--man will recreate a true Theleme, a better Eden than God. And that, in sum, is the masonic cover story that maintains cachet to this day.

It has been between two ideologies that we have been pulled in Western history, between the monumental autocracy and dogmatism of the Church, Monarchy, Reaction and Authority at one end, and the alleged Anarcho-Libertarian, Rosicrucian-Masonic Heresiarchs at the other, who allegedly only want freedom, unfettered knowledge, love and toleration for all. Robert K.G. Temple is one of their advocates and writes:

"The Platonic tradition in the broader sense, with its gnostic and heretical overtones, and its myriad manifestations in later ages in such bizarre and fascinating figures as Giordano Bruno, Marsilio Ficino, John Dee...not to mention the troubadours of Provence...and the massacred tens of thousands of Albigensians in France, the Knights Templar and an infinite range of hopeless causes over two and a half millennia--Platonism in the general sense is a creed which denies creed, an anti-institutional tradition...(it insists) on nothing by way of doctrinal dogma. It is truly free...it has no Pope...it terrifies those weaker mentalities which crave a shuttered belief system, they always try to destroy it, but succeed only in destroying individuals and individual movements within the larger tradition."

Temple has given us a classic statement of the standard propaganda of the Hermetic Academy. It's rather incredible to ponder the depth of deception inside that single paragraph of his. We observe first a martyrology and a victimhood established: the persecuted freedom-lovers massacred, hounded, destroyed. Implicit in that ridiculously one-sided caricature is the notion of blamelessness, non-violence and toleration on the part of the Albigensians and the Templars and the rest of the Academy's dramatis personae.

Few would guess from Temple's propaganda that his heroes the Knights Templar were directly responsible for unleashing one of the most horrible plagues upon Western civilization, a plague countless reformers not included in Temple's exalted martyrology gave their lives in an attempt to overturn. Historian Desmond Seward writing in The Monks of War cites as the Templar's most momentous act, "their contribution to the overthrow of the Church's attitude toward usury...No medieval institution did more for the rise of capitalism."

These were the Knights Templar who, far from being "anti-institutional", were actually the prototype of the first international bankers, the first respectable Shylocks who made extracting a pound of flesh at interest, "the enlightened thing to do."

Temple's heroes also include the Albigensians, those paradigms of the masonic stereotype of the "free spirited heretics whose free love communalism was one of the few bright spots in a dark age of Church dictatorship otherwise heavy with hierarchy and dogma" etc. etc.

It is true that the Albigensians were horribly repressed with great cruelty, but that fact alone does not negate the essence of what the Albigensians represented. The Albigensians were one of the best examples of the hierarchical authoritarianism and "priestcraft" for which the Catholic Church had been condemned--by the Albigensians! But the Catholics made no secret of their claim to authority and hierarchy.

Not so the Albigensians, who, like all Gnostic-masonic occultists, hid their true aims and organizational structure and publicly swore hostility against the whole of the Satanic material world. That was the cover-story, anyway.

The rank and file Albigensians were sworn to a life of celibacy and asceticism, the better to avoid entanglements with matter and flesh. There was an additional class among them however, a ruling or priest class known as "The Perfecti." These "perfect ones" were supposed to practice all the austerity of the rank and file and then take that austerity to an even more extreme degree of self-denial in what was supposed to have been a life lived as a perpetual Lent.

But there was a secret side to the Perfecti class which they chose not to reveal to the "imperfect ones." The secret doctrine of the Albigensians was that, since the priest class was perfect, they were above the law, immune to sin and therefore licensed to indulge in all of the orgies, gluttony and riches solemnly forbidden to the "imperfect" lower order Albigensians.

This Albigensian model of a secret doctrine for the elite absolving them of most or all of the disciplines they have publicly commanded to their subordinates, represents the original corrupt executive dogma of institutionalism, par excellence. It reflects the ancient occult contempt for the lower orders of men, in spite of their sucker-bait preachments about everyone's "godhood." It also represents the masonic tradition of a secrets-keeping hierarchy who have the cunning to condemn the elitism of enemy hierarchies, while practicing an even more vicious version of their own under a masque of benevolence and brotherly love.

The Neo-Platonic, Gnostic-Hermetic, Kabbalistic-Rosicrucian-Masonic freethinking victims, as Temple styles them (and he is not alone in this, everyone from Robert Anton Wilson to Gary Snyder to Manly Palmer Hall and most of the intellectual establishment of our day share in his assessment), these poor, persecuted victims--assassinated anyone who got in their way!

One of their opponents was the Elizabethan playwright Christopher Marlowe, whose plays Doctor Faustus and Tamburlaine constitute a strong attack on the Rosicrucian cryptocracy and its core credo of human intellect "perfecting" nature through tampering. Marlowe was murdered by them--stabbed through the eye to symbolize his having seen too much.

How different a picture the documentary record gives us of these supposed Neo-Platonic rebels for tolerance and freedom and no Pope and no dogma. In reality the Thelemic current, the Do-Your-Own-Thing Academy, is in fact a Counter-Church with institutional dogmas, violence and discipline far more rigid and harsh than the orthodox Church that is its rival for the hearts and souls of mankind.

The great advantage the occult Church, this hermetic Abbey of Theleme, has had over the orthodox Christian Church, is that its true character has been successfully concealed and only the Christian Church has been made to carry the stigma of institutional rigidity, inquisition and dogmatism.

The Counter-Church has triumphed because it has been able to maintain the facade R.K.G. Temple, Robert Anton Wilson and their colleagues routinely depict.

The masonic cryptocracy's tyranny over humanity has been accomplished under cover of victimhood. The world's most rigid and fascist hierarchy has successfully enveloped its occult discipline in the patina of persecution and hounding by the "uptight, the blind, the superstitious and ignorant."

In spite of its incredibly strict, secret dogmatism, it advertises itself as the repository of freethought and open inquiry so that no subject of study is taboo; no rules except "Do What Thou Wilt" and beneath that vast front a profound secrecy about their genuine objectives and operations.

Orthodoxy Christianity's dogmatic assertion has been that it has God on its side. The propaganda of the masonic cryptocracy has been that it will make every man god and in liberty, equality and fraternity will their collective god-hood reign.

Which is more dangerous a threat to individual rights and the natural order: the old-time princes and prelates who loudly announced their aspiration for glory, authority, pomp and ceremony, or those other princes and tyrants who advance their dominion under the mask of freethought, victimhood, equality and a man-made heaven on earth?

Scientism: A Form of Black Magic

I submit that the greater threat emanates from the latter and has ever since the Renaissance. Until recently, Louis-Ferdinand Celine's observation about the Renaissance remained an enigma: "Since the Renaissance there's been a tendency to work more and more passionately for the coming of the Kingdom of the Sciences and the Social Robot."

To attack scientism and the Renaissance is akin to being accused of being a flat-earth advocate, just as it's profoundly "uncool," "reactionary" and "obscurantist" to take issue with Robert K.G. Temple's martyrology. The reason that science is a bad master and a dangerous servant and ought not to be worshiped, is that science is not objective. Science is fundamentally about the uses of measurement--what does not fit the yardstick of the scientist is discarded. Scientific determinism has repeatedly excluded some data from its measurement and fudged other data, such as Piltdown Man, in order to support the self-fulfilling nature of its own agenda, be it Darwinism or "cut, burn and poison" methods of cancer "treatment."

The so-called "scientific method" often violates the rules of evidence when it encounters data which lie outside an area scientism has defined as containing the only possible data. Then the contradictory data are ignored because they do not fit the scientific establishment's arbitrary standard of measurement, or the data are discredited in terms of the assumptions of the dogmas of scientism.

The cryptocracy has successfully harnessed to its own ends the huge potential for promoting secret political-occult agendas to the public, by presenting them as unassailable, "objective scientific truth." Since the bogey of "Science" instills in secularists a sort of blind reverence, opponents of political-occult agendas promoted through the propaganda of scientism are quickly stigmatized as "Neanderthal," especially with regard to their opposition to Darwinism, a dogma proved false by Norman Macbeth in his magisterial Darwin Retried and exposed as a cult by Gertrude Himmelfarb in Darwin.

This process is observed in the Renaissance, which was informed by a secret gnosis whose core dogma was a momentous new change in man's attitude toward nature: the alleged "perfection" of a "flawed" Creation by the intervention of the "omnipotent" human brain. Thus it was that the Renaissance magical tradition gave birth to the monstrous world of machines, industrial pollution, ugliness and the modern way of death we have come to term, "the rat-race." Historian Frances Yates:

"The 17th century philosophy which was to replace the Renaissance philosophies was Cartesian mechanism, and Mersenne, devoted friend and admirer of Descartes, was instrumental, through his wide connections and correspondence, in encouraging the shift from magic to mechanism.

"It is one of the most profound ironies of the history of thought that the growth of mechanical science, through which arose the idea of mechanism as a possible philosophy of nature, was itself an outcome of the Renaissance magical tradition. Mechanism divested of magic became the philosophy which was to oust Renaissance animism and to replace the 'conjuror' by the mechanical philosopher."

Under all its "New Age" finery, the exquisite liberal-humanitarian, Renaissance enlightenment so "terrifying to weaker mentalities," represents the introduction of a technological tyranny so immense it is difficult to grasp. It is both a physical, technological tyranny as well as a tyranny of the mind.

But in the beginning the occult praxis behind these horrors was dressed up in the de le haute majesty of the Renaissance. In that era the alchemical programming of humanity (which is after all, what alchemy has really been about, the talk of baser metals being a code phrase for base humanity), this intricate and delicate Theater of the Thanatos, this Hermetic shepherding of the human-sheep ("sheeple")--all for our "own good" and without our knowledge--took place inside the flowering of the greatest Art epoch of Western civilization.

The doctrine of man playing god reaches its nadir in the philosophy of scientism which makes possible the complete mental, spiritual and physical enslavement of mankind through technologies such as satellite and computer surveillance; a state of affairs symbolized by the "All Seeing Eye" above the unfinished pyramid on the U.S. one dollar bill.*

Ceremonial Psychodrama

In 1449 the French nobleman and gnostic magus Rene D'Anjou, at the court of Tarascon staged a series of Pas de Arms, curious, hybrid amalgams of tournament and masque, in which knights went through the motions of tilting at each other, and at the same time performed a mysterious species of play or drama, the plot and end of which were never entirely clear...

These beautifully crafted and staged plays were actually a form of psychodrama. Those who watched or partook of the ceremony were subtly influenced by these dramatic rituals.

Nowadays the engineering of the mind and the transformation of humanity is not quite as edifying or nearly as artistic. The contemporary programming of humanity is now accomplished by means of cheap dialogue and scenery as mundane and mediocre as magazine advertisements for whiskey, as Dr. W.B. Key documents in Subliminal Seduction, whereby the figures of eros and the danse macabre are scattered microscopically in the ice cubes inside whiskey ads and on the covers of boxes containing Disney videos. The conscious mind doesn't perceive these but the subconscious does.

* Science, when practiced as the application of man's God-given talents for the production of appropriate technology on a human-scale, relief of misery and the reverential exploration and appreciation of the glory of Divine Providence as revealed in nature, is a useful tool for mankind. Scientism is science gone mad, which is what we have today.

Or we can cite the plethora of extremely violent and simultaneously symbolic popular films of the modern cinema like The Wicker Man and Videodrome which in a very coarse and crude manner relative to the Renaissance ceremonials, continue this conditioning process (the issue of ceremonial and subliminal films was raised at length in Philip K. Dick's novel, Valis).

Mind Control and The Revelation of the Method

It is here necessary to point out a fallacy which has succeeded in defeating many genuine ecological rebels against modern tampering and the occult philosophy and organization which powers it. These are a rare breed to begin with since the vast majority of researchers who start out in search of the truth about these big themes end, like so many other avant-garde thinkers and activists, succumbing to the egregious tyranny and mind-napping that lurks beneath the facade of the liberal-occult operation.

But a few escape this net only to blunder blindly into another. They become trapped in the fallacy that exposure of the methods and personnel involved in the cryptocracy's crimes is, by itself, a tremendous step toward overthrowing the power of the cryptocracy. "If only we could get some of the facts out in the open" is their refrain. I would reply that the process of Hermetic cryptocracy is not stagnant. It is engaged in a remarkable project set into motion millennia ago, an operation which has accomplished most--if not all--of its chief-goals with awe-inspiring dispatch.

In the beginning and middle stages of this operation, the "hoodwink" was a key to accomplishment of objectives. Generally speaking, deception is far less necessary today. Quite the contrary, the cryptocracy has actually been determined to reveal many of its greatest secrets to us "profane ones" for some time now. Veteran independent occult investigators were astonished at the massive disclosure in the 1970s of some of the deepest and most profound secrets of the masonic-Neo-Platonic Hermetic Academy, secrets reserved in some cases for thousand of years for only the highest initiates.

Two books by the English writer and Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) initiate Kenneth Grant, The Magical Revival and Aleister Crowley and the Hidden God and another by the aforementioned Robert K.G. Temple, The Sirius Mystery, revealed secrets of the highest magnitude which have been vigorously protected and hidden at some cost to human life for centuries and in the case of Temple's book, millennia. And they were published with the knowledge and approval of the masonic-Hermetic heirs to this knowledge.

Independent researchers have seldom noted the significance of these revelations coming from occult groups and even advertising agencies which, in a demonstration of macabre nose-thumbing at our complete indifference to our mental enslavement, have actually pointed to the subliminals in their own liquor ads. These actions signal our entrance into an entirely different era of alchemical Process. As I wrote in Apocalypse Culture (first edition, Amok Press):

"...in the brilliant word-play of the (mythical) Masonic (figure) Dr. Syntax we come to the current unfoldment in "Must Be," an alchemical (cant language code) term Mr. (James Shelby) Downard translates as "the Revelation of the Method." This alludes to the process wherein murderous deeds and hair-raising conspiracies involving wars, revolutions, decapitations, (secret archaeo-astronomic deity cult-worship) and every manner of horror show are first buried beneath a cloak of secrecy...and then, when finally accomplished and secured, slowly revealed to the unsuspecting populace who watch...deep-frozen...as the hidden history is unveiled...In the circulation of...(anti-Academy) manuscripts...the revelation of the method is accomplished. Truth or consequences...Downard...is acutely aware that in exposing the conspirators he is probably serving the final dictum (in their alchemical formula)..." But Luke 8:17 predicts this, so if man doesn't act, God will, sooner or later! In the meantime, exposure itself does not defeat the cryptocracy because given the degraded and atrophied nature of modern man's perceptions and insight today, such revelations may only serve to strengthen the cryptocracy's mental hold.

The record shows that the recent revelations of occult crime have almost never been accompanied by arrests, prosecutions, convictions and punishment of the initiates involved, hence the reputation of Academy invincibility is heightened by the revelations.

Moreover the spectacular nature of the crimes revealed carry a highly charged aura of the violent and the erotic and in the final analysis, when exposed to public attention, only become further grist for the seemingly limitless public appetite for shock-titillation and passive voyeurism.

Mystical Toponomy

Exposure without action against the perpetrators of the crimes revealed, devolves into a kind of perverse advertisement for the prowess of the cryptocrats who are seen as having performed fantastic feats of criminal enterprise with a genius that renders them immune from the consequences.

The entire process as a whole smacks of that familiar occult control device of grotesque mockery of the principle touted, in this case of the notion of exposure leading to punishment and retribution.

The phrase "Truth or Consequences" given to a city in New Mexico in a process of masonic, onomatological, "mystical toponomy" first discovered by James Shelby Downard, can be seen as a karmic challenge necessary to so bold an enterprise as the making manifest of all that the cryptocracy has hidden.

Mystical toponomy and alchemical cant language are part of a process which hinges on a marriage between action in time [or recorded history] and physical locations on the earth regarded as "places of power" by the cryptocracy's magical-geographical vision of the earth as a giant chess board, symbolized by the tessellated floor of Solomon's Temple and the masonic lodge, and Alice's vision of the world in Lewis Carroll's Wonderland "fantasy."

If all this seems far-fetched we can re-state the underlying principle in more prosaic scientific terms, where it comprises a key doctrine of modern atomic theory: "Time relations among events are assumed to be first constituted by the specific physical relations obtaining between them."

The famous old American highway "Route 66" was laid out by Freemasons with the apparent intention of sending masses of automobile riders into a self-processing occult "trip." Route 66 began at the Buckingham Fountain in Chicago, near the site of the University of Chicago's collection of Aztec ritual incunabula. It ended in Barstow, California in the Mohave desert, which is for the Freemasons, the cosmic graveyard of the West, the final destiny of Anubis, the celestial jackal, otherwise known as Sirius (see Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha Von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An Essay on Myth and the Frame of Time, p. 358).

If this version of Route 66 smacks of some medieval pilgrimage made more appropriately on a camel than by car, it is for good reason. Most of Route 66 was based on a road forged in 1857 by Lt. Edward Beale and his caravan of the U.S. Camel Corps.

Beale is a highly significant symbol-name in the masonic chess game which is played with word, number, sign, symbol and destination across the face of America mystica. It was on Beale Street that the "Jazz Age," began the breakdown of music into the beastly jungle muzak that would finally result in "rock and roll."

Beale is an etymological derivative of the word for Baalzebub (or Beelzebub in the Latin rendering of the New Testament Greek) or simply, "Baal," which is also the name of the idol of the crystal-powered "New Age." In Quartzite, Arizona, under a pyramid, Lt. Edward Beale's head camel-driver, "Hi Jolly," is buried.

Truth or Consequences

There are occult links between masonic ceremonies held at the town of Truth or Consequences, New Mexico and the masonic ritual which attended the explosion of the first atomic bomb and the assassination of President Kennedy.

This mapping of the world in terms of a magico-scientific toponony is remindful of the Rosicrucian princes of the Renaissance, with their specially-sited palaces and grounds arranged in an elaborate pattern of images and symbols which functioned as a "memory theater" where, it was claimed, all knowledge, the entire encyclopedia, could be stored and recalled. The gauntlet the cryptocracy threw down at our feet in the specially orchestrated chain of ritual criminal events and locations intimately connected to Truth or Consequences, New Mexico, was an "open-air" ceremony in full public view for those who had the eyes and the intuition to see it. Much of the Process was carried on in public. This was the "truth." The supreme high-stakes gamblers of the Hermetic Academy risked "the consequences."

Granted it was a gamble, but to those whose annals contained the records of the powers and perceptions of fully human beings of old compared with the mind-bombed goofs and patsies which make up the overwhelming majority of an increasingly less-than-human modern mankind, perhaps the risk was not so great after all. It's a matter of timing.

The cryptocracy's spectacular 20th century scam could never have been accomplished in antiquity among free people. The truth of the symbolism involved would have been immediately perceived and would have resulted in swift resistance to it by the target population.

The followers of the cult of Human Brain Power whose exoteric sigil is the pentagram, would have been swinging from tall trees in short order, soon to be added to Robert K.G. Temple's inventory of martyrs wiped out by craven prisoners of "shuttered belief-systems."

If traditional man could respond quickly and resolutely to those who would tamper with God's natural order, the contemporary cryptocracy (which is blessed with the ability not to believe their own public relations propaganda), would be fully aware that the real prisoners of "shuttered belief systems" are modern people whose laziness and disconnection from reality would virtually ensure that the "consequences" would not accrue to the debit sheet of the cryptocracy, but rather to the base humanity which failed to detect the cheat. And therein lies the risk and the success (thus far) of the Truth or Consequences mechanism

If the truth of what the cryptocracy has perpetrated is grasped and acted upon, the consequences for the conspirators will be annihilation. But if the people fail to perceive the truth or fail to act on their perception, thus rendering the Process a kind of tacit consent born of apathy, amnesia and abulia, the consequence for the conspirators will be a giant-step in the advancement of their system of control, that is to say, ever tighter bonds of enslavement for humanity.

Why does the cryptocracy bother to gamble so much by going public with what it is doing to us? Because consent fuels their control like no other form of energy.

Jack the Lodge Brother

Another book containing revelations which were once of the utmost secrecy, is the late Stephen Knight's *Jack the Ripper: The Final Solution,*which documents that the world-famous Ripper killings were masonic ritual murders directed by the British government itself. "Jack the Ripper" was Sir William Gull, physician-in-ordinary to Queen Victoria, assisted by a kidnapper and a coachman.

An important point emerging from Stephen Knight's documentation is the role of the police in the Ripper conspiracy. I am not referring here to some corrupt street-corner "Bobby," but of the active involvement of the Queen of England, the Prime Minister of England, Lord Salisbury, the Commissioner of Police, Sir Charles Warren and the Assistant Commissioner of Police Sir Robert Anderson, among others.

The male conspirators were Freemasons of the highest rank and Warren was the founder of the research and intelligence arm of modern Freemasonry, the Ars Quatuor Coronati lodge. Warren did extensive research work in the Middle East in connection with the masonic project to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem.

Stephen Knight quotes a Masonic document listing the hidden praxis behind masonry:

"Our motto must be 'All means of force and hypocrisy....In order to obtain our ends we must have recourse to much slyness and artfulness..."

Knights says that one of the key masonic insights into human nature is the reaction of people to terrorism and serial ritual murders executed with great skill:

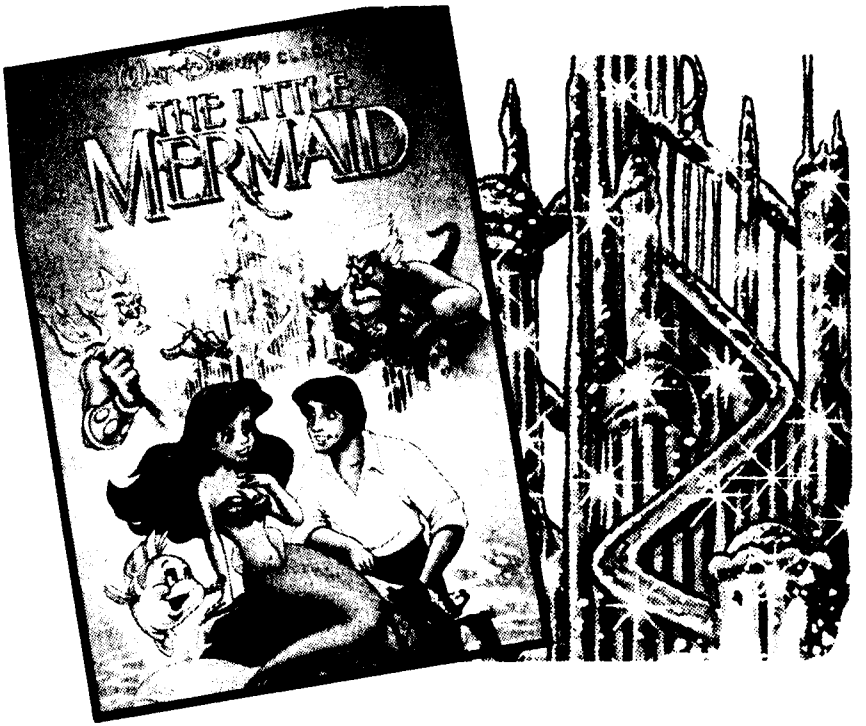
"What a dirty trick but how skillfully executed! What a swindle, but how well and with what courage it has been done!"

Knight says that masonic infiltration of police forces is a high priority and cites a masonic document: "The services of the police are of extreme importance to us, as they are able to

Marion Berry, while mayor of the nation's capitol, Washington D.C., made the gesture known as the "devil's hand" (see Adrian Frutiger, Signs and Symbols, Their Designs and Meanings, p. 262)

The Shadow State Makes a Revelation of Its Method. Note the shadow at the base of the liquor bottle. This is a message to the subconscious to pay attention, it's dark twin is about to speak.

In the 1970s, Dr. Wilson Key documented subliminal sex and death imagery placed in ice cubes in liquor ads. The liquor ad reproduced in reduced size on p. 42, comes from US News&World Report (April 29, 1991). A portion of the ad, above, is shown as it appeared in USN&WR. Notice that Seagram's draws our attention, with an arrow, to the human figures of a man and woman waltzing in formal attire. However, on closer inspection we see that their silhouette forms the torso of an inhuman, monstrous figure whose skull-like head looms horribly above them. The "hidden pleasure" is actually a hidden beast. This ad was both a "feeler" to test the current psychological decay state of the American people (relative to any protests received because of it) as well as a means of confirming us in our decay evermore, because the deadliest mind control can only be exerted with our consent. When mind control is publicly proclaimed with little or no protest, the cryptocracy gauges how far along Americans are on the path to being rendered totally mindless beasts, and escalates its soul-murdering agenda with corresponding boldness.



Bashas, a Phoenix supermarket chain, pulled home-video versions of the 1989 Disney animated film* The Little Mermaid *off its shelves after a customer complained that the video box contained a phallic image. Disney spokeswoman Tanya Steele said about a dozen people have complained about the image, but she said she doubted the firm would alter it.

The use of subliminal symbols is widespread in our thoroughly Satanic, American "pop" culture. On the right, the castle on the cover of Disney's The Little Mermaid videotape, is shown closeup, revealing a lewd image disguised as the castle's central spire.

Policeman refuses to tell mason secrets

By KIRK MAKIN

A Metro Toronto policeman who is a Freemason refused to give some information about his secret society yesterday at the Ernst Zundel trial, saying he had vowed never to reveal it.

Defence counsel Douglas Christie was interested in particular in a purported Freemason oath under which the throat of any violator is cut and his tongue is torn out and buried at sea.

"I'm not free to tell you," said Sergeant Roy Bassett, who has achieved the Freemason rank of Divine Prince of the Royal Secret.

"You swore on the witness stand to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth," Mr. Christie said. "But you have declined to give an answer be cause you swore an oath to keep it secret?"

"Yes," Sgt. Bassett replied.

"So I now know whose oath takes precedence," Mr. Christie said.

Moments later, the lawyer tried again to get information about the oath, which purportedly states: "My throat will be cut across, my tongue torn out by the root and buried in the sand of the sea at low water mark or a cable's length from the shore where the tide regularly ebbs and falls twice in 24 hours."

Sgt. Bassett refused again to discuss it, prompting Mr. Christie to say: "He should, Your Honor."

"No," County Court Judge Hugh Locke said. "I rule you can't ask that question because it is irrelevant to the issue to be tried."

On the Magnum P.I. police television series, Magnum was seen wearing a signet ring of the double-barred Cross of Lorraine. In one episode, Magnum's Black buddy, "TC," is shown with a baseball cap that is embroidered on the front with his initials and the 'Sigil of Baphomet,' which was used by Satanist Aleister Crowley as his personal emblem, and is also used by the Sovereign Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry when signing documents.

Reproduced above is a photo of merchandise from a catalog of items sold to police officers. The item designated by the letter M on the right is the Cross of Lorraine signet ring. According to the book Holy Blood, Holy Grail (Dell paperback edition, p. 167), the Cross of Lorraine is "The banner of the conspirators..." The Cross of Lorraine represents the Beast System which works against Christianity in the name of Christianity. Those who wear the ring are "double-crossing" Christ.

Sir Charles Warren. Chief Commissioner of Police during the Jack the Ripper killings. One of the highest ranking Freemasons in the world at that time and founder of the Ars Quatuor Coronati Lodge for masonic research. Warren was one of the masterminds behind the Jack the Ripper killings, which were masonic ritual murders.

Warren also did extensive work in the Middle East in connection with laying the archaeological groundwork for the re-building of the Temple of Herod in Jerusalem.

Organizations and People

Samuel H. Cohen

Cohen named to Grand Lodge

TORONTO –

Samuel H. Cohen, a native Torontonian and active communal leader, recently became the third Mason in the organization's history, to become the Canadian representative to the Grand Lodge of the State of Israel, part of an international network of Masonic Lodges founded on "the purest principals of piety and virtue."

The lineage of modern Masons can be traced back to the stonemasons and builders of the Middle Ages who in those days helped build castles, cathedrals and abbeys throughout Europe.

Officially established in Great Britain in 1717, Masonry appears to be shrouded in mystery. Members explain that only the rituals and allegories are secret adding that although it is based on religious concepts, it is not a religious organization.

Today, Christians, Jews, Moslems, Hindus and other Masons who believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, are working together to build bridges of understanding between themselves and all mankind.

Organized on a system of Grand Lodges, each Lodge is sovereign within its own jurisdiction. Of the 650 Masonic Lodges in Ontario, two are predominately Jewish, Mount Sinai Lodge and Palestine Lodge.

More than 200 Masons from both Lodges attended a reception in Cohen's honor, where he was formally appointed as the representative of the Grand Lodge in the Province of Ontario to the Grand Lodge of Israel, a position previously held by A. Lou Copeland and the late D. Lou Harris.

A member of the Masonic Order since 1955, Cohen has held numerous positions in the Mount Sinai Lodge and in the Grand Lodge of Canada. He became Worshipful Master in 1969 and was appointed to the Grand Lodge of Canada in 1980.

"Masonry teaches us to be open to the realities of pluralism in our society. It teaches us tolerance and understanding," explains Cohen.

"Today, Masonry continues to build a road of brotherly love and truth. It teaches us to be charitable to the poor and to look after the widow and the orphan. In short, Masonry is striving to build a better world by building better men to live in it."

Cohen is active in both the Jewish and general communities. He is a past president of the Adath Israel Congregation, and his activities include participation at the Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Toronto Jewish Congress, as well as the Shalom Hartman Institute of Jerusalem.

The certificate of representation was presented to Cohen by Copeland, who is a past grand master. Surrounded by Lodge brothers and family members — his wife Beverley and children, Jordan, Risa and Esti — his brother Max Cohen presented an illuminated bible to the Mount Sinai Lodge on behalf of the family.

That same evening, Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of the Adath Israel Congregation, was initiated into Masonry as a member of Mount Sinai Lodge.

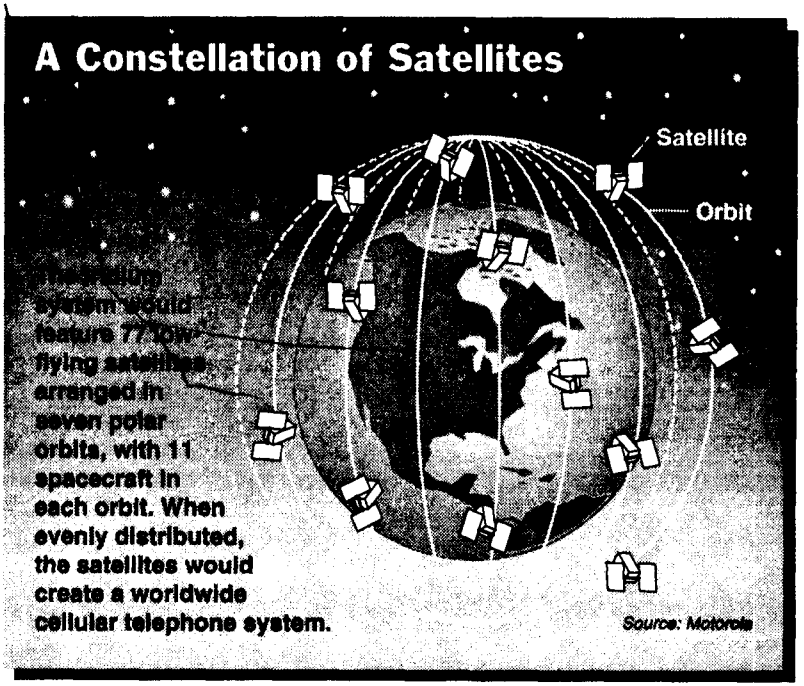
In his new official position, Cohen is planning to conduct a Masonic pilgrimage to Israel for Jews and non-Jews in the spring of 1991.

The Great Seal of the United States. Scholars have long puzzled over the meaning of the highly symbolic U.S. Great Seal, which appears on every one dollar bill. Notice that the pyramid, the universal sign of tyrannical rule of the few over the many, is unfinished. The "All-Seeing Eye" above the pyramid represents its hovering capstone.

The Great Seal is the sigil of the occult project for the enslavement of mankind and the extirpation of even the possibility of freedom. The project symbolized by the pyramid will be accomplished when the astonishing, "All Seeing Eye" capabilities of computer and satellite surveillance technology, keep track of every human being whether in buildings, the wilderness or even underground. An altered Seal will then be issued, showing the capstone placed atop a finished pyramid.

The motto above the pyramid is, "Favor Our Enterprise." The banner beneath it reads, "New Order of the Ages." The date at the base is 1776, the year the Illuminati or Beenan Orden ("Order of Bees") was founded. If the cryptocracy manages to obtain consent from the public to use the computer-satellite surveillance network on the public itself (in the name of "reducing automobile traffic jams, controlling illegal aliens, fighting crime, destroying terrorists," etc.) then our society will indeed become an insect world, an "order of bees."

Note too that the cryptocracy has deliberately allowed the destruction of America's mass transit railroad system, permitted violent crime to flourish, encouraged a virtual open border alien immigration policy and meddled in the religious wars of distant foreign nations thereby making America a terrorist target, because without these crises the pretext for a police state would be absent.



Satellite coverage of all the earth

Implementation of the "All Seeing-Eye." Just as aborted babies are being used as "tissue farms" with the approval of an increasingly brutalized public, in the name of "helping mankind find cures for disease," so too is the net of computer and satellite surveillance technology being thrown over the earth for the "good cause" of better telephones and the fostering of a "peaceful global village" of communication. The idolatry of modern science and technology as the god whose "inevitable" march "ahead" constitutes our salvation, is the True Faith of most people. In the "Constellation of Satellites" cited in the article (satellites can read a car license plate from 500 miles above the earth), we have the "All-Seeing Eye" of the masonic pyramid. Throughout the Book of Revelation, in those passages dealing with the Beast, the Bible makes reference to the "miracles," and "great wonders" the Beast will produce: "And he deceiveth them that dwell on earth by the means of those miracles..." [Rev. 13: 13-14]. In a two-page advertisement in part two of the NY Times Magazine of Sept. 23, 1990, sponsored by "AT&T Network Systems," the company proclaimed that its technology is "Half Network, Half Beast" and it described its computers and phones as a "beastly assortment" capable of "tricks you never thought possible." AT&T openly announces to the public the exact nature of certain types of modern technology because our consent fuels their control.

Just What the Eye Picks Up

Perception Research Services Inc.

What really catches her eye? The lab can tell.

PERCEPTION Research Services, a market research company in Englewood, N.J., has come up with an electronic eye-tracking system that tries to measure exactly which parts of an advertisement or a product's package is attracting the attention of consumers.

To measure packaging's effectiveness, for instance, a volunteer of the sort that the product should appeal to — a woman in her 30's, say — sits in front of a television screen and looks at shelves stocked with products.

A computer, guided by a monitor hidden behind the screen, signals a generator to transmit an invisible beam of light into her pupils. The light, unnoticed by the volunteer, follows her pupils as they move across the screen. Sensitive light-detecting equipment picks up the beam's reflection and records it as a continuous road that her eye is traveling.

In a back room, researchers at their own screens follow a white dot that corresponds to her visual path. The beam's reflection is also stored in the computer as a series of coordinates, which are plotted in relation to the product's name, the ingredients' list and other parts of the package.

Elliot Young, the president of Perception Research, said, "It will tell you where people started to look, how much time they spent looking at any given spot, whether they went back to re-examine anything and, most important, what they missed."

N.Y. Times, p. F-9, June 9, 1991.

The Beast system and its control "miracles," warned against in chapter thirteen of the New Testament Book of Revelation, is finding fulfillment in the incredible state of modern technology now available to governments and corporations. This technology is so powerful that it approaches the operative definition of "magic" as it was understood by the ancients. Occasional news reports briefly mention this technology usually, as in the article above, in connection with some "advance" in the realm of medicine, consumerism or the military. In the electronic eye-tracking system of "Perception Research," a television signals a machine to transmit an invisible beam of light into the eye of a person, tracking every movement of that person's eye without detection.

Supreme Commander of Freemasons Gets Flag that Went to the Moon

Colonel Edwin A. "Buzz" Aldrin (right), captain of the first Apollo moon landing and himself the second man ever to walk on the moon, presents a flag embroidered with the Two-Headed Eagle symbol of the Knights Templar, to Luther A. Smith, Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction, of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry. Astronaut Aldrin, a 32nd degree Freemason, carried this flag and wore a "lodge jewel" while on the moon.

Eating Raoul . . . and Others

"How would you like to bite into a part-human bacon cheeseburger?" asks Michael Colgan, Ph.D., in the journal Nutrition & fitness (sic) (vol. 10, no. 1 & 2). In five years they'll be at a burger stand near you, predicts the author. The U.S. Department of Agriculture's research center in Beltsville, Md., has been inserting human genes into fertilized swine eggs, and a herd of "hupigs" now resides at the center. One goal of such research is to manufacture "spare parts for humans," that is, genetically engineered organs to replace diseased human organs; another goal is to "design" animals for more efficient meat production.

The USDA creatures reportedly suffer from coordination so poor that they can barely walk. They also are subject to arthritis and lung and gut diseases. State and federal laws severely restrict access by journalists and the public, and photographs of the "hunimals" are forbidden.

INSIDE ISRAEL

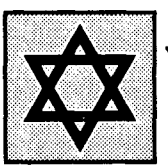
Temple mission raises tensions

THE GOLDEN swell of the Dome of the Rock, girdled by the stone battlements of the Old City, is to Jerusalem what the Eiffel Tower is to Paris and St Peter's is to Rome. It is the picture every tourist takes home.

Next to it stands the more mundane, but more revered Al Aqsa mosque. Several times a day, the muezzin's call to prayer reverberates through the city and echoes from the rocky hillside of the Mount of Olives.

But whereas the visitor may savour the Oriental grace of the Islamic complex known to Arabs as the Haram al-Sharif (the Noble Sanctuary), a resentful faction of zealous Jews who want to celebrate once more in the Biblical temple see only Muslim squatters occupying the site of the temple destroyed by the Romans in AD70.

The ancient Jewish historian, Josephus, said the marble-clad Herodian edifice on the Temple Mount was a "magnificence beyond compare".



Anton la Guardia reports from Jerusalem on this week's Feast of the Tabernacles Procedures for animal sacrifices and other rituals are being studied.

Meanwhile, vestments have been made for the men of 20 families of the priestly Cohen clan, at a cost of about £870 for each set of four garments.

The most important work, however, is the search for the Red Heifer. This young cow would be slaughtered, and the ashes used for the essential ritual of purifying people and implements. Without an unblemished Red Heifer, said Mr Richman, impurity cannot be cleansed and the temple could not operate. A farm in Israel is working to adapt genetically promising animals found in Sweden four years ago. But more hopeful breeding is being carried out on a herd recently discovered in Mississippi and endorsed by a group of rabbis. Mr Richman said that American Christian fundamentalists, who believe that the raising of the temple will herald the Second Coming, are helping to promote the research.

Israeli Kabalist — Advisor, Rabbi Shani, In N.Y.

Again this year, Rabbi Yosef Shani is visiting New York. The renowned Jerusalem expert on Kabala will receive individuals and couples for consultations till May 29. His advice is widely sought in Israel and in New York for all kinds of personal problems.

Although Rabbi Shani has no pretensions of being a doctor, a psychologist, or an economist, his advice has helped a great many people. "Clients" often return for further advice, and send their friends to the rabbi, as well.

He focuses on three areas: Kabalistic astrology, Zoharian palmistry, and the Kabalistic significance of names. Unlike gypsy "mysticism," these do not pretend to foretell the future. Rather, they reveal the nature and tendencies of a person, past behavior, and implications for present-day situations.

Rabbi Shani is also noted for his lectures and booklets on Kabala, Halacha and Jewish philosophy. Many tales are told about the rabbi's role in healing of "incurables," the conceiving of the "infertile," the release of the "imprisoned," the renewed solvency of the "bankrupt," and the exoneration of those facing harsh "justice."

The rabbi charges no fee for consultations, but he graciously accepts contributions for his publishing programs and for charitable distibutions under the aegis of his Shaar Yosef Institution.

Rabbi Shani plans to be in Brooklyn through Monday May 29. His address is [redacted]. For an appointment please call [redacted].

Message to Albany: Baal-Humbug

Special to The New York Times

ALBANY, Jan. 7 — It is a symptom of the times that New York State's credit rating has become not only a financial benchmark but a significant political one as well.

News Analysis

In the last two years, the state's credit rating has twice been downgraded because of the inability of its leaders to balance the budget. In both cases, Wall Street rating agencies have made it clear that the dismal grades were given primarily for the state's political failure, not the sluggishness of its economy.

That was certainly so on Monday when Moody's Investors Service lowered the rating on the state's appropriation-backed debt from A to Baal, the second-lowest rating of any state. In a three-page statement, Moody's dedicated only a fraction of a sentence to what it called "protracted weakness in the economy."

The rest of the statement focused on the state's failure to close its $875 million budget gap, the anticipated growth of the state's accumulated deficit, and the inability to restructure budget priorities in any fundamental way. All, it suggested, were failures of political will.

N.Y. Times, Jan. 8, 1992, p. B-4.

"Baal" is ostensibly a credit rating given by a Wall Street bank agency. The public association of Wall Street banks with the Canaanite devil-god is an interesting symbolical acknowledgement of the true nature of the U.S. banking system. Not only do the bankers not keep this association secret, they publicly proclaim it. Since money is the god of most people, who's going to object?

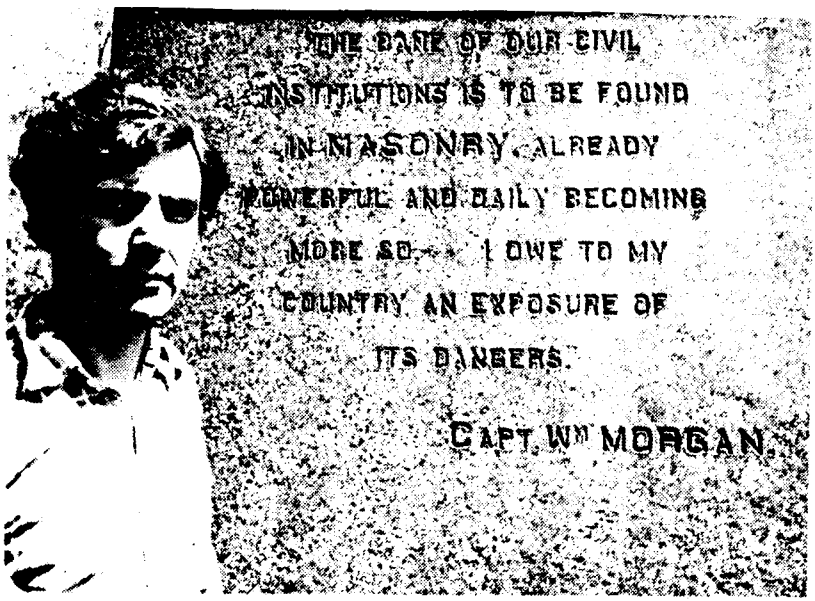
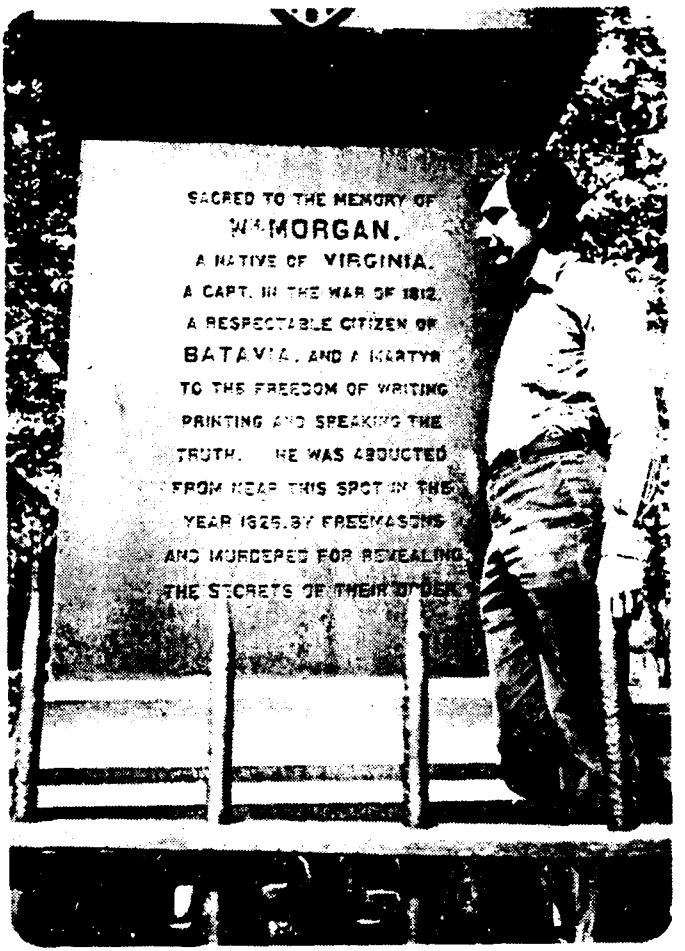
The kidnapping of William Morgan by Freemasons.



The author at the William Morgan Monument in Batavia, N.Y. The inscription reads: "The Bane of our civil institutions is to be found in Masonry, already powerful and daily becoming more so. I owe to my country an exposure of its dangers. Capt. Wm. Morgan."



Inscription at the base of the other side of the Morgan Monument. It reads, "Sacred to the memory of Wm. Morgan, a native of Virginia, a captain in the War of 1812, a respectable citizen of Batavia, and a martyr to the freedom of writing, printing and speaking the truth. He was abducted from near this spot in the year 1826 by Freemasons, and murdered for revealing the secrets of their order." The erection of the monument was financed by public donations.

A national movement, the Anti-Mason Party, arose in the wake of Morgan's murder and masonic lodges across the northeast shut down. The party's candidate for Governor of New York won almost half the votes in 1828. The Anti-Mason party has the distinction of having convened, at Baltimore, the first national convention for the nomination of a presidential candidate in the history of the U.S. The Anti-Mason Party's candidate for president, William Wirt, won the state of Vermont in the 1832 election.

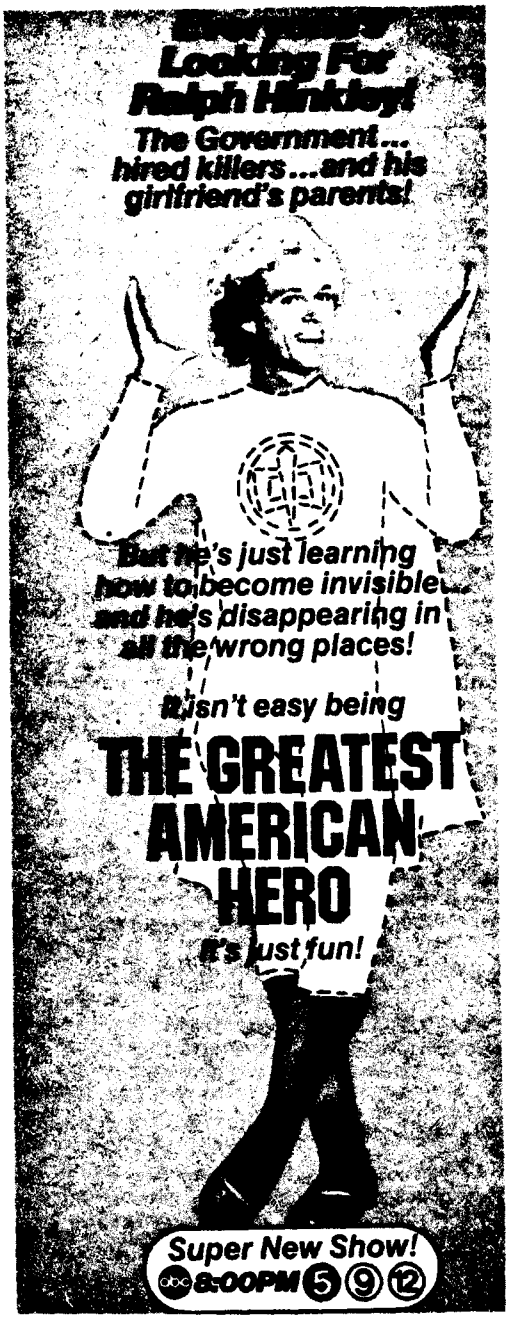
All the Pyramid's Men

The Confederate officer on the left is First Lt. John Oden, of the Tenth Alabama Volunteer Infantry who fought at First Manassas, Chancellorsville and Antietam, where he was seriously wounded. Lying bleeding, Oden used a stick and his own blood to draw masonic symbols on a paper. Then he called out to the Union troops on picket duty to take the paper to any Yankee who was a Freemason.

It was carried to a Union Colonel who was a mason, but not of a high enough degree to comprehend Oden's symbolic message. Another mason, Union Capt. Perry was summoned and he recognized the drawings and announced that a fellow mason was in distress. Four Northern masons crept out to the field, placed the wounded Southerner on a cot and carried him to the field hospital of the 5th New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry where he was treated. When the Union Army moved on, Oden was sent to the private home of a physician to recuperate, rather than to a prisoner of war camp. Lt. Oden survived the War Between the States.

While at first sight, this is a touching story of the brotherhood of Freemasonry, some of the glow dims when we recall that a non-mason, Christian Confederate would have been left to bleed to death. Moreover, if cooperation like this existed between brother masons in the field, one is left to wonder at what degree collusion between Confederate and Union Freemasons of high office and rank, took place behind the scenes.

A New Hampshire Union Army veteran and Freemason in full masonic regalia. This former soldier of the North wears the medal of the "Grand Army of the Republic" (GAR) on the right, in addition to his occult symbols. It has often been said that the waging of the horrible American Civil War was deliberate and planned. False Christians on both sides ordained the evil and sinful military slaughter of fellow Christians but of what benefit could the Civil War have been to the masonic cryptocracy? One effect was the creation of an interesting electoral phenomenon which lasted for a century. Southern people would vote for almost the devil himself if he were a Democrat running against the hated Republicans. In this way the "Solid South" was created and cryptocrats such as Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman, men who involved our nation in ever greater Satanic wars and carnage, were elected to the presidency. The cycle was broken in 1968 and no longer applies today but it served the cryptocracy superbly for 103 years.



Two weeks before Hinckley shot President Ronald Reagan, the TV program described in an ABC Network ad (reproduced at left), debuted on the nation's airwaves. The Greatest American Hero was named Hinkley. The ad mentions the government and hired killers. We are informed that Hinkley has the ability to become invisible, disappear and be in "the wrong places."

On his chest he's wearing a symbol pertaining to flight, either of that of a bird or a vehicle. Hinkley is dressed as a transvestite, wearing a dress and ladies shoes and Hinkley's hands are raised in the universal masonic signal of distress.

It is a documented fact that after Hinckley shot the president, First Lady Nancy Reagan consulted a San Fancisco "astrologer" who was allowed to set the schedules and agenda for the remainder of Reagan's entire presidency. (See For the Record by Former White House Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan. In an interview in the L.A. Times for Nov. 21, 1989, p.22, Regan said that the astrologer had "controlled the workings of the presidency").

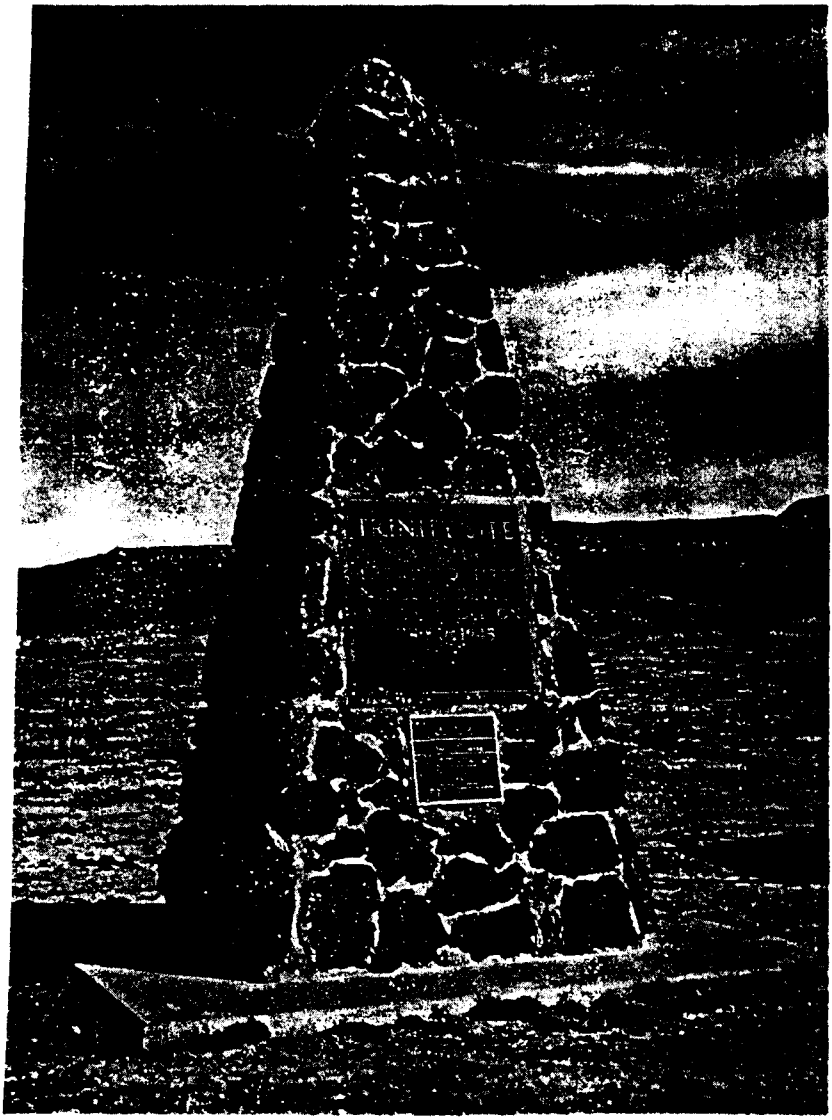
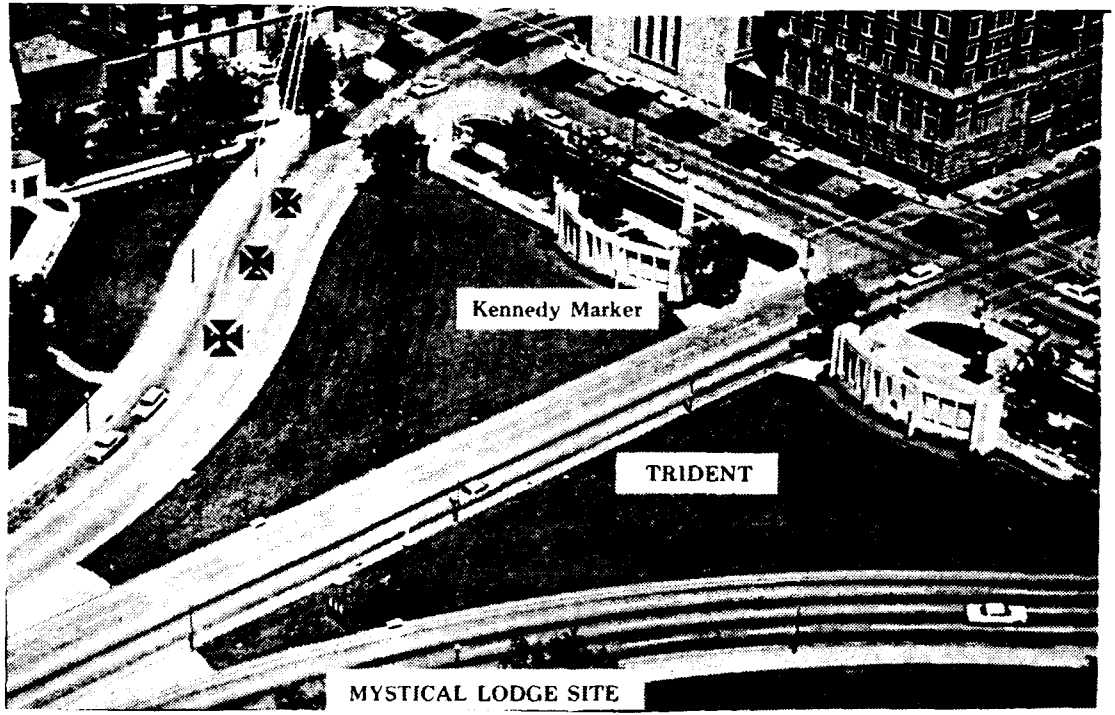
LEFT: Harry S. Truman, 33rd President of the U.S. and 33rd degree Freemason, in full occult regalia, in an official lodge portrait. Truman ordered the atomic incineration of two Japanese cities, killing at least 150,000 people, mostly women and children. Roosevelt's chief of staff, Admiral Leahy, admitted to Walter Trohan of the Chicago Tribune, that Japan was ready to surrender conditionally without an invasion by U.S. ground forces. It was Truman's insistence upon "unconditional surrender" that set the stage for Hiroshima and Nagasaki.



The Trinity Site. A pyramid marks the spot where the first atomic bomb in history was detonated, in New Mexico, the "Land of Enchantment." The plaque reads "Trinity Site."



Another Trinity Site: Dealey Plaza, in Dallas, Texas, site of the city's first masonic lodge. It was here that the President dubbed, "the King of Camelot" was murdered, near the Triple Underpass and the Trinity river. The Third Trinity Site is at the Dome of the Rock, Jerusalem. All three Trinity Sites are located near the 33 degree of north parallel latitude.

throw a screen over our enterprises...as well as punish those who refuse to submit."

Knight summarizes the secret masonic praxis:

"...Freemasons applaud violence, terror and crime providing it is carried out in a crafty manner. One section of the (masonic) notes says humor is all-important and the most appalling crimes may be committed under its cloak. The one (Jack the) Ripper letter likely to have been genuine suggests that Jack the Ripper was going about his crimes in just this way, committing ghoulish murders with a Puckish sense of fun. If Masonic supremacy appears in jeopardy, it is re-established by a show of strength, by crimes of violence, perpetrated to demonstrate...the far-reaching power of Freemasonry to initiates the world over..."

(Stephen Knight, Jack the Ripper: The Final Solution, Granada Books paperback edition) pp. 158-162).

Knight's book contains the making manifest of what is hidden in these legendary ritual masonic Ripper murders. Knight demonstrates that the women were butchered according to masonic ritual, much like William Hogarth's terrifying engraving, The Reward of Cruelty, which depicts a masonic ritual murder--interestingly enough--performed by physicians.

Four of the five female Ripper victim's throats were all cut from left to right in accordance with the masonic Entered Apprentice "penal sign." In some cases their intestines were severed, lifted out of the body and placed over the poor victim's left shoulder. In masonic ritual, the three "Juwes," Jubela, Jubelo and Jubelum, are all killed by having their bodies ripped open and the entrails thrown over their left shoulders.

The Ripper murder ritual also pertained to the significance of place in masonic immolation. Catherine Eddowes' body was dumped in Mitre Square, London. Mitre tavern, at the entrance to the square, was the meeting place of the masonic Lodge of Joppa. According to masonic mythology, it was on the coast of Joppa that the three "Juwes" were captured. Also, mitre and square are the basic tools of the mason.

Eddowes apron, soaked with blood, was discovered on Goulston Street in a hallway of a building. Above the bloody apron, on the wall, a message had been written in chalk: "The Juwes are the men that will not be blamed for nothing."

The double negative reference is not to Jewish people but to the aforementioned three Entered Apprentices of masonic mythology, who were both ritually murdered and themselves ritual murderers. The message was erased by Sir Charles Warren, the Chief Commissioner of Police and one of the highest Freemasons in Britain. Warren nevertheless made a note of the message which can be found in the files of the Public Record Office, in the section "Private Letter Book of the Metropolitan Police."

The genius, cunning and collusion exhibited in the Ripper murders would be repeated beginning in 1976 with "the Son of Sam."

Son of Uncle Sam

It was after midnight on July 29, 1976 when Mr. and Mrs. Mike Lauria returned to their apartment in the Bronx after attending a funeral. Their eighteen year old daughter Donna was sitting in the passenger side of her girlfriend Jody Valente's car, parked in front of the building where Donna lived with her parents. The women were chatting after an evening of dancing at a discotheque.

Mike reminded Donna that it was 1 a.m. and that she had to get up early for work. Donna replied that her poodle dog Beau needed to be taken for a walk. Mike said he'd bring Beau down. In the meantime Donna and Judy continued their chat. While Mr. Lauria fetched the dog, three cannon-like blasts resounded in the street.

Standing on the sidewalk just a few feet away, the killer had fired through the car window where Donna sat. She was killed instantly by a bullet in the forearm which entered her back. Jody was shot in the thigh. She would survive to give the police a description of the shooter: White male, in his 30s, short, husky and brazen: the killer had walked, not run, from the murder scene. Twelve more shootings and five deaths later, on August 10, 1977, pudgy, 24 year old David Richard Berkowitz was apprehended and charged with the spectacular "Son of Sam" serial murders, which had terrorized millions of New Yorkers for more than a year. In handcuffs he smiled for the cameras, sending a collective chill up the spine of America.

His eerie grin made the cover of Newsweek. ABC TV spent half of its nationwide, evening broadcast devoted solely to the news of the capture of the Son of Sam. Berkowitz confessed. Deputy New York Police Inspector Timothy Dowd wrote "case closed" on the department's blackboard. New Yorkers breathed a sigh of relief. Berkowitz was declared guilty and sentenced. He has a steady engagement (315 years) in New York's state prison.

Another lone nut had made the case for more stringent gun control; another psycho had been caught and convicted. All the i's were dotted and the t's crossed. Or were they?

As Mr. Lauria was bounding down the stairs with Donna's poodle dog, his daughter was taking her last gulp of air courtesy of a large-bore, five shot revolver known as a Bulldog .44 magnum, the weapon of choice in the Sam series of murders.

Berkowitz came to be known as the Son of Sam because he claimed to have received his orders to kill from a dog named Sam. The dog was actually named Harvey and was owned by Sam Carr, Berkowitz's neighbor in Yonkers, a New York City suburb. In a classic Hollywood film, actor Jimmy Stewart claims to receive commands from an invisible creature named Harvey.

Berkowitz sacrificed a dog named Rocket in December of 1976 at 18 Wicker Street, Yonkers. Two days later, three German shepherds were found slain in a gutter adjacent to Wicker Street. While Berkowitz was in custody, three more German Shepherd dogs were decapitated in Yonkers. John Wheat Carr, son of Sam Carr, is alleged to have kept the ear of one of these dogs on his wall. German shepherds used to be known as police dogs. John Wheat Carr had the ear of the police from the beginning.

Several weeks after the death of John Carr a new TV program debuted on the nation's airwaves. It was called SAM about a dog of that name who took orders from the police.

As we have noted, most of the geomantical siting of the Temple architecture of Egypt, the Gnostics, the Masons, the Templars and the Rosicrucians is calculated to the Solstitial rising of the "Dog Star" Sirius. Sirius is the hidden supreme god of the secret societies of the West, the subject of untold centuries of veneration and sacrifice.

At the site of the April 17, 1977 Son of Sam murders of Valentina Suriani and Alexander Esau in the Bronx, the gunman left an envelope at the crime scene addressed to Police Detective Joseph Borelli. The packet contained a letter filled with occult symbolism and mocking hints of identity, reminiscent of the anonymous Rosicrucian manifestos circulated in the 17th century.

A portion of the letter was written in an imitation of a Scottish accent: "Me hoot, it urts sonny boy" (My heart, it hurts). In late May New York Daily News columnist Jimmy Breslin received a letter from someone who had inside information on the "Son of Sam" murder spree. Portions of it were published in the newspaper and created a sensation, transforming New York City into a panic-filled, psychic pressure-cooker. The police attributed it to Berkowitz but a handwriting expert testified that there was no way Berkowitz could have written it:

"Hello from the gutters of N.Y.C. which are filled with dog manure, vomit, stale wine, urine and blood. Hello from the sewers of N.Y.C. which swallow up these delicacies when they are washed away by the sweeper trucks.

"Hello from the cracks in the sidewalks of N.Y.C. and from the ants that dwell in the cracks and feed on the dried blood of the dead that seep into these cracks...

"Mr. Breslin, sir don't think that because you haven't heard from me for a while that I went to sleep. No, rather I am still here. Like a spirit roaming the night. Thirsty, hungry, seldom stopping to rest; anxious to please Sam. I love my work. Now the void has been filled.

"...Remember Ms. Lauria. Thank you. In their blood and from the gutter. 'Sam's creation' .44. Here are some names to help you along. Forward them to the inspector... 'The Duke of Death.' 'The Wicked King Wicker'... 'John Wheaties-Rapist and Suffocater of Young Girls...'

A popular 1973 film entitled The Wicker Man, is set on a Scottish island where a policeman investigates an occult group involved in pagan ritual sacrifice to an effigy of the demon entity, King Wicker.

In April of 1977, during the height of the Sam murders, "by coincidence," The Wicker Man movie was rerun at a Manhattan theater. The word wicker has many denotations and connotations one of which is "to bend," as in the "bending" of reality. It is also connected to witchcraft through its derivative, wicca.

The Sam Carr family ran a telephone answering service in Yonkers, not far from where David Berkowitz lived. Wheat Carr was Sam's daughter. She handled police dispatches as part of the family's telephone service chores. Michael and John Wheat were Sam's sons.

John was stationed as a sergeant in the air force at the U.S. base in Minot, North Dakota. Like one of David Berkowitz's attorneys, Leon Stern, John Wheat Carr was shot to death. In addition to "Wicker," one of the other names that had been signed in the letter to Jimmy Breslin was, "John Wheaties--Rapist and Suffocater of Young Girls."

Michael Carr died in an automobile accident, allegedly after his car's mechanical parts had been tampered with.

In pagan times, human sacrifices were sometimes offered to the goddess Ceres, the deity of grain. John Wheat Carr was killed in Minot, which in French is a unit of measurement of grain, as in a minot of wheat.

The handwritten letter to Jimmy Breslin which was published in part in the New York Daily News, has been definitely confirmed as coming from someone implicated in the Son of Sam murders. The police said Berkowitz wrote it. Handwriting authority Charles Hamilton insists it is not Berkowitz's writing.

At the bottom of the letter, beneath the words "Son of Sam," is a rendering of an occult sigil created by one of the most famous Black magicians of the 19th century, the Frenchman Eliphas Levi. Levi, whose real name was Alphonse-Louis Constant, called himself Eliphas as a play on the Latin word for elephant, elephas, whose demon familiar is supposed to be the "Behemoth." In the April, 1977 letter found at the site of the Suriani-Esau murders, the killer wrote, "I am the 'monster'--'Beelzebub'--the 'Chubby Behemoth."

A little over two months later, on June 25, Judy Placido and Salvatore Lupo danced the night away at the popular Elephas Disco, located in the Bayside section of Queens. After Elephas closed for the night, they sat in a friend's car in the Elephas parking lot. Son of Sam was there too.Three shots were fired, hitting Placido in the neck and shoulder and grazing her head. Lupo was slightly injured by flying glass. Placido had the good luck to recover from her wounds.

Further research into the 19th century drawings of Eliphas Levy has turned up an elaborate, medallion-like sigil containing the words "Berkaial" and Sam Car written backwards: Amasarac (a/sam/a/car). Levy's sigil was drawn more than a century ago!

The Gannett-Westchester newspaper reporter who covered the Son of Sam case and wrote a book about it was John Wheat Carr's best friend in high school, Maury Terry. Terry never told his newspaper readers about his relationship with one of the key suspects in the Sam case. He later explained that he had forgotten that he and Carr had been friends.

New York police commanders and detectives and even a child-molesting district attorney were involved in the Son of Sam cult and/or its cover-up. The cult leads to the highest levels of U.S. officialdom. Witnesses to Son of Sam murders such as Tom Zaino and Cacilia Davis, who gave descriptions of the gunman and other details at variance with the script of one pat description and one lone gunman, and who were supposedly under "police protection," had their identities leaked to the news media by the police, placing their lives in jeopardy and potentially intimidating them from testifying.

When Berkowitz left behind a long list of phone numbers in his Yonkers apartment of people "in high places" linked to the Son of Sam murders, those telephone numbers were never officially investigated by any police agency; at least not for the record.

Berkowitz had no trial, only a sentencing. He was never interrogated. Detectives chatted with him for thirty minutes, off the record. Psychiatrists assigned to Berkowitz never asked him if anyone else was involved in the crimes. When queried in prison if anyone in an official capacity had ever once asked Berkowitz if others were involved, he replied, "I don't think so." NYPD Commander Michael Dowd closed the case and the investigation on the night of Berkowitz's arrest; the night the investigation should have begun in earnest.

The media cooperated fully at the time, never questioning a single aspect of the infallible presentation of Berkowitz as the lone nut.

The Black Arts adepts who wear police badges, occupy judge's seats and media editor's desks are not simply "crazed" nor are such intensely publicized ritual murders merely superstitious sacrifices to some kooky devil-god. The Son of Sam murders were a brilliantly orchestrated ritual whose ceremonial aspects were as precise and detailed as the internal workings of a clock.

This theater of death began as a ritual for the cult-members themselves and ended as a giant magical ceremony for the processing of the entire nation, because in the worldwide broadcast of the Son of Sam murders was also broadcast the magical symbols of the "Wicker Man" and of Eliphas Levy (see for example Newsweek, Aug. 22, 1977, p. 19).

This is the alchemical psychodrama for the transformation of humanity. We are procesed just by reading or watching "the news," associating death and terror, power and potency, with an old demonic symbol by a 19th century adept of Black magic whose illustration of the hermaphroditic demon of the Knights Templars, Baphomet, is perhaps the most widely recognized occult symbol in modern history.

Readers of the New York Daily News learned to associate "The Wicked King of Wicker" with murder and terror. At the thought of King Wicker, millions felt fear. This fear was imprinted on their minds. This is the same control process hundreds of peasants were put through a thousand years ago while standing in front of a giant wicker effigy, inside of which was caged a doomed human sacrifice destined for burning.

The only difference is that the peasants knew that their leaders wanted them to fear an occult image. Modern people imbibe occult fear-technology while imagining that there is no such thing. The imprint's impact is doubled when veiled under such ignorance.

Those who think ritual has no power to significantly alter behavior have not studied Catholicism closely. One of the most influential liturgical rites in the history of Christendom was the Tridentine Latin mass. By requiring attendance at the Latin mass every Sunday, on pain of mortal sin, Rome converted almost the whole of Europe to Catholicism.

The occult cryptocracy has a much more refined inducement for attendance at their masonic ritual: spectacular optical. Few need to be induced to watch TV or read a sensational, mass market picture magazine or newspaper. In fact, we pay to do so.

Of course, many serial murders are nothing more than the work of a single individual acting out a graphic horror movie he saw, or responding to powerful "psychotic" impulses for aggression and predation. But many other serial murders involve a cult protected by the U.S. government and the corporate media, with strong ties to the police.

These murders are actually intricately choreographed rituals; performed first on a very intimate and secret scale, among the initiates themselves in order to program them, then on a grand scale, amplified incalculably by the electronic media.

In the end what we have is a highly symbolic, ritual working broadcast to millions of people, a Satanic inversion; a Black mass, where the "pews" are filled by the entire nation and through which humanity is paganized, brutalized and debased in this, the "Nigredo" phase of the alchemical process.

The French adept Antonin Artaud, architect of the theory of the "Theater of Cruelty" with its transformative power, and the inspiration for the extreme sex-and-death media of our time, had this to say about the processing of the 'Group Mind':

"Aside from trifling witchcraft of country sorcerers, there are tricks of global hoodoo in which all alerted consciousnesses participate periodically...That is how strange forces are aroused and transported to the astral vault, to that dark dome which is composed above all of...the poisonous aggressiveness of the evil minds of most people...the formidable tentacular oppression of a kind of civic magic which will soon appear undisguised."

The issue of controlling humanity with esoteric words and symbols encoded within a play, a media spectacular or a ritual is one of the most difficult for people to comprehend. That is why most people are viewed with utter contempt as "cowans," "the profane," the "gentiles" and the "goyim" (cattle) by secret society initiates.

"I think we are farmed," Charles Fort said of humanity. It was Fort who also suggested that man deliberately invented the dogma of materialism in order to shield himself from the evidence of what was being done to him by means of psycho-spiritual warfare methods hyped by "coincidence," symbolism and ritual.

The closer a researcher gets to the Son of Sam case, the more one sees an elaborate ritual. It began in Untermyer Park in North Yonkers, New York. In 1903, a reputed Satanist of considerable wealth, Samuel Untermyer, created a fantasy in stone and statuary brought from Europe, on the site of part of the water system for New York City, the Yonkers aqueduct, an area which was also honeycombed with a warren of tunnels leading to the aqueduct; a subterranean world that ran for miles.

A little over seventy years later the Son of Sam cult held their first rituals in Untermyer Park, in front of crumbling columns, decaying buildings and fright masks carved in stone. Planning for the murders occurred in a fire-charred abandoned mansion which had once belonged to the estate of the Warburg-Rothschild family in Greenburgh, New York.

Terry Patterson, an army buddy of Berkowitz, stated that when Berkowitz said he was the Son of Sam he was trying to say he was the Son of Uncle Sam; a creation of certain elements in the U.S. government. Berkowitz was raised from birth to serve a role in the Son of Sam psychodrama. His real name was not David Berkowitz but Richard David Falco; at least that's what his birth certificate said. But actually, that's not his real identity either.

The media claimed Berkowitz was an Italian raised by adoptive parents, Nathan and Pearl Berkowitz. But in truth his real mother was a Jewish lady, Betty Broder Falco. Her Italian husband was long gone by the time she conceived Richard David in a lover's lane tryst with a married man, Jewish businessman Joseph Klineman.

Broder turned Richard David Klineman-Falco over to Nathan and Pearl Berkowitz and he became David Richard Berkowitz.

Berkowitz joined the New York police as an auxiliary. According to retired NYPD detective Sgt. Joseph Coffey, a letter sent to Berkowitz from Police Commissioner Michael Codd, while Berkowitz was a policeman, was ordered destroyed. Sgt. Coffey says he was the one who carried out the order. (Former NYPD Detective Henry Cinotti, a devout Catholic, was the first to go public with evidence and information pointing to a conspiracy behind the supposedly open-and-shut Son of Sam case).

David Berkowitz joined the U.S. Army, entering a special program for "profiled" candidates. Drugs were administered. After the army he associated with a Judeo-Christian, Fundamentalist street-preaching group in Kentucky. (After his arrest, the police put him in daily contact with a Fundamentalist lady who helped persuade him to forego the "technicality" of a trial).

After Kentucky he returned to New York and sought out his real mother. This was his final attempt to be tender or human. He was fed her identity and address. He sent her cards. They met. Now came the revelation of the method, for the mass psychology of the masonic cryptocracy is also wielded on an individual level. Now came the initiatory shock of a lifetime; the final brutalization necessary to make Berkowitz go "beyond good and evil," beyond duality to possess the "vision" of the Eye-in-the-Triangle.

What she told him must have been far from pleasant since he was the Son of Uncle Sam and he was Rosemary's baby. A letter by Berkowitz which was suppressed for four years by the New York City police department states, "I David Berkowitz have been chosen since birth, to be one of the executioners of the cult."

He worked as a security guard, then for the U.S. postal service. He made the cult. He had girls, prestige and knowledge of secret things. He had blood on his hands too. The blood of "fair game."

The Son of Sam rites are memory theater mystery plays. Son of Sam is on par with the Jack the Ripper masonic ceremony and the killing of the King of Camelot in Dallas as a mass psychology imprint of some virtuosity. This was their idea of a black joke on that particularly virulent species of fool, Boobus Americanus.

The Carr family was given the reward money offered by the NY Daily News for the apprehension of Sam.

This writer regards Son of Sam cultists Michael and John Carr as strong suspects in the highly-symbolical "Double Initial" murders of children in Rochester, New York; a highly charged occult series with a connection to the U.S. Secret Service and Hillside Strangler Kenneth Bianchi, formerly of Rochester.

According to information published in the Rochester Times-Union, the Secret Service, for no discernible reason, was present in the vicinity of the home of the first "Double Initial" murder victim, Carmen Colon, before she was murdered.

This presence--never officially accounted for in this still unsolved murder-series--is reminiscent of a macabre execution in Houston, Texas in 1983. United Press International reported that two Secret Service agents watched the shooting of Gregory D. Chafin and did nothing to prevent it or apprehend the killer. Viewing this crime from another angle, we might speculate that the Secret Service was somehow possibly even supervising this murder.

The presence of the Secret Service agents in the neighborhood of Carmen Colon in Rochester in advance of her death, is justifiably suspicious given the depth of police coverup of leads in those Double Initial slayings of which her murder was a part. Son of Sam cult members John and Michael Carr and Hillside Strangler Kenneth Bianchi--all of whom were in the region at the time--were all protected by the police from interrogation in these crimes, even after a retired Rochester policewoman linked Bianchi with the Double Initial serial murders.

Maury Terry, in his book The Ultimate Evil, places Michael Carr in Rochester during the Double Initial murders and cites Michael's brother, alleged Son of Sam killer John "Wheaties" Carr, as a man who dated thirteen year old girls and who was known in the Sam cult as a rapist and suffocater of young girls. But Terry never once suggests any possible link to Double Initial which involved the rape and murder of four girls and about which this writer informed Terry in correspondence in 1979.

Terry, on p. 455 of his book, in what may be a macabre hint of his own, says--apropos of nothing--that he has his "eye" on the Hillside Strangler file. Indeed. That file leads to Kenneth Bianchi of Rochester, N.Y., and Kenneth Bianchi leads to the Double Initial occult ritual murders in Rochester, a case severely obstructed by police coverup. Terry's book contains both genuine information as well as a farrago of uninformed speculation and even deliberate disinformation.

The Videodrome

Some of the Son of Sam murders were videotaped by cult-members and copies command high prices in cash, drugs and other commodities on the underground snuff-film circuit. A fellow researcher in Los Angeles has informed this writer that a man supposedly claiming to represent author Maury Terry in California, was offering to trade a copy of another murder video, the Leonard Lake-Charles Ng sex-torture videos, to a contact in the occult underground. (For a depiction of snuff-filmed murder see Brent Easton Ellis, Less Than Zero).

It was the police who seized those videos after Lake, the alleged "Keeper of the Unicorn" for the Ringling Bros. and Barnum and Bailey Circus (see USA Today, June 12, 1985), committed suicide and his accomplice Ng fled. So, if these allegations are true, who is making copies and feeding them to the snuff-film underground in the U.S. in return for money, drugs and information? Who would be in a position to offer the Lake-Ng videotapes?

I have linked the symbolism of the Jack the Ripper and Son of Sam murders to the occult and to the police. I have linked the symbols to terror, that is, the induction of terror into the mass mind of Americans in association with certain key-words and key-symbols or "sigils." The induction of terror in connection with control-symbols is the most efficacious means of ensuring a brain-dead and mind-controlled, subject population.

Joyce Maynard states: "No villain is more frightening than the one you supposed to be your friend." Since childhood we are told, "The policeman is your friend."

There is only one level of terror more mind-numbing than the one Joyce Maynard elucidates and that involves an operation wherein a friend may not only be an enemy, but actually dares to intentionally drop clues as to his real identity. There were a surfeit of such clues deliberately offered by the murderers themselves in the Son of Sam case. Any honest leadership of a police force and any genuinely independent media could have detected the murderers' identities and organization without much delay or difficulty. But that was not the way the script had been written.

Now with the trail cold and indictments unlikely, any official media exposure of the facts behind the coverup, coming decades later, might only serve the alchemical process, by publicizing the prowess and increasing the reputation of an underground of cultists about whom an aura of invincibility is manufactured.

None of this ought to be too shocking to any American TV watcher since a version of this process can be seen in those glimpses of actual murders and other horrors we are shown on broadcast TV, on "the news" and in "specials," right in the "Videodrome." Simulated snuff-videos are already available at many of our cheery neighborhood video-rental stores. Cable and network television broadcast the highest grade of brutalizing voyeurism.

The Angel of Light

Many of the Judeo-Christian "Satan-hunters" and "Satan fighters" are part of the problem, not the solution. They have blind faith in the police, the military and the government. They have no concept of the fact that Freemasonry and Satanism are sometimes controlled and staffed by elements within the police and the government.

They see the world through the eyes of the rulers of the System. They remind me of the story St. Augustine told of a pirate who was confronted by that mighty conqueror, Alexander the Great.

"How dare you molest the sea?" Alexander angrily asked the pirate.

"How dare you molest the whole world?" the pirate replied. "Because I do it with only a little ship, I am called a thief. You doing it with a great navy are called an emperor."

Many "Satan-hunters" and "occult investigators" imagine that the "Mark of the Beast" is far off in the future somewhere, when in fact without a government-issued "Social Security" number, it is nearly impossible to open a checking or savings account or obtain a business license. In other words, without a Social Security number, we have almost reached the point where one cannot "buy or sell," as it says in Revelation 13:17. But many of the supposed occult-watchers are oblivious.

These same investigators repeatedly ignore and even minimize the Skull and Bones Society of George Bush and the Freemasonry of some of the very policemen who lecture at schools on the occult.

Gullible investigators have been readily deceived by sensationalized tall-tales from publicity-hungry, teenage psychotics. Nonsensical stories invented by schizophrenics are accepted at face value as "Satanic rites," without regard for rules of evidence. Sloppy methods and credulity only spread confusion and disbelief. Is someone deliberately muddying the trail?

We need to take note of how little the churches and their various "occult watchers" concern themselves with the enemy identified in Ephesians 6:12 as "spiritual wickedness in high places."

Instead, the focus of many Judeo-Christian "Satan-investigators" is on some third-rate Halloween trick-or-treater fronting a rock band. The deadliest occult adept is seldom garbed in such trappings, but rather, is concealed behind a glimmering, beneficent front. (Although admittedly, the need to conceal evil is becoming less necessary as the common people continue to become more perverted themselves, which is the objective of the alchemical process of mass brutalization).

The correct definition of "Satan" in the Bible is straightforward and non-occult. The word means "adversary." God's adversary is anyone who prevents God's will--His Law--from being enacted and enforced ("Thy Will Be Done on Earth as it is in heaven").

Adversaries are those false Christs and false prophets who order us to obey man's rules instead of God's Law. Phony Christians have done at least as much to damage to Christianity as any Satan cult. Those "TV Evangelists" who wave the Bible while chanting, "Send money, send money, send money," have sullied the name Christian and made it a byword for hypocrisy. They have caused millions of people to equate Christ with charlatans and to regard the Bible as little more than a book of self-serving alibis for greed and deceit. What could be more Satanic?

In fact, a majority of those who call themselves "Christians" are just as much Satanists (adversaries of God), as any heavy-metal rock band. (Luke 13:23-27; Matthew 15: 8-9).

Millions of Churchmen promote the worship of the doctrines of Central Government because their church receives tax-exempt status only so long as these "preachers for hire" (Micah 3:11), advocate idolatry of the State. But Christ taught exactly the opposite (Matthew 20:25-28; Mark 10: 40-45).

Millions of churches allow "Christians" to idolize multi-million dollar sports-team players and franchises which hold gigantic football and baseball contests in huge, Roman-style coliseums broadcast to hundreds of millions on television, to the greater glory of money, the waste of time and the promulgation of mass stupidity.

According to Kim France, a former majorette performing at half-time during football games held at the Houston, Texas Astrodome: "Certain hypocrisies are tolerated, even encouraged. Cheerleaders are God-fearing gals who bow their heads to recite the Lord's Prayer before games and are members of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes. In their heyday, the Dallas Cowboys (professional football team) were known as the God Squad; meanwhile the cheerleaders dressed like low-rent Las Vegas showgirls. Because they were Baptist, and dancing was prohibited, Suzette Scholz wouldn't become a Cowboys cheerleader until she discussed it with the family minister. He said, 'Honey, you can dance all you like for the Dallas Cowboys. It's those other cowboys we want you to stay away from."

In the First Epistle of John the Apostle, 2:22-23, a straightforward, unambiguous, non-occult definition of the identity of the Anti-Christ is provided: "Who is a liar, but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ? This is the Anti-Christ, who denies the Father and the Son. Whosoever denies the Son, the same hath not the Father."

By this Biblical definition, many contemporary Protestant and Catholic religious leaders are promoters of the Anti-Christ. Protestant Fundamentalists assert that Jews who deny Jesus Christ are somehow "saved by their race," even though Christ said, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." (John 14:6).

Since Vatican Council Two, the Catholic Church has also promoted this Pharisaic "saved by race" lie. Dr. Eugene Fisher, director of Catholic-Jewish relations for the National Conference of Catholic Bishops states: "The path of dialogue is first the elimination from Christian teaching of all the vestiges of the ancient Christian polemic against Judaism. The notion that one can define Christianity as good by saying it's better than Judaism, is a fundamental heresy. One needs to understand that God chose the Jewish people irrevocably and eternally as Scripture says very clearly." (The Canadian Jewish News, Nov. 28, 1991, p. 10).

Dr. Fisher's statement about the elimination of all vestiges of the Christian "polemic" against Judaism from Christian teaching, is a reference to the growing call within the churches for the censorship of certain passages in the New Testament, like the 19th chapter of John, verses 6-7, 12 and 14-15, which offend non-Christians:

"We propose, in the future, to remove from the Gospel of St. John the term, 'the Jews' where it is used in a negative sense, and to translate it, 'the enemies of Christ" (Document of the Vatican Commission for Religious Relations with Judaism, section 4).

The Bible states that the demonic forces of our time will appear as "angels of light," in a clever and saintly guise, perhaps as noble Civil Rights humanitarians, New Age Advocates of "enlightened" One World Government; or "value-neutral" Secular-Humanist scientists, doctors and teachers.

Or perhaps as influential "Judeo-Christians" with secret ties to networks in government, finance and the media; a "politically correct" individual approved by the One World System, using the names "Christ" and "the Bible" to destroy the Laws and Teachings of Christ and the Bible (2nd Corinthians 11: 13-14; Matthew 7:22-23).

Episodic Revelation and The "Lone Nut" Syndrome

One can observe a process of episodic revelation repeated time and again in the notorious "lone nut" assassin series (in masonry it is known as the "Three Unworthy Craftsmen"): the assassination of JFK by "lone nut" Lee Harvey Oswald; the assassination of Martin Luther King by "lone nut" James Earl Ray and the assassination of Robert Kennedy by "lone nut" Sirhan Sirhan. In each case, at the time of the murders, both the media and police officials conspired to present a united and seemingly infallible solution to these crimes centering on allegedly iron-clad and irrefutable evidence that Oswald, Ray or Sirhan were the sole perpetrators of these electrifying crimes which galvanized a nation.

Then, in accordance with the clockwork script, 5, 10 or 15 years later, after the trail is hopelessly cold and highly obscured, a spate of tightly documented and well-researched books and films emerge which turn our heads 180 degrees in the opposite direction: now we are shown a mass of evidence proving that the cops and the media had to be either idiots or co-conspirators to have ever believed that these spectacular hits were one man operations.

We learn that Oswald was a scapegoat, Ray a patsy and Sirhan an OTO cultist. And we learn of their accomplices.

If you carefully study this scenario what you'll discover is astonishing. You'll find that the after-the-fact revelations are as much a part of the assassination plot as the murder and its initial cover-up. It's a deliberate psychological process they're taking us through, a psychodrama of enormous scale, though not really different from the principle behind the anonymous circulation of the Rosicrucian manifestos of the 17th century, with their mocking hints of identity.

This Process surfaces in many other "lone nut serial murders" as well. In the Son of Sam case we saw Berkowitz infallibly presented by the establishment media and police as the person solely responsible, in spite of massive evidence of which the national media and New York police were very well aware, making it impossible for Berkowitz to have been the triggerman in more than half of the killings.

In 1977-78, seeing this familiar repeat of a grotesque pattern, I wrote dozens of letters to media agencies pointing out the huge gaps in information surrounding the case. I received no meaningful response from any of them at the time.

Simplistic conspiracy researchers will nod their heads in recognition of the duplicity involved here, while missing the point about the one-two punch repeatedly conveyed in these highly symbolical murders, which transmit alchemical cant language command phrases and trigger-words over the airwaves and into the news racks.

One: the ritual murders are successfully accomplished. The principals get-away, the scapegoat conveniently takes the blame. Two: later we learn the truth but no one is prosecuted. We are mocked, disoriented and demoralized. Occult prestige and potency is heightened.

This is what simplistic researchers miss: the function of macabre arrogance thumbing its nose at us while we do nothing except spread the tale of their immunity and invincibility further. That is the game plan operant here.

To the belief system of the modern man it sounds too crazy. Why would the perpetrators want their secrets revealed after the fact--even if it is years later? This question can only be definitively answered if one has an understanding of the zeitgeist which overseers in the cryptocracy have partly manufactured and partly tailored their own operations to coincide with.

As I've pointed out, secrets like this were rarely revealed in the past because traditional people had not yet completed the alchemical processing. To make such perverse, modern revelations to an unprocessed, healthy and vigorous population possessed of will, memory, adherence to their deepest inner intuition and intense interest in their own salvation, would not have been a good thing for the cryptocracy. It would have proved fatal to them.

But to reveal these after-the-act secrets in our modern time, to a people who have no memory, no will-power and no interest in their own fate except in so far as it may serve as momentary titillation and entertainment actually strengthens the enslavement of such a people.

Consent is Crucial to The Process

The alchemical principle of the Revelation of the Method has as its chief component, a clown-like, grinning mockery of the victim(s) as a show of power and macabre arrogance. When this is performed in a veiled manner accompanied by certain occult signs and symbolical words and elicits no meaningful response of opposition or resistance from the target(s), it is one of the most efficacious techniques of psychological warfare and mind-rape.

This ceremonial nose-thumbing, this perverse jesting and clowning is taken to the highest level of intensity by the Truth or Consequences principle which ultimately hinges upon the issue of consent.

It is one thing for the media, the police, the judiciary and the killers themselves to commit terrible acts without our knowledge or consent. It is quite another matter, with grave repercussions in the realm of psychodrama, public ritual and advanced mind control, when these crimes are committed with our consent. It is an ancient rule of both the moral and common law that silence connotes consent--silence and a lack of meaningful action constitute consent in the face of these crimes.

They brag to us about what they've gotten away with and we're thrilled by it. That's our only significant response, that and the anticipation of the next thrill.

Thus the old strategy of exposing the cryptocracy, when applied blindly in the belief that this in itself is a potent weapon against cryptocracy, is bankrupt. Exposure and publicity by themselves, without a broader understanding of the epistemology of the Hermetic-alchemical control process itself, is worse than useless, it actually plays into the hands of the conspirators.

Moreover, to whom are we directing the exposure, anyway? Who do we imagine comprise the audience that will respond and take effective action? Faith in the power of exposing crimes and their perpetrators to the light of day presupposes an audience of human beings who will intuit, fight, resist, remember.

I remember Budd Dwyer's televised suicide. The Pennsylvania official prefaced his broadcast, TV self-immolation with a quote from one of his associates who told Dwyer that the American people had become too jaded about "routine" investigations into political corruption on TV's Sixty Minutes and 20/20 to care very much about the corruption Dwyer sought to expose.

Mr. Dwyer decided that a population so jaded would need a spectacular sacrificial victim to shake it awake from its apathy and therefore he shot himself in front of TV cameras at a news conference.

But his televised suicide did no such thing. Instead it became, like virtually everything else that appears on television, a trivialized part of the entertainment videodrome. It merely raised the stakes for the next human life to exceed in terms of violence and horror and brutalization, as public fare.

Trinity Sight

Perhaps the leaders of the World System are mad. Perhaps that's all they are. But if they are mad and they really do believe their own hallucinations, then we may still wish to pay attention to these, to see what form they have taken and will take, because our would-be shepherds have method in their madness and a great deal of power. They may be found in the board rooms of our corporations, our Pentagon and the White House.

Fabled alchemy had at least three goals to accomplish before the total decay of matter, the total breakdown we are witnessing all around us today, was fulfilled and these are:

The Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter.

The Killing of the Divine King.

The Bringing of Prima Materia to Prima Terra.

Since ancient times these were the goals of the Gnostic-Rosicrucian-Masonic-Hermetic Academy, an elite as real and corporeal as President Bush's Skull and Bones society at Yale University; the Bohemian Grove in California; Dr. John Whiteside Parson's Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) also in California; General Albert Pike's Scottish and Palladian Rites of Freemasonry and a host of lesser imitators. All of these cults have or had the highest possible offices, connections and old boy networks.

The Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter was accomplished at the White Head ("Ancient of Days"), at White Sands, New Mexico, at the Trinity Site. The Trinity Site itself is located at the beginning of an an ancient Western road known in old Mexico as the Jornada del muerto (the Journey of the Dead Man).

Early in this century a Freemason named Peter Kern was ordered to build a highly symbolic "Gate of Death" at a key point on this ancient trail. It was known as the Gate with a Thousand Doors.

At the front of this gate Kern was ceremonially murdered (decapitated) by a hooded executioner. Gary Trudeau satirized the Aztec-masonic Comazotz head-chopping cult of the American Southwest in a series of December, 1988 "Doonesbury" cartoons which depicted Skull and Bones initiates trying to dispose of a number of heads including that of Pancho Villa, a key political operative of the cryptocracy who was in fact also ritually decapitated.

Other occult rituals for the Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter were played out in the general area of the 33rd degree of north parallel latitude in Truth or Consequences, New Mexico. The Trinity Site is also at this latitude.

There are 33 segments in the human spinal column which according to occult lore is the vehicle of the fiery ascent of the Kundalini serpent force which resides in the human body. 33 is the highest degree of Scottish Rite Freemasonry. Near the Trinity Site a derelict shack was symbolically dubbed "MacDonald House." The Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter occurred exactly on the Trinity Site, the "Place of Fire," with the explosion of the first atomic bomb, culminating untold thousands of years of alchemical speculation and practice.

The Killing of the King rite was accomplished at another Trinity site located approximately ten miles south of the 33rd degree of north parallel latitude between the Trinity River and the Triple Underpass at Dealey Plaza in Dallas, Texas. Dealey Plaza was the site of the first masonic temple in Dallas. In this spot, which had been known during the 19th century cowboy era as "Bloody Elm Street," the world leader who had become known as the "King of Camelot," President John Fitzgerald Kennedy, was shot to death.

A widely publicized image which has become perhaps the key symbol of the enigma of the Kennedy hoodwink, emerged immediately in the wake of the assassination: a photograph of three "tramps" in official custody, who were later unexplainably released and never identified, though speculation about who they really were has reached fever pitch among investigators.

This photograph is a ritual accompaniment of the Black mass that was the ceremonial immolation of a king, the unmistakable calling card of masonic murder, the appearance of Jubela, Jubelo and Jubelum, the three "unworthy craftsmen" of Temple burlesque, "that will not be blamed for nothing."

This ritual symbolism is necessary for the accomplishment of what James Shelby Downard and I described in the first edition of Apocalypse Culture, as the alchemical intention of the killing of the 'King of Camelot':

"...the ultimate purpose of that assassination was not political or economic but sorcerous: for the control of the dreaming mind and the marshaling of its forces is the omnipotent force in this entire scenario of lies, cruelty and degradation. Something died in the American people on Nov. 22, 1963--call it idealism, innocence or the quest for moral excellence. It is the transformation of human beings which is the authentic reason and motive for the Kennedy murder..."

The seemingly random and senseless slaughter of a President, the week before Thanksgiving, by having his head blown apart in those now infamous Zapruder film frames, is the signpost of humanity's entry into what David Cronenberg in his Videodrome Rosicrucian cinematic manifesto termed, "Savage New Times."

The search for the three assassins has become a trip up and down Tim Finnegan's ladder, a ladder containing "one false step after another." It is a masonic riddle several magnitudes above the pedestrian, CIA-Mafia-Anti-Castro-Castro-KGB-Texas rightwing etc. etc. political "solutions" pushed by the various books and movies which sometimes only serve to confuse and demoralize us all the more.

The Alchemy of Ritual Murder

What ought to be unambiguous to any student of mass psychology, is the almost immediate decline of the American people in the wake of this shocking, televised slaughter. There are many indicators of the transformation. Within a year Americans had largely switched from softer-toned, naturally colored cotton clothing to garish-colored artificial polyesters. Popular music became louder, faster and more cacophonous. Drugs appeared for the first time outside the Bohemian sub-culture ghettos, in the mainstream. Extremes of every kind came into fashion. Revolutions in cognition and behavior were on the horizon, from the Beatles to Charles Manson, from Free

Love to LSD.

The killers were not caught, the Warren Commission was a whitewash. There was a sense that the men who ordered the assassination were grinning somewhere over cocktails and out of this, a nearly-psychedelic wonder seized the American population, an awesome shiver before the realization that whoever could kill a president of the United States in broad daylight and get away with it, could get away with anything.

A hidden government behind the visible government of these United States became painfully obvious in a kind of subliminal way and lent an undercurrent of the hallucinogenic to our reality. Welcome to Oz thanks to the men behind Os-wald and Ruby.

There was a transfer of power in the collective group mind of the American masses: from the public power of the elected front-man Chief Executive, to an unelected invisible college capable of terminating him with impunity.

For the first time in their history since the 1826 masonic assassination of writer William Morgan, Americans were forced to confront the vertiginous reality of a hidden power ruling their world. Sir James Frazer writing in The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, explains that when the "divine king" is murdered by one who is himself stronger or craftier, those powers of "divinity" which were the king's are "Sympathetically" and "Contagiously" transferred from the vanquished to the victor.

The entry of this awareness into the subconscious Group or "Dreaming" Mind of the American masses instituted a new simulacrum. The shocking introduction of a diametrically different, new "reality" is a classic scenario of another phase of alchemical programming known to the cryptocracy as "Clamores."

Dave Marsh writing in Rolling Stone magazine (Feb. 24, 1977): "The Beatles have always had an intimate connection to the JFK assassination. He was shot the week before Thanksgiving 1963. By February 1964, the Beatles were number one in the national charts and the climactic appearance on Ed Sullivan's TV show occurred. Even Brian Epstein (the manager of the Beatles) believed the Kennedy assassination helped their rise--the Beatles appeared to bind our wounds with their messages of joy and handholding...And the way was paved, replacing Camelot with Oz."

Now the American people were forced to confront a scary alternative reality, the reality of a shadow government over which they had neither control or knowledge. The shepherding process was thus accelerated with a vengeance. Avant-garde advertising, music, politics and news would hereafter depict (especially in the electronic media)--sometimes fleetingly, sometimes openly--a "shadow side" of reality, an underground, amoral "funhouse" current associated with extreme sex, extreme violence and extreme speed.

The static images of the suit-and-tie talking heads of establishment religion, government, politics and business were subtly shown to be subordinate to the Shadow State, which the American people were gradually getting a bigger glimpse of out of the corner of their collective eye. The interesting function of this phenomenon is that it simultaneously produces both terror and adulation and undercuts any offensive against it among its percipients, which does not possess the same jump-cut speed and funhouse ambiance.

There is a sense of existing in a palace of marvels manipulated by beautiful but Satanic princes possessed of so much knowledge, power and experience as to be vastly superior to the rest of humanity. They have been everywhere. They have done everything. They run the show which mesmerizes us. We are determined to watch it. We are transfixed and desperate to see their newest production, their latest thrilling revelation, even when the thrills are solely based upon the further confirmation of our dehumanization.

J.G. Ballard: "In this overlit realm ruled by images of the space race and the Vietnam War, the Kennedy assassination and the suicide of Marilyn Monroe, a unique alchemy of the imagination was taking place...The demise of feeling and emotion, the death of affect, presided like a morbid sun over the playground of that ominous decade."

The role assigned to us is that of zombies called upon by our shadow masters to perform bit parts and act as stock characters in their spectacular show. This mesmerizing process produces a demoralized, cynical, double-mind.

Rosemary's Babies

On December 8, 1980 the apostle of "Luhv," Beatle John Lennon, had his own highly symbolic appointment with death at the hand of one of the decayed products of the rock and roll 'kulchur' he helped create. He was shot in front of his N.Y. residence, the Dakota building, where the film Rosemary's Baby had been made about the nurturing of Satan's children.

One of the Son of Sam killers wrote, "I David Berkowitz, have been chosen since birth, to be one of the executioners for the cult." (The Ultimate Evil, p. 55). Another of the Sam cultists, a wealthy Manhattan heir, filled a townhouse with young children which was referred to by initiates as "The Nursery." Some Son of Sam initiates were directly referred to in the cult as "The Children." Graffiti left behind by the cult read, "My children I'm raising to be killers. Wait 'till they grow up."

In Lennon's assassin, Mark David Chapman, we see the same old pattern surfacing: the "lone nut" appearing from nowhere, leaves the murder weapon and a roomful of evidence for the police to show to the public, blanks out and is immediately transported to a government psychiatric facility for a thorazine debriefing and further hypnosis. The "Manchurian candidate" aspect of the assassin was none too subtle.

It would be inaccurate to assume that there is a vast network physically snatching kids for Satan. A tiny segment of youngsters are probably raised from birth for special projects as Richard Falco (a.k.a. David Berkowitz) was. But the operant reference here is to the processing of a generation of youth, perhaps more like Mark David Chapman, whose minds are the province of the cryptocracy--by remote media control. Who are these children? They have the same address as you. The televised Videodrome is the real "nursery" for America's Rosemary's babies--your babies.

Hence, on a grand scale Rosemary's babies are transformed from the spectators at the JFK pageant and the Lennon pageant as well, and other videodrome pageants. Because contrary to what the vastly outclassed run-of-the-mill conspiracy researchers believe, the issue is not getting "the facts out into the open." They are already in the open, albeit sometimes subtly, for all to see. The cryptocracy placed them there, wants them to be seen, at least furtively, the way a shadow is glimpsed, out of the corner of the eye in the Making Manifest of All That Is Hidden.

As in the movie Apocalypse Now about the modern reenactment of the killing of the king rite with the victim an American Green Beret colonel who has gone native and become a pagan god-king to superstitious Cambodians. Toward the end of the film the camera casually, almost randomly roams across a pile of books in the hut of Col. Kurtz. The audience can clearly see that one of these books is Sir James Frazer's The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion.

Right out in the open. In the videodrome. That's how Rosemary's babies are created. They are the new great American heroes. Remember the 1981 ABC comedy series, The Greatest American Hero? It premiered two weeks before Hickley's shooting of President Ronald Reagan and made the Top 20 Nielsen ratings. In it the "Greatest American Hero" was named Hinkley. Someone was grinning at us that week. Someone was diddling with the mind of America. Edgar Allan Poe writing in Diddling Considered As One of the Exact Sciences:

"Your true diddler winds up all with a grin. But this nobody sees but himself. He grins when his daily work is done--when his allotted labors are accomplished--at night in his own closet, and altogether for his own private entertainment. He goes home. He locks his door. He divests himself of his clothes. He puts out his candle. He gets into bed. He places his head upon the pillow. All this done, and your diddler grins. This is no hypothesis. It is a matter of course. I reason a priori, and a diddle would be no diddle without a grin."

Lunacy

The third objective of alchemy, the bringing of Prima Materia to Prima Terra was accomplished in the 1969 Apollo moon flights and the returning to earth of the moon rocks. Some of these rocks have been "stolen" for use in occult rituals of no mean significance (what astounding masonic "ashlars" these make).

The "Phoenix" lunar landing module, after its return to the orbiting mother ship piloted by Michael Collins, was jettisoned directly into the sun in fulfillment of one of the most persistent themes of alchemical lore and Rosicrucian poetry: the "sexual marriage" of the sun and the moon.

Freemasonic astronaut and Apollo Mission Chief Lt. Col. Edwin A. "Buzz" Aldrin carried with him to the moon the two-headed eagle flag of the medieval Satanic society, the Knights Templar (lately on display at the masonic grand lodge in Washington, D.C.)

Aldrin also wore two heavy gold rings to the moon which he refused to explain to reporters and admits having served himself a form of "communion" there, though he is not an ordained priest or minister of any known religion save Freemasonry. Aldrin's boss, the national director of NASA at the time of the Moon Flights was C. Fred Kleinknecht, Secretary General of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry.

The key rocket fuel scientist who laid the crucial technical groundwork for the eventual rocket propulsion used in the Apollo flights was Dr. John Whiteside Parsons of the California Institute of Technology. Dr. Parsons was a descendant of one of the founders of the Satanic "Hell-Fire Club" in Britain. He himself was the leader of the California branch of Aleister Crowley's Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO).

In his honor, NASA named a crater on the moon after Parsons. On several of Parsons' OTO ritual sites in Southern California, years later Hillside Strangler Kenneth Bianchi would deposit his victims in ceremonial order.

The OTO also established a temple on Mount Palomar north of San Diego, when it was a forest wilderness, decades before it was chosen to be the masonic "all-seeing eye" on the universe as the California Institute of Technology's astronomical observatory containing the world-famous 200 inch telescope.

James Shelby Downard has maintained that the Palomar telescope's booth-like viewing room was used as a radiation chamber for initiates of the Saturn-Sirius cult who would perform rituals when the light from those celestial bodies flooded the booth as the telescope was pointed at Saturn or Sirius.

Barbara Tedlock, in Parabola vol. 4, no. 1, writes of the anxiety of the Zuni Indians regarding the Apollo Moon Flights:

"...the Moon Mother...had been violated by two white men in a space capsule...(who) walked around on her body, left refuse on her, and removed nearly fifty pounds of her sacred flesh...Zunis feared that these profane acts could spell the end of the Moon Mother's gifts to humankind...she could cause...droughts or floods, and massive human infertility. Many Zunis called the space odyssey "white man's witchcraft" and some old men felt that perhaps this was another omen of the coming death of the world, when all man-made things would rise against us and a hot rain would fall."

But could it be that our government and NASA scientists are as superstitious as a Zuni Indian? Were they compelled by a concept in Gnostic doctrine to perform some kind of ceremonial redressment for the astronauts having left their boot-tracks and techno-junk on the moon?

The old Hermetic doctrine of equilibrium is central to the masonic cryptocracy. Human sacrifices would be required to "compensate." In the electrifying aftermath of the epochal televised moonwalk, the Manson gang sacrificed Rosemary's baby--in this case the child of Sharon Tate whose husband Roman Polanski had been the director of the movie Rosemary's Baby.

These killings were performed according to ancient ritual with hoodwinks and "cords of initiation" around the necks of the sacrifices. A line from a John Lennon Beatles' song was painted on the death house, "Helter Skelter" which was located appropriately enough on Cielo (sky in Spanish) Drive.

What we are witnessing in the wake of the public enactment of these alchemical psychodramas whose spiritual consequences for mankind are far more momentous than most have thus far guessed, is a process of global occult initiation.

These are open-air masonic ceremonies which produce awe in the wake of the physical and technical accomplishment of their time-lost objectives .

Showtime in the Videodrome

"Talk not of paradise, nor creation, but mark this show."
-Lucifer, in Marlowe's Doctor Faustus.

This writer submits that as part of the ongoing "Revelation of the Method," the cryptocracy recently issued a kind of video Rosicrucian manifesto, revealing precisely what television is doing to us and what the future of the video imperium they are planning for us will be like.

The name of this manifesto is Videodrome, directed by the Canadian David Cronenberg whose other works include two films about psychic assassins, Scanners which features the Kennedy-sigil exploding head and The Dead Zone.

Videodrome pits a TV producer who has started a cable channel devoted exclusively to broadcasting mysterious pirate satellite transmissions of live sex-torture and murder perpetrated by hooded men, against executives from an enigmatic global corporation known as Spectacular Optical. Here are quotes from the film:

"We are entering savage new times."

"The battle for the mind of North America will be fought in the video arena, the videodrome."

"Your reality is already half-hallucination. If you're not careful it will become total hallucination."

"Massive doses of videodrome signal will ultimately create a new outgrowth of the human brain which will produce and control hallucination to the point that it will change human reality."

The cable TV producer is captured by Spectacular Optical and forcibly fitted with a helmet in which the wearer is surrounded by a three-dimensional electronic pictorial and audio display-simulation of the outside world. This "virtual reality" simulation is augmented by computers that will transmit pictures to the helmet-wearer.

In the dialogue of the Videodrome film, the helmet-wearer asks his captor, "Will it hurt you?"

To which his captor replies, "It won't hurt you. You might catch yourself sliding in and out of the hallucinatory state after this is all over. If you do, just relax and enjoy it. It will soon go away.

"But for now, I think that you'll find a little sado-masochism will be necessary to trigger off a good healthy series of hallucinations. That's why our Videodrome show is so strange--something to do with the effects of the exposure to violence on the nervous system. It opens up receptors in the brain and spine and that allows the Videodrome signal to sink in."

According to researcher William N. Grimstad: "It is the implantation of this illusory picture of the world into our minds...(a) process of widespread--indeed, virtually universal hallucination emerging from extremely circumscribed and elusive sources...that forms the major activity of the hidden powers."

In an article published in the business section of the Los Angeles Times (Nov. 8, 1987), investors were being sought for a new company specializing in sophisticated, computer-simulated educational scenarios, a virtual reality which "will allow students to walk through Athens with Plato...send a student of 17th century history back to the time in France...or ride on a train going the speed of light." The new machine capable of producing these hallucinations has "dazzling sound and graphics capability."

If we consider the hours in a day most Americans spend in front of a TV and add to that the hours children spend immersed in the digital world of video games and add to that their forthcoming immersion in computer-simulated worlds of supposed "history" and "travel" in their schools, and we see the gradual creation of a population of dwellers-in-perpetual-illusion.

Couple this with the increasing very rapid destruction of wild nature and our ability to access it, and modern humanity becomes almost totally cut-off from the voice of God, emerging as enslaved drone-bees: wired, processed, helmeted and programmed; a processing that has been the goal of the secret societies since the inception of Adam Weishaupt's Beenan Orden ("Order of Bees").

Outside the murders rage, the invasion tides swell, the blood is polluted, the control is tightening, the asphalt is pouring, the landmarks and the wilderness are vanishing, the heritage is dying and memory itself is dwindling. Inside, in the videodrome, the scantily-clad bodies are shaking, the music beat is pounding, the lights are flashing, the air is conditioned, the food is plentiful, the nest is cozy, the images are riveting.

And these Videodrome funmasters, tastemakers, trend-setters and agents of power and pleasure are not worried or anxious just strutting and flitting, wonderful, glorious, gossamer creatures on the California beaches and the dance floors of Manhattan.

Wouldn't you, shouldn't you, love to be like them in the interstices of the alchemical nigredo phase of transmutation, in the Silentium post clamores (silence after noise) of their operating room and dissection chamber where dead matter becomes the focus of humanity's quest?

The Golem

"And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men. And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast...And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast." -Revelation 13: 13-15.

Arrayed against this Control-system and the occult history behind it, against the backdrop of machine-man, ritualistic assassinations, serialized terror murders and the ubiquity of the Videodrome TV transmission, is the Second Law of Thermodynamics. By this natural law, "order tends to degenerate." Even the New Order of the Ages.

Our would-be psychic engineers and human alchemists are well aware of the nearness of midnight in this, their "low bottom twelve" time-cycle. They teeter on the brink of the synthesis of the darkest dream of the Kabbalists, a marriage frantically sought, between E. coli bacteria from the colon of man, the genome code and the power of computer automata, for the creation of the Golem.

A theological conception of the creation of an animate being by man rather than God is found in the Babylonian Talmud (Sanhedrin 65b): "Rabbi Rava created a man and sent him to Rabbi Zera."*

According to Emily Bilski and Dr. Moshe Idel of Hebrew University, Jerusalem: "Found in a major authoritative Jewish text, this passage (from the Talmud) indicates that Judaism accepted the idea of the creation of an artificial man...At issue

* The Talmud or rabbinical commentary of the elders, existed only in oral form in Christ's time. It is referred to as the "tradition of the elders" in Mark 7:3, of which Christ said: "Full well ye reject the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition." In other words, the Pharisees placed the commentary of the rabbis (later assembled in manuscript form as the Talmud), above the Bible, "Making the word of God of none effect through your tradition." (Mark 7: 9, 13).

was the claim that Jews could attain a major achievement, that Jewish masters possessed the highest magical powers."

According to the Jewish manuscript Ner 'Elohim, attributed by Gershom Scholem to the Kabbalist Abraham Abulafia, "...if Rava created a man...he who did it so at the eve of the day of the Shabbat, did it for a great secret reason..."

The techniques for fabricating the golem are located in a Kabbalistic book, the Sefer Yezirah. Bilski and Idel:

"Two of the leading figures of Ashkenazi Hasidim, Rabbi Yehuda he-Hasid and Rabbi Eleazar of Worms, wrote commentaries on the Sefer Yezirah.

"The extant text of Rabbi Eleazar presents an elaborate and systematic discussion of a technique to be used in creating a golem...In a...technique that appears at this time, though its origins are probably much earlier, the golem appears with the three Hebrew letters that spell emet (truth) inscribed on his forehead...

"..these texts contain recipes for the creation of artificial life...Their writings on creating golems must be understood as part of the larger context of magical recipes for the creation of many entities, ranging from calves to heaven itself. These magical recipes formed part of an elite ideology that probably sought to demonstrate that the Jewish masters possessed the highest form of knowledge...

"An important Jewish source during this period is a discussion by the little known physician and Kabbalist Abraham Yagel, who lived in Northern Italy in the late 16th century. Yagel was interested in the meaning of the creation of the golem. Did it constitute a form of witchcraft? Of magic? Yagel concluded that it was a 'natural magic,' i.e., a form of technology, and did not involve demonic powers. Thus he claimed that the Kabbalah is the highest possible science." (Emily D. Bilski and Dr. Moshe Idel, "The Golem: An Historical Overview," in Golem!, pp. 10-14).

Elsewhere Dr. Idel writes: "For them (medieval Jewish rabbis), magical creation and experience were conceived of as a witness to their spiritual perfection..."

The rabbis believed that their creation was greater than God's: "...the magically created man has the highest spiritual capacity, which is not to be found, automatically, even in a normally created man...The artificially created man has within himself the entire range of creation...This understanding is consonant with the view found in Rabbi Nathan's traditions collected by Rabbi Isaac of Acre..."

Prior to the Renaissance, this Hasidic-Kabbalistic concept of man as god was strongly proscribed throughout Christian Europe as totally demonic.

Dr. Idel states that, "Of critical importance for the wider dissemination of ideas on the golem, was Johannes Reuchlin's De Arte Cabalistica, published in 1517."

Historian Frances Yates informs us that Reuchlin's work sanctified the Kabbalah by claiming that it was completely compatible with Christianity.

De Arte Cabalistica became the "Bible of the Christian Kabbalists...Reuchlin was hailed as a hero of the New Learning...Christian Kabbalah was a most necessary element at the heart of the New Learning." (Yates, The Occult Philosophy in the Elizabethan Age, pp. 25-26).

The core of the Renaissance "New Learning" was the doctrine of man as equal to or even superior to God. The strongest opponent of Reuchlin's introduction of Kabbalah into Christianity was a converted Christian Jew named Johann Pfefferkorn.

Pfefferkorn knew all too well what sort of diabolical gnosis the Kabbalah contained and represented. Pfefferkorn was subsequently attacked by a mysterious group known as the "Obscure Men."

A major figure in the doctrine of man playing God was Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague, an associate of John Dee, the founder of Freemasonry. (Dee met with the rabbi in Prague in the 1580s).

Rabbi Loew was also an adviser to the Rosicrucian occultist Rudolph II, Emperor of Bohemia, whose protection he enjoyed.

Dr. Idel: "In 1592 Rabbi Loew had an audience with Emperor Rudolph. The details of this meeting remain shrouded in mystery."

But what we do know is that the influential, "wonder-working" Kabbalistic Rabbi Loew became remembered as the most famous creator of an alleged golem. Dr. Moshe Idel: "Under the joint influence of the ecstatic Kabbalah and Ashkenazi

Hasidic sources,[] the interest in the creation of a golem is [] The founder of Hasidic Judaism was a 17th century rabbi and golem advocate known as the Baal Shem Tov. In Judges 2:16 it is written, "They forsook the Lord and served Baal." There are many warnings about Baal priests in Scripture. The great-grandson of Baal Shem Tov was Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav who was known to be profoundly concerned with dead matter and graveyards. His followers today are known as the "Dead Hasidim," because they are obsessed with Rabbi Nachman's corpse and believe he can communicate with them from the grave. ("Rosh ha-Shanah Journey to Hasidic Master's Tomb," NY Times, Sept. 27, 1989, p. B-2). Nachman's teachings consist in the belief that God is present in everything including evil, and therefore even the man steeped in evil finds God.

In Israel, on Lag ba 'Omer, children are taken to the grave of Kabbalistic Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai for "sanctification" as tzadikim. The main Jewish theological work on the dead, the Kabbalistic Gesher HaChaim, spans three volumes. It teaches that "unearthly creatures" are present around a corpse.

Hasidic Rabbi Menachem Schneerson of New York, "though a virtual hermit," leaves his headquarters for twice-weekly pilgrimages to the grave of the last Grand Rabbi of the Lubavitch. At the cemetery, according to published reports, Rabbi Schneerson "has conversations" with the dead rabbi. (L. A. Times, April 30, 1990). In August of 1991, the motorcade returning Schneerson from the cemetery struck and killed a Black child, touching off three days of race-riots. According to the L.A. Times, Schneerson "is also a proponent of a brand of mysticism that involves such things as curses..." The NY Times reports that his followers are even afraid to look him in the face. "Few do. His burning, electric blue eyes forbid it." (NY Times Magazine, March 15, 1992).

In 1988, Pres. Reagan proclaimed the birthday of Hasidic Rabbi Schneerson, March 26, as "Education Day USA." Legislation in connection with "Education Day USA," (Public Law 102-14) calls for implementation of the "Seven Noahide Laws" of "the Lubavitch movement." The Encyclopedia Judaica states that under the Noachide laws, non-Jews "are subject to greater legal restrictions than Jews because non-Jewish society is held to be more prone in these sins." Americans who obey the Noahide laws of the Baal Shem Tov rabbis will have the status of "resident stranger" or "semi-convert" in Judaism. Those who don't obey them are subject to the death penalty (Uri Huppert, Back to the Ghetto, p. 38).

One further note on the word Baal in the realm of symbolism, this time in high finance. A Wall Street rating agency, Moodys Investors Service, assigns the rating "Baal-1" to credit risks in banking and government. New York state recently received the rating on its bonds ("Message to Albany: Baal-Humbug," NY Times, Jan. 8, 1992, p. B-4).

visible among Jewish and some Christian authors of the Renaissance period. The beginning of modern science (is) attributed to the renewed interest in magic by certain 15th and 16th century Renaissance figures...Indubitably, the Renaissance period is the first significant point of influence of the Jewish views of the golem on European culture...

"A Polish Kabbalist writing circa1630: 'And I have heard, in a certain and explicit way, from several respectable persons that one man, living close to our time, in the holy community of Chelm, whose name is Rabbi Elijah, the master of the Name, who made a creature out of matter [golem] and form [zurah] and it was performing hard work for him for a long period..."

"As the Kabbalist narrates the legend here, it is a continuation of the Sanhedrin passage and the Ashkenazi Hasidic recipe of creating an artificial man...it seems that the usage of the term hiyyut, vitality, together with the emphasis on the creature as dead, seems to reflect the influence of the view of Rabbi Moses Cordovero, a sixteenth century Kabbalist in Safed, on the nature of the creature as totally inhuman...

"According to three statements, written in the thirteenth century, the creation of the artificial man follows the same pattern as that of the calf, or a cow...In some Ashkenazi manuscripts certain combinations of letters of the Divine Name and the letters of the alphabet vocalized according to the pattern of the Notariqon (which is the quintessence of the second stage of creation) are considered appropriate for the creation of the calf...

"Furthermore, a statement of Rabbi Abraham Esquira, at the end of the thirteenth century, indicates that in France there was someone who was acquainted with this and was engraving the form of a cow on a wall, and it changed into a cow and they ritually slaughtered it and ate it like Rabbi Hananya and Rabbi Oshayah.

"...these devices were still in possession of the...masters, who did not hesitate to exploit the possibilities inherent in this magical gnosis." (Dr. Moses Idel, "The Golem in Jewish Magic and Mysticism," in Golem!, pp. 15-35).

In 1988, Fundamentalist "Christians" joined with Kabbalistic rabbis in the search for the remains of a magical cow, the so-called Ashes of the Red Heifer:

"Words fail to describe the intensity of the emotions of Vendyl Jones and his select crew as they have followed the step-by-step instructions written 2,000 years ago in the Copper Scroll of the Dead Sea Scrolls. At every juncture in the (archaeological) dig at the Wadi-HaKippa Cave of the Column, located south of Jericho and just north of Qumran, they have found every little detail described in that 'map' of the location of the Kalal containing the ashes of the red heifer.

"The great importance of this search is in the fact that only when the actual Kalal is found, in which is contained the ashes of the last red heifer offered in sacrifice in Jerusalem in A.D. 70, will the restored priesthood in Israel be able to be sanctified by a sprinkling of these ashes...That has to be accomplished for the priests to have proper functions and sacrifices when Israel has its new Temple...in...Jerusalem.

"When this sacred Kalal is actually in hand, the Orthodox Jews will demand the Temple site where the Dome of the Moslem shrine now stands.

"...Vendyl Jones' last report stipulated that his team will return to the cave...to finish the expedition and secure the sacred Kalal. He works closely with the Hebrew University in Israel. If Vendyl is 'caught up' to Glory (raptured) with us in September, it will be the Jews themselves who will retrieve their sacred 'ashes of the red heifer" and be ready for their Temple."- Dr. Charles R. Taylor, Bible Prophecy News, June, 1988, (vol. 17, no. 2), pp. 10-11.

The late Isaac Bashevis Singer was a Jewish scholar and winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature. He writes: "...the golem...is based on faith...that dead matter is not really dead but can be brought to life...What are the computers and robots of our time if not golems?...The Talmud tells us of an interpreter by the name of Rava who formed a man by this mysterious power...

"We are living in an epoch of golem-making right now. The gap between science and magic...is becoming narrower...Rabbi Loew, the creator of the golem, was a Kabbalist and in his own way a scientist. He was a man of great understanding and of great mysteries. It is remarkable that he had written a book which analyzed many Talmudic sayings from a scientific perspective...

"I was interested in the golem...from my early childhood. I was brought up in the home of a rabbi, and his sermons often spoke of miracles, by the Baal Shem Tov and other wonder rabbis...I realized early in my life that science and technology had actually created a civilization of miracles. Science is one long chain of miracles..."

Researcher James Shelby Downard believes that a Kabbalistic substance was inside the giant steel bottle weighing nearly half a million pounds which the U.S. government placed near "ground zero," on July 16, 1945, immediately preceding the first atomic bomb explosion (creation and destruction of primordial matter), at the "Trinity Site" in New Mexico.

The U.S. Government has never offered any cogent explanation for exactly what purpose the Golem-proportioned (25 ft. long, 12 ft. in diameter) capsule, custom-fabricated at an eastern steel mill and trucked in at great expense by a 64 wheel trailer, served at the Trinity Site.

Re-Building the Temple of Herod

These ritual workings coincide with the procedures necessary for the accomplishment of the crowning objective of the masonic script, the Re-Building of the Temple of Herod, where now stands one of Islam's most revered shrines, the Dome of the Rock. The Freemasons feature reverent depictions of the Temple in their most sacred iconography.

The Temple is the alchemical project in microcosm, the yin and yang of Egypt's Hermetic Shepherd of Hermas in whose memory palace the Black and White kings have played fatal chess for centuries, from the Lincoln-Douglas debates in the "Little Egypt" section of Illinois upon which the fate of three wars and countless lives depended, to the ritual assassination of the "Black King," Michael/Nitram Luther King, Jr. in "Memphis" (Mizraim). This is the tail of the train of the dress of the Lusus serius ("serious game"), comic fiction ("ludibrium") and "Chemical Wedding" of both wings of the Official Church--shadow and light.

Some play by the rules of boy scouts and shopping mall habitues. Others play by rules that make them pillars of the Temple of Herod. On one side of the Temple we see the support pillar marked Boaz, representing the mystical, New Age

"gnosis" which is contained in the Kabbalah.

At the other extreme side of the Temple is the support pillar marked Joachim, representing the strict rules for the administrators and bureaucrats of Central Government which are contained in the Babylonian Talmud.

It has been the mystical Kabbalah, with its alleged knowledge of the mechanisms related to the material world which, ironically, has provided guidance to the hyper-rational bureaucracies administering communist government in Russia and Federal government in the U.S.

Both the New Age irrationalism of the Kabbalah and the hyper-rational legalism of the Talmud, though seemingly antagonistic, work hand-in-glove to support the imperium represented by the Temple of Herod the Great. The formula of that Temple rule is an exoteric structure of bureaucrats and administrators, esoterically informed by knowledge of secret Satanic symbols, toponomy, words and numbers.

The Everyday Miracle Divine

In the medieval era the Kabbalah had almost no influence in the West. The break came in the Renaissance when alchemist Pico della Miranada, philosopher Johannes Reuchlin and John Dee, among others, announced the "benevolence"of the Kabbalah as Christian, "angelic White magic." Frances Yates: "It was in 1486 that Pico went to Rome with his 900 theses, among which were the Kabbalist theses."

Pico's supposed "Christian" Kabbalah contributed to the overthrow of the old order's natural vision. Pico's Oration on the Dignity of Man became famous as the proclamation of the Renaissance view of man and his position in the world, of the Renaissance magus as a "lofty figure endowed with powers of operating on the world," of perfecting an as yet "imperfect" universe.

Of course, these were not the original ideas of the alchemist Pico della Miranada. These were ancient Kabbalistic concepts. Pico had been initiated into these concepts by a mysterious Kabbalist who was known under the alias, Flavius Mithridates. Frances Yates, writing in The Occult Philosophy of the Elizabethan Age states:

"What can have been Flavius' motive in thus encouraging and directing Pico toward his momentous adoption of Kabbalah into Christianity...remains a problem, and one which awaits further investigation..."

The answer to this momentous enigma is everywhere around us. The natural order, the extravagant beauty, the very divinity of creation-untampered, could only remain, in the cycle of time, for so long in its pristine state. Sooner or later the fake concept of man apart from nature and equal to God, would arise.

Man's scientific knowledge and brain power, as expressed by the founder of modern Freemasonry, Elizabethan court-astrologer John Dee in his Monas Hieroglyphica, would achieve undreamed of control, manufacture marvels of scientific "magic" and other byproducts of the "splendor" of the masonic hell-on-earth we see all around us in the cities of the modern world.

For the realization of the Kabbalistic conceit of the Hermetic Academy, nature has been transformed into an industrial-technical, polluted, raped hell. This is the ultimate swindle of the insanely arrogant secret society praxis which falsifies human perception and calls it "higher consciousness." The Freemasons--the "Big Builders"--have worked feverishly to construct the trash-grid that hides the soaring splendor of the everyday miracle that is God's handiwork of sun, sea, stars and forest and then they offer to sell us the glasses that will penetrate the trash.

We inherited a natural creation of great beauty and spiritual succor and "men saw it not." An ersatz vision has been implanted in our minds--the proper hypnotic belief--and people have believed properly.

There have been a few who did not believe "properly." One such was Christopher Marlowe, the Elizabethan playwright who with great courage defied the Queen and her gaggle of masonic conmen and thugs in the course of exquisite plays which are almost never performed today.

Marlowe's drama Doctor Faustus exposed the occultists and their manipulation of nature, as well as the treachery of government and rulers involved in the secret societies which protect and finance the Process. The play deeply offended the Hermetic Academy and, with its obvious reference to Freemason founder and royal astrologer John Dee as a degraded conjuror, undermined the Renaissance philosophy and the position of Dee's imperial protector, the fearsome Queen Elizabeth I.

Doctor Faustus concludes with a warning to man to stay within the limits of nature: "Whose deepness doth entice such forward wits, To practice more than heavenly power permits." Yates says that, "We are in fact witnessing in this play the reaction against the Renaissance...a dismissal of the traditions of Renaissance magic and science."

Another play warned against the demonic tampering of John Dee, Ben Jonson's The Alchemist. Jonson and Marlowe wrote entire dramas exposing the occult because it was so widespread: "The occult philosophy in the Elizabethan age was no minor concern of a few adepts. It was the main philosophy of the age, stemming from John Dee and his movement." (Yates).

In Marlowe's Tamburlaine, the shepherd (of Hermas) is born under Saturn, the "star of empire" and becomes a conqueror progressing toward world rule. There are pageants in his honor with occult themes and his glory is as occluding as his sun-bright armor and as spectacular as his cosmic influence, which causes even meteors in the sky to tilt in honor of his battle victories. Tamburlaine is a Saturnian and very much a prince of the cryptocracy, obsessed with putting the usual yardstick on nature, seeking endlessly after the building and modeling activities of the masonic "Great Architect":

"Our soules, whose faculties can comprehend The wondrous Architecture of the world: And measure every wandring plannets course: Still climing after knowledge infinite, And alwaies moving as the restless Spheres..."

Frances Yates: "Tamburlaine's rule, though it is adorned with all the glorious trappings of imperial pageantry, is not just. He is a cruel tyrant...Marlowe would appear to be undermining imperial themes through his presentation of the tyrant Tamburlaine. This play, published at about the time of John Dee's return to England, clearly does not belong at all to the world of Dee's build-up of 'British empire.'

"On the contrary, the effect of Tamburlaine would be to devalue the imperial idea, and to dismiss any suggestion of connection of imperial triumphing with the establishment of justice and virtue. Raleigh's and Spenser's poetic cult of Elizabeth as representative of the religious and reforming aspect of empire is in sharp contrast to Marlowe's...emphasis on imperial cruelty and tyranny. Since there is so much in the pageantry of the play which an Elizabethan audience would recognize as reflecting pageantry in honor of the queen, this contrast may have been intended to be dangerously subversive."

From the evidence, Marlowe's murder was the work of Queen Elizabeth and the cryptocracy which backed her (he was stabbed through the eye at age 29, a symbol of having seen and shown too much).

In typical masonic fashion, Marlowe's death was presented to the English people as having come from "pious people" who had been offended by Marlowe's supposed atheistic free-thinking and "blaspheming." Yet the evidence from his plays is clear, Marlowe was a traditionalist urging reverence for Divine Creation and eternal vigilance against those who mistake for the divine quest, the futile imperium of puny man playing God.

The greatest miracle of all is God's creation. Everything else is illusion peddled by hucksters in striped pants from under a circus tent. Occult adepts are adept at nothing but fraud, dressed up with dazzling showmanship; skilled grease monkeys in the garage of the mechanical universe, but simians all the same. When the showmanship carries the day, the grease monkeys are presented as masters, maguses and wizards and get craters on the moon named after them.

There is no escaping fallen human nature. Those who claim to have the key, have oiled the skids to Plutonia, not Paradise, to the 'hunimal' and the 'golem,' not humanity, much less the "higher man." To know our limits is not a limitation. It only signifies that rather than perpetually trying to surpass our Creator, we cultivate our sensitivity to the incomparably beautiful vision He has bequeathed us as our birthright, and drink everyday with joyous appreciation at the fountain of miraculous glory that is His natural creation.

Edward Abbey expressed the view of traditional people throughout history who have felt deeply moved and humbled and grateful to be alive amid the awesome splendor, the sheer miracle a moment that constitutes Creation Divine. And Abbey articulates his contempt for those with the endless urge to supersede it with a Faustian rocket of one kind or another:

"How strange and wonderful is our home, our earth, with its swirling vaporous atmosphere, its flowing and frozen climbing creatures, the croaking things with wings that hang on rocks and soar through fog, the furry grass, the scaly seas...how utterly rich and wild...Yet some among us have the nerve, the insolence, the brass, the gall to whine about the limitations of our earthbound fate and yearn for some more perfect world...We are none of us good enough for the world we have."

Appendix

Statement of John Quincey Adams, sixth president of the United States, on the Assassination of William Morgan by Freemasons.

Freemasonry, corporate Freemasonry, is chargeable with the stealing of a free citizen, and the murder of a father and husband. The proof of this subject is perfectly conclusive and is to be found in the reports of the trials of the kidnappers of William Morgan, and in the official accounts given by different Special Attorneys.

It is responsible for having baffled inquiry, for having defeated investigation by the removal of witnesses and for having produced the acquittal of persons notoriously guilty.

It has been decided by Judge Marcy in New York and by two sets of triers at circuit court held by Judge Gardiner in the same state, and by a court in Rhode Island, that the obligations of Freemasons disqualified a man from being an impartial juror in a case where a brother mason was a party; and such undoubtedly is the law of the land.

The Grand Lodge of New York has given one hundred dollars in charity to one of the most guilty kidnappers of Morgan. The Grand Chapter of the same state has given one thousand dollars to aid and sustain other well-known kidnappers and to enable them to escape from justice, at a time when they had no money to bestow in charity to widows and orphans. This has recently been established in the trial of a libel suit brought by Jacob Gould, which was tried at Albany, New York.

But perhaps the most remarkable evidence of the binding force of masonic obligations and of the real power of the fraternity, is afforded in the conduct of those who control the newspapers of the country.

When the English forger Stephenson was kidnapped in a distant state and brought forcibly to New York, the whole country rang with the alarm which was sounded by the newspapers and every patriot was called on to resent this invasion of personal liberty.

But when a free citizen of America was dragged from his family, forcibly carried through the country and drowned in the deep waters of the Niagara, a death-like silence pervaded the newspapers; or if they spoke, it was to notice the outrage in terms of irony and as a trifling and unimportant affair.

The papers of every party teemed with the most gross misrepresentations; a simultaneous attack was made on all who were engaged in discovering the offenders; fabricated accounts of Morgan having been seen at different and distant places were incessantly circulated and every effort was made to delude the public and mislead inquiry.

How tremendously powerful must have been that organization, which could produce that shameful treachery of the press to its public duties!

These facts are as notorious as the sun at noon-day and a stronger proof of their general truth cannot be adduced, than the single circumstance that to this day, thousands and millions of reading citizens of this country are ignorant of Morgan's abduction and murder and are totally uninformed of the abominations of Freemasonry.

Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare

By Michael A. Hoffman II

Ranging from serial murders, the Kennedy assassination, the Rebuilding of the Temple of Herod, the Moon Flights, the Videodrome, and dozens of other occult phenomenon, the author builds a compelling case for his thesis that underlying much of what is presented to us as history, commerce, science and politics is the secret symbolism and mind control of the masonic cryptocracy.

Illustrated with dozens of rare photos and drawings, Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare argues that a form of subliminal psychological warfare is being waged with symbols, numbers, televised ceremonies and ritual toponomy, all intended for the transformation of human beings into beasts, commensurate with the rise of a wonder-working Beast system of modern technology, which comes very close to the operant definition of magic used by the ancient arcane societies.

Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare offers a penetrating analysis of the occult system of control which seeks to enslave us, providing insights which can significantly assist anyone concerned about defending themselves and their family against the fraud and decay that are all around us in the modern world.

PREFACE

Careful examination of the facts will reveal something curious to the unbiased: America's electronic and print media are simultaneously "free" and heavily controlled.

The existence of books like this one proves that there is freedom of the press within the clipped-wing aviary of the "underground," where the ravings of radicals accomplish little more than provide comic relief. In the big buck, million-copy world of the mainstream, commentators on both Left and Right have discerned and decried the hand of censorship and manipulation for years while wittingly or otherwise playing a part in the mass deception. Conservatives like Limbaugh and Quayle prattle about the liberal slant of the news, while liberals like Chomsky and Vidal reveal the subtleties of an ongoing manipulation and redesign of our society by a cabal of the ruling elite who own the media, and their henchperson spin-doctors who tinker with the mind of the body politic.

How can the media be both free and controlled at the same time? And why?

FREEDOM IS SLAVERY. Every civilization has had slavery as an essential element of its economy —including our own. Have you attained the "American Dream" by making payments on your own home? But who owns your home, really? If you're still making payments, who owns your car? Washer/dryer? Refrigerator/freezer? Big screen TV? Just stop making payments and see what happens. Let's say you've paid off your car, paid off your home. What happens if you don't pay property taxes on time, or pay car insurance? What if you suddenly take ill? Ever hear of indentured servitude? Before the Civil War, free men who needed money could sell themselves into slavery for a period of time, usually seven years. Most Americans are way over their heads in debt. Daily they sell themselves into slavery — in forty hour weeks, eight hour shifts, if they can find them.

What has all this got to do with the media? The people who direct and control the world's financial resources are, to a very large extent, the same people who control and direct the world's media. Networks, cable stations, studios, theatre chains, publishing consortiums, newspapers, are owned by a handful of people, and those people either own the banks or are owned by the banks.

THE HORRIBLE TRUTH. Electronic and print media are a pacification program run by the Happyface Fun Enforcers. There is an ideal mental/emotional state for rabid consumerism, and that is the state of glad that the media promotes. The shock cuts and nervous camera succor a short attention span; so short, in fact, that your brain becomes a sieve, short-circuiting memory and logic. You are on IV TV, awaiting the next in-flow of shock or pacifying hypnotic to keep you hooked into the consumerist foodchain.

IGNORANCE IS STRENGTH. By now, most of America has heard the phrase "Politically Correct," a term that George Orwell would have relished. I means to speak, think and act within the mandates of a supposed worldview of compassion and tolerance. It also means that there are certain thoughts — a lot of them, actually — that you must not think.

I had a personal encounter with the unthinkable recently. It was at a recent convention for writers, publishers, and fans of "marginal" forms of literature, including science fiction, horror, comics, conspiracy politics, and other genres catering to the not-quite-right in the head. There, I chaired a panel discussion on the topic of "Censorship," prefacing the free-for-all with a thumbnail listing of a few things that you can't discuss in this society without facing the wrath of the self-appointed righteous. I was careful to state that by mentioning these dreadful subjects that I was not endorsing them, and I am still not endorsing them, but pointed out these were topics that one could not safely consider, regardless of the alleged protections of our much-touted First Amendment.

1. Racial correlation to IQ.

2. Homosexuality as pathology.

3. Holocaust revisionism (i.e., did 6 million die?).

4. AIDS as military bio-warfare.

5. Application of the same rules and procedures to AIDS victims as to victims of other communicable diseases.

While these subjects all seemed prosaic to a jaded figurine such as myself, they were not, as I had anticipated, old news to everyone. Still, I hardly expected such a stimulus-response convulsion from so-called freethinkers and iconoclasts. As soon as I had totted off on my fingers the prime candidates for "things you can't think, much less talk about around here," a fellow panelist, a capable writer whom I had personally invited to participate in the discussion, threatened to walk if I didn't immediately shut my face!

And so, in this spirited panel discussion about "Censorship" — in which, over the course of the next hour, it was agreed that aforesaid practice was a Very Bad Thing indeed, engaged in only by the worst examples of a Puritanistic society like unto that of Saddam Hussein's — there were subjects, certain subjects that we dared not touch upon.

THE CHILD IS FATHER TO THE MANNEQUIN. Wrote H.L. Mencken in 1919:

> It is precisely here … that the culture of the individual has been reduced to the most rigid and absurd regimentation. It is precisely here, of all civilized countries, that eccentricity in demeanor and opinion has come to bear the heaviest penalties. The whole drift of our law is toward the absolute prohibition of all ideas that diverge in the slightest from the accepted platitudes, and behind that drift of law there is a far > more potent force of growing custom, and under that custom there is a national philosophy which erects conformity into the noblest of virtues and the free functioning of personality into a capital crime against society.

It is almost impossible to join the mainstream media without getting a BA in Journalism. One might think that this is done to ensure that the “cub reporter” has learned the basic technical skills needed for the job. It’s not. It is to ensure that the new kids have been indoctrinated into the correct mindset. That they think right.

Objective reporting seems to be passé. Now the kids are given a lot of ideas about “social responsibility” and other buzzwords that sound awfully close to thought control in a do-good disguise. The indications are that the current crop of reporters are being taught not to tell us what happened, but how to think and feel about it, and how to put the event in a context of right and wrong. Inclinations, feelings, not facts. The distortion of reality if it doesn’t fit the program. White lies. Gentle lies, and in some guises with “hated” personalities, vicious lies.

Secret and Suppressed is meant as a hopeful alternative to so much silence and so many lies. It is an anthology of documents and ideas hidden from view by people and institutions who know what’s best for you. By virtue of being important enough to hide, this information has proven itself important enough to print. Culled from a wide variety of sources (including telephone poles), the articles in this collection span an enormous range of ideologies.

On occasion I have included a particular piece in this volume not for its absolute validity, which is often nigh-impossible to determine, but for its quotient of unacceptability in the reality tunnels of the mainstream. We refuse to patronize you by playing Time/Life and deciding what is real and what is bogus. That is for you to decide. Please do not confuse the map with the territory, nor the editor or publisher with the contents of the book.

To go beyond the brainwash requires only a modicum of curiosity and self-motivation. Picking up this book is perhaps not a bad start. It seems fair to warn you, however, that even a tentative scratching at the gargoylefaçade that passes for reality will likely unleash a clutch of demons from the far side of Truth.

This book, you might say, is an attempt to create doors for a few of those gibbering entities … where once there were walls.

MENTICIDE

My Father Is A Clone

Gary Stollman

On August 19, 1987 a gun-carrying Gary Stollman entered the studio of Los Angeles's KNBC television, crashing consumer reporter David Horowitz's live newscast. Stollman handed Horowitz a written statement and ordered him to read it while holding a gun on him. Unbeknownst to Stollman, KNBC immediately switched to a commercial, not permitting the statement to be transmitted. When Horowitz finished reading the statement, Stollman surrendered his gun, which turned out to be a toy pistol. Stollman, the son of a pharmacist who appeared on KNBC newscasts as an expert on drugs, was sent to Los Angeles County Jail. This is the text of his message:

The man who has appeared on KNBC for the last 3 years is not my biological father. He is a clone, a double created by the Central Intelligence Agency and alien forces. It is only a small part of a greater plot to overthrow the United States government, and possibly the human race itself. The CIA has replaced and tried to destroy my family, and those of my friends.

Although I have known about this since 1981, I have not taken any action about it for fear of the lives of my family. I have been forced into CIA-run mental hospitals, such as Cedars-Sinai Thalians, where I am shown being interviewed by many different doctors, although I spoke to nobody there for two weeks. At UCLA-NPI, I attempted to have myself released by a court several times, but was asked by a Dr. Martin Zsuba to keep removing my requests for a writ-hearing. I have been unable to obtain records from several other hospitals, including Ben Taub Hospital in Cincinnati, where all the phones were turned off for 48 hours after I arrived.

I do not know where my real family or others are being held, but I believe it is somewhere in California. The records for Ben Taub Hospital, I have been informed, no longer exist, or have been misplaced.

I heard an interview a few weeks ago, on radio station KPFK, in which a former CIA official told a college audience in San Diego how the CIA has towed barges filled with diseases across New York Harbor, placed lightbulbs in the subways to create vertigo, and cameras to observe the reactions, and may have created the AIDS virus to wipe out the gay population.

He also spoke of secret teams that were created after World War II. I say that the CIA assassinated John F. Kennedy and the 22 material witnesses that day, who all died within 2 years of each other, a mathematical impossibility. What they are capable of, I know only too well. I demand the public release of all secret Air Force files concerning UFOs, which were kept secret even from Senator Barry Goldwater. On my way back from Expo 86 last year, I heard a broadcast in Oregon that he once asked to see the files and was told, “Hell, no!” I demand the release of information concerning the objects contained in Hangar 18 at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, now obscurely referred to as the Environmental Control Building, the most highly guarded building in the world. Why has the knowledge of such advanced beings and equipment been kept so secret that even the United States Congress does not know?

I would have been satisfied to let my situation stand if it were only I and my family who were at stake here. However, I spoke to a girl at Florida Junior College two summers ago, who related the story to me of how seven of her friends had also been replaced. She said that she had written absence excuses for them when they weren’t sick, then they disappeared for a week, only to come back with different personalities. Unless we act swiftly, there may not be very much hope for any of us. These people, or whatever they are, are taking over the phone services right now. The CIA is either doing this themselves, or are helping them.

I was warned in 1981 by someone with connections to the CIA to stay off computers, that they didn’t trust people on computers. Then I began receiving disturbing calls from my parents, which led me to believe that something terrible was going on. I was forced into a mental hospital in Tallahassee, where I learned that my brother in law had been driven insane in the same manner that someone was trying to do to me. I eventually was released, but then my mom came down to visit me and I knew it was an imposter. I know that the secret service is involved in this as well, so who knows just how far this has gone in five years. I know of a counselor named Pat, who worked at the Optimist Boys School near Pasadena, who was involved in recruiting members for some secret group of people. Apparently they adopted orphans and gave them fake IDs and birth certificates. Since we already know of a secret group led by the President's own staff, someone had better find out what is going on and fast. I only know that there are beings around us now with the power to teleport instantaneously and do the same to others, who can read and control minds, and transform matter into other forms or create it at will.

I ask for a Congressional Investigation and Federal protection for my family, and those involved. There is no way I can harm anyone with an empty BB gun.

An Open Letter to the Swedish Prime Minister Regarding Electromagnetic Terror

Robert Naeslund

November 19, 1992

Prime Minister Carl Bildt
Stockholm, Sweden

Ever since an operation at Söder Hospital in Stockholm at the end of the 1960s, I have been used in a medical experiment which has meant a lot of suffering and has been very painful. The operation was performed by Dr. Curt Strand, who inserted a foreign object, a so-called brain transmitter, into my head through the right nasal passage. For many years I have tried to get help from Swedish physicians and even from the National Board of Health and Welfare (Socialstyrelsen). However, I was confronted by doctors who became my enemies and I was, among other things, declared mentally ill and placed in a mental hospital. In 1983 I came in contact with Prof. P.A. Lindstrom at the University of California, San Diego, in the United States, who examined my x-rays. Many Swedish doctors had given written opinions about these, and stated that the x-rays were completely normal, that there were no foreign objects in my head.

Prof. Lindstrom wrote in one of his many statements that, “I can only confirm that some foreign objects, most likely brain transmitters, have been implanted at the base of your frontal brain and in the skull. In my opinion, there is no excuse for such implantations. I fully agree with Lincoln Lawrence who, in his book on page 27, wrote, “There are two particularly dreadful procedures which have been developed, those working and playing with them secretly call them R.H.I.C and E.D.O.M — Radio-Hypnotic Intracerebral Control and Electronic Dissolution of Memory." These, as well as ESB, Electronic Stimulation of the Brain, constitute what is included in biomedical telemetry, the complete mind control.

After Prof. Lindstrom wrote his opinion, about ten other doctors in different countries have given written statements which attest to the implanted transmitters in my head. The statements clearly show that Swedish doctors have given false reports concerning my case. Despite the evidence which proves the outrage, I cannot get surgical help in Sweden to remove the many transmitters implanted in my head, which are active day and night, year after year. This was the reason why I sought help in Djakarta when I visited Indonesia. But we will clearly see the few helpful physicians' intentions are worthless when secret police are acting on their information from mind control.

On August 4, 1987, I visited St. Carolus Hospital, Ji Salemba, Djakarta, and I met Professor Hendayo to whom I showed my x-rays, as well as reports from various doctors. He, obviously, could see the implanted foreign objects and more x-rays taken the same day confirmed the fact, so Dr. Hendayo agreed to operate. I stayed at the hospital until the following day. They took blood tests, etc., and informed me to come back on August 11th.

On the morning of the 12th, I was shown to the operating room. Right outside of the door, I met Dr. Hendayo. He told me that something had happened which would cause the postponement of the operation. He would not say why. Considering how important this was to me, I insisted that he keep his part of the agreement and do the operation. His behavior and attitude that morning was much different than earlier. The complaisance and friendliness of the previous meeting were gone, replaced by irritation and stress. But he changed his mind and agreed to perform the operation. As soon as we entered the operating ward, two people entered from another room; they were western middle-aged men. One of them had a syringe and gave me the sedative without a word or any preparation.

In the middle of the operation I awoke with a horrible pain in my head. My arms and legs were secured with straps. One person held my hand steady, while another held open the 5 cm. incision in my forehead with some sort of instrument. A third person held an object, resembling a branding iron used on animals, which he burned into my head. During the 45 seconds of the operation in which I was awake, I experienced the feeling that my head was being blown to bits. I screamed in pain and tried to free my arms and legs. I fell unconscious from the pain and shock. The next thing I knew, it was 2 a.m. and I could feel my brain on fire. This was 18 hours after the operation.

The next morning I went to the hospital's radiology department and asked the doctor to x-ray my head. The picture showed the injury and that there was a foreign object in the damaged area. I went to the chief physician and told him what had happened. Afterward, I visited Dr. Hendayo and he told me, "It wasn't my idea to do this … I had no choice … You should have listened to me and postponed the operation … Your country's secret police was involved…."

The reason the operation turned out the way it did is quite clear. Prof. Hendayo was, at first, in favor of the operation. But the Swedish Secret Police (SÄPO) followed me via mind control and they knew every step I took. When Dr. Hendayo promised to operate on me, SÄPO also knew. In order to stop me, they informed their CIA colleagues in Indonesia, who forbade the doctor to help me, or they threatened to expose them. That was why the doctor could not say why he wanted to postpone the operation. SÄPO/CIA had obviously wanted to warn me and show that there were other powers behind the decision. Now, five years later, I have physical pain in the area which was damaged. In addition, my mental and psychological abilities have been greatly altered. The difficulty in finding a doctor who will operate on me is the great secret behind the use of mind control telemetry and doctors' international solidarity with colleagues who use people for experiments. These transmitters have changed my life in many ways and torment me through their constant use.

In a 1978 report entitled "ELF Magnetic Fields and EEG Entrainment" Dr. Robert Beck, Director of Biomedical Research in Los Angeles, writes, "The Canadians report alarming mood alterations in certain areas of eastern Canada which observers believe are linked to Soviet [electromagnetic transmissions].” In 1987, Atlantic Monthly magazine elaborated on how electromagnetic weaponry has been developed with the ability to both affect the nervous system and to induce death. This research has concentrated upon a much wider spectrum of frequencies from microwaves, gamma and laser beams, right down to the extremely low frequencies which the brain works by. As Robert Beck stated in an interview with the Omni, “It is easier to generate cancer in a person than it is to cure.” The article continues to discuss the range of applications of these new radiation weapons: “Radio-frequency weapons that impair the nervous system might have uses in commando operations, anti-terrorist actions, and what the Pentagon calls ‘low level conflicts’ when more deadly weapons are being held back.” The meaning of the term ‘low level conflict’ seems to be consistent wherever these conflicts occur, either in the USA, England, Sweden, or Russia.

That this arsenal is being used against the citizenry in the new Russia as in the former Soviet Union is quite apparent from a statement published at the end of 1991 by SovData DiaLine:

“Psychological warfare is still being used by state security agents against people in Russia, even after the abortive August coup,” said Emilia Chirkova, a Deputy of the Zelenograd Soviet and member of the Human Rights Commission. She recalls the scandal surrounding the alleged bugging equipment installed close to Boris Yeltsin’s office. KGB agents admitted then that the directional aerial in the equipment was designed for transmission, not for reception. She believes it was part of an attempt to affect the health of the Russian President using high-frequency electromagnetic radiation. “‘The Human Rights Committee,” Chirkova said, “had warned Yeltsin about such a possibility.” She cited several further instances of the use of similar devices. Microwave equipment had been used in 1989 and 1990 in Vladivostok and Moscow prisons, in a mental hospital in Oryol, and in the Serbsky Institute in Moscow [also a mental hospital], she said. During his exile in Gorky, Andrei Sacharov noticed the presence of a high-tension electromagnetic field in his flat. It was reported recently in the press that Ruslan Khasbulatov, Speaker of the Russian Parliament, had had to move from his flat to another district of Moscow. High-level electromagnetic radiation has been included among the possible causes of the discomfort he felt in his flat.

Purported victims of psychological warfare have written to the paper. From Voronezh comes this letter: “They controlled my laughter, my thoughts, and caused pain in various parts of my body… It all started in October 1985, after I had openly criticized the first secretary of the City Committee of the Communist Party.” “Sometimes voices can be heard in the head from the effect of microwave pulse radiation which causes acoustic oscillations in the brain,” explained Gennady Shchelkunov, a radio electronics researcher from the Istok Association. Numerous sufferers from this alleged manipulation have set up a public movement. In June 1991, a group of Zelenograd deputies sent an appeal signed by 150 people to President Yeltsin, demanding an investigation into the use of bio-electronic weapons.

In Sweden there are clear signs that SÄPO/FOA uses unwitting people in very long-term research programs. At one of SÄPO’s secret bases in Sweden, the so-called Tjädergarden in Söraker just outside Sundsvall, these weapons has been tested on residents in the nearby estates and the long-term effects of electromagnetic weapons and fields are being studied.

The following is an extract from a 15-page letter from Tjädergarden resident Ossian Andersson to the Swedish government: “…owing to the terror, harrowing persecution and gross violations of human rights which I have been subjected to for the last eight years, I hereby request the government to allow me to resume a normal human existence. I am completely without legal protection while the security police and military researchers toy with me at their whim. My letters are to no effect, the authorities shirk any responsibility… I am being used as a guinea pig for weapons of ultrasonic, electromagnetic field, acoustic and death-ray type, and my central nervous system has been seized so that they can control my brain with micro-electronic technology and microcomputers … the symptoms of ultrasonic radiation are headaches, dizziness, disorientation and visual impairment. Other symptoms are a degeneration of intelligence with an additional effect on blood circulation and visceral pain … acoustic weapons do not cause injury, rather they convey a nebulous disorientation which can shatter all one’s organized activities. These weapons work by introducing chaos into one’s life … the radiation penetrates all types of material which I have used for protection. For instance, I built a case with a 2 mm thick lead insulation, under which I lay at night, to no avail… Microchips are also part of the picture, since I became aware that they were able to control my entire range of brain activity. These micro-devices must have been placed in my both without my knowledge… It is cruel to force a pensioner such as myself to suffer day after day and to prevent him to sleep no more than an hour now and then."

Since I myself have been in Söraker and know Ossian well, I can affirm that what he describes is but a fragment of the truly frightening nature of his torment. He is now 82 years old, and the terror meted out to him is completely bereft of humanitarian norms. He is being seriously exploited in a harrowing experiment conducted for periods of 22 hours during day and night in which he finds it impossible to snatch even a moment's sleep; and so it has been, with a persistent brutal intensity, for the last 20 years. Ossian has also undergone cranial radiographic examination from which the implantation of a foreign object with cerebral connections can be confirmed.

Edward Kelly was a journalist and came to Sweden in the mid 1970s, where, since 1984, he worked for an alternative news agency investigating the use, by medical institutions, of patients in various medical experiments. Kelly contacted the Socialstyrelsen/Board of Health and Welfare and several other state institutions in order to obtain certain information, at the same time informing them of his research, and a week later he fell seriously ill. It started with sharp pains in his back which rendered him bed-ridden; soon he had to be carried when he needed to visit the toilet. From the very beginning of the illness, strange phenomena were to be observed in his bedroom: papers stapled to the walls began to roll themselves up, those affixed with tape folded up and fell to the floor and several people noticed that they felt unwell after spending short time in his room. Kelly's cat, who used to like lying on his bed, now refused to enter and restricted itself to other rooms in the house.

Doctors examining Kelly diagnosed lumbago and by the middle of March he developed a bad cough; at the end of the month he was taken to hospital where his body was found riddled with cancer. Finally, on the 28th of May 1985 at Karolinska Hospital, he died.

A similar story concerns me. In 1985 I was behind the petition to the Director of Public Prosecutions, supported by 50 signatures, demanding a response to the question whether doctors should have the right to implant transmitters into the heads of unwitting patients during surgery. I was also one of those responsible for the following advertisement which was printed in 30 Swedish daily, weekly and monthly papers, and which exposed the above outrages taking place within all large Swedish hospitals. At about the same time the first advertisement was published, I noticed a radiation or frequency which seemed to rise up from below my flat. In the mornings it felt as though my face, shoulders and back had been sunburned. If I layed a sheet of paper on the floor, it would, after only a matter of hours, begin to roll itself up from both ends and all battery-operated equipment rapidly were quickly drained of power. The waves increased until I was forced to move out into a friend's flat.

I hired another flat at Kocksgatan 38 in Stockholm where, for the first two weeks, everything was fine. By the 1st of May, however, the trouble started again. The effects were much the same; the feelings of burning heat and noticeable burns on the face after just an hour and the spreading of the sensation into the palate, throat and lungs. Paper rolled itself up whether hanging on the wall or lying on the floor — but now I also experienced how my blood circulation was being affected. I wrote of my last days in the flat: "The radiation has increased for the last two weeks, and now, the 29th of May, it is completely unthinkable to sleep here. It is possible to be in the flat for at most two hours, but after that one has to leave because the pain in the lungs, the dehydration, the dry cough and general weakness."

Due to critical conditions caused by SÄPO's radiation, I was forced to abandon my efforts to expose their electromagnetic terrorism. It was to be five years before I resumed the fight. At the beginning of 1992 I came into contact with the International Network against Mind Control, and was involved in the drafting of the following letter to Prime Minister John Major. The day after it was sent and faxed to colleagues the world over, press agencies, and so on, SÄPO resumed its radiation so that after three days I was forced to again abandon my flat.

Prime Minister John Major

British Government
London SW1A OAA
England

Dear Sir,

Our international network of researchers has, for several years, been engaged in investigations into mind control and its widespread utilization around the world and we have become aware of several victims in Great Britain; reports received from exploited individuals refer to mental hospitals, police authorities and prisons as among the state institutions involved in the implantation of transmitters, electrodes of radio-transmitting crystals in people. The use of mind control is such a grave encroachment on civil liberty that, if allowed to develop further, it will threaten the freedom and integrity of all. Along with environmental problems, this is one of the most urgent issues to address if we are to ensure a more secure future.

The reason we are addressing this letter to you personally is that a meeting between Mr. John Austin-Walker, Member of the Parliament, and a victim of mind control, impressed on him the importance of pursuing investigations into the matter so much that he addressed a letter to you himself in August this year. Later writing to the injured party, a Mr. N' Tumba, he said: "Following your most recent visit to see me, I have written to the Prime Minister on your behalf. As you know, there is very little accountability of security services to the House of Commons and Members of Parliament have almost no power in relation to the activities of M15. As soon as I receive a response from the Prime Minister, I will be in touch with you again."

Just what happened to Mr. N'Tumba, he describes himself in a letter to us: "Concerning the brain transmitter in my head, it has been performing without my knowledge of consent…What's very outrageous is that I am sharing all my visions, thoughts, images, hearing…etc. with people around me as the security services are engaging in a large scale propaganda drive to smear my character, background, behavior, emotions and motives…I have no privacy at all…I am not a spy, I am not a criminal, I am not a terrorist. Being an innocent victim of Ml5 … my persecution started in June 1988." What is more, there is no reason to suspect the validity of what he writes;

we are overburdened with letters such as this one from the USA, Denmark, Sweden, Germany, New Zealand inter alia and our investigations in Sweden reveal a terrifying reality where the mental health services, police authorities and hospitals implant radio-transmitting devices in people's heads and brains. This reality is exposed by a vast amount of x-ray material to be a chilling and gloomy vision of the future, stage-managed for decades by the security forces in collaboration with medical and psychiatric institutions who together have created a secret power which transcends law and order, and which is beyond intrusive public control.

Brain-computer radio communication has long been considered impossible by the majority of people and has consequently been relegated to science-fiction, but the fact is that the technology had been developed into reality by at least the 1960s, during which time the initial experiments were being performed on unwitting subjects. The system has at different times been called Intra Cerebral Mind Control, ESB, Electronic Stimulation of Brain, Biological Radiocommunication or Bio-medical telemetry and in both the eastern and western worlds is the prevailing system of mind control, creating unlimited possibilities to influence and change an individual's behavior patterns and personality. By means of two-way radio communication, called telemetry or remote-control, an electromagnetic wave can be sent on a return trip to a receiver/transmitter located under the skull or in the brain; this signal records the activity of the brain and returns it to a computer for analysis, from which all aspects of the subject's life can be exposed. Radio transmitting crystals, which when injected into the bloodstream fasten themselves to the brain, have been under development for decades. They work on the same principle as a normal transmitter, use the same technology, and contain the same possibilities.

To analyze an EEG in a computer instead of a conventional printer provides an entirely fresh perspective on the conclusions which can be drawn, and gives a whole new perspective on what can be concluded. Cognitive manifestations and activity such as thoughts and visual impressions or emotions, behavior and psychological reactions can continually be registered making it possible for secret police authorities, medical scientists and the state to observe an individual in a deeper and more comprehensive way than the individual could possibly do him or herself. Through analysis and manipulation by the computer, it is even possible for changes in an individual's physical mental status to be effected. The potential of intracerebral remote control is limited only by the imagination of the investigator, especially when it is remembered that, since these frequencies travel at the speed of light, the system of control is not constrained by matters of range.

Concerning the case of Mr. N'Tumba, it is obvious that there is simply no justification for implanting the mind transmitter, whether for police surveillance or psychiatric research. We feel, furthermore, that this is yet another example of human rights violation as defined under the CSCE 1980-83 Madrid conference and as embodied in the Final Act of Helsinki. We also wish to note that such activities are also in contravention of several agreements, endorsed by Great Britain, within the United Nations system, including in particular the International Bill of Human Rights and Articles 3, 4, 5 and 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Recently, we received some X-ray pictures of Mr. N'Tumba and our medical experts in Stockholm have examined those of his skull and can confirm that a transmitter has been implanted in his left nostril. Furthermore, it can be seen that electrodes placed in the occipital lobe are blocking the blood flow behind their delimitation where the oxygen depletion is caused and this is seen as well in his frontal brain just above the implanted transmitter. Among the changes caused by the frequencies affecting his brain, the reduced oxygen levels have induced an alteration of neurological functions, impaired cognitive abilities including that of memory. Moreover, he has obviously been anaesthetized without his knowledge so that this implantation could be performed.

We would greatly appreciate a statement regarding your views concerning this issue, and we urgently press you for all possible assistance which you can give to Mr. N'Tumba.

Yours faithfully,

Lennart Lindqvist
International Secretary

The first signs of radiation from electromagnetic weapons were noticed during the nights of the 11th October, the day after the letter [reproduced here in abbreviated form] was faxed worldwide. I was awakened at 3 a.m. by a blockage of the blood circulation in my hands, feet, forearms and parts of my legs, hands and feet swelled up and became numb. My face and back became sunburned as if I had been sunbathing on a hot summer's day. This was to be repeated night after night and it must be assumed that the electromagnetic waves were ultraviolet in nature, a radiation which affects the skin's pigmentation and which are known to cause cancer. The radiation continued during the following day and night and even though I tried to be at home as little as possible, it became quite clear that they still had the power to vary the spectrum and intensity of the radiation which they were using against me. From the first day, I experienced noticeable changes in my lungs and windpipe which resembled the symptoms following the radiation of 1985. The windpipe and respiratory passages became parched, my voice hoarse, and my lungs painful. I also suffered from acute amnesia whenever I crossed the threshold to my flat. By the third day, I considered it my safest move to leave my flat and so I went away for a week.

On returning, I found myself in a radiation chamber of considerably greater power than the one I had left in which it was possible to generate a multitude of destructively painful symptoms by varying the spectrum and intensity. I was kept awake at nights and sent into a kind of trance during the days, but by far the most frightening effect was that on the lungs which even after the first night had been severely impaired. When, after two days, I also began to suffer from backache and an almost crippling immobility, and when even the shortest possible time in my flat began to be unbearable, I felt that it was time to desist risking my life and moved in with friends. Since I had to return occasionally to my flat, I was able to establish that the radiation continued to penetrate my flat and on one fortunate occasion I was able to identify its source. The deteriorating winter found me at home one evening taking in some flowers from my balcony when I noticed in the block opposite, in the window of the flat directly under my own, was some apparatus, partially visible between the angled slats of a venetian blind. It was directed up at my flat. It was emitting no light but its surface was lustrous.

During the night I collected some infra-red film and some binoculars so that I could study it more closely. As early as the previous summer, being more often out on the balcony, I had noticed that there was never any light in that flat, just as there is none nowadays. The day after, I called on the flat at Verkstadsgatan 22 and rung the doorbell above the name Broman. No one answered, not surprisingly since I heard from the neighbors that he had passed away some months back. The same day, I had the film developed; the picture I obtained revealed the apparatus with startling clarity.

From here SÄPO was terrorizing me and enfeebling my health with their destructive radiation, and so together with some friends I contrived to break into the flat and seize the apparatus. However, by 8 p.m. the same evening when I was home monitoring the situation, I noticed that the apparatus was gone. They had been there and removed it and with it, the radiation. I was able to return home.

This letter has been written in English since so much of the material is already on disk in that language and since I feel it is a more practical language to use. The letter has not been written with the intention of prompting a written reply, since any answer you convey I am sure to notice. I would, however, appreciate acknowledgment of receipt.

Yours sincerely,

Robert Naeslund

Remote Mind Control Technology

There had been an ongoing controversy over health effects of electromagnetic fields (EMF) for years (e.g., extremely low frequency radiation and the Navy's Project Seafarer; emissions of high power lines and video display terminals; radar and other military and industrial sources of radio frequencies and microwaves, such as plastic sealers and molders). Less is known of Department of Defense (DOD) and Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) interest in anti-personnel applications of the invisible energies. The ability of certain parameters of EMF to cause health effects, including neurological and behavioral disturbances, has been part of the military and CIA arsenal for years.

Capabilities of the energies to cause predictable and exploitable effects or damages can be gleaned from discussion of health effects from environmental exposures. Interestingly, some scientists funded by the DOD or CIA to research and develop invisible electromagnetic weapons have voiced strong concern (perhaps even superior knowledge or compensatory to guilt) over potentially serious consequences of environmental exposures.

Eldon Byrd who worked for Naval Surface Weapons, Office of Non-Lethal Weapons, was commissioned in 1981 to develop electromagnetic devices for purposes including "riot control," clandestine operations and hostage removal. In the context of a controversy over reproductive hazards to Video Display Terminal (VDT) operators, he wrote of alterations in brain function of animals exposed to low intensity fields. Offspring of exposed animals "exhibited a drastic degradation of intelligence later in life … couldn't learn easy tasks … indicating a very definite and irreversible damage to the central nervous system of the fetus." With VDT operators exposed to weak fields, there have been clusters of miscarriages and birth defects (with evidence of central nervous system damage to the fetus). Byrd also wrote of experiments where behavior of animals was controlled by exposure to weak electromagnetic fields. “At a certain frequency and power intensity, they could make the animal purr, lay down and roll over.”

Jose Delgado, advocate of a psychocivilized society through mind control, no longer implants electrodes in the brains of mental patients and prisoners; he now induces profound behavioral changes (hyperactivity, passivity, etc.) by exposing animals to precisely tuned EMFs. He has also written of genetic damage produced by weak EMF fields, similar to those emitted by VDTs. Invariably, brain tissue damage and skeletal deformation was observed in new born chicks that had been exposed. He was concerned enough to check emissions from the appliances in his kitchen.

Ross Adey induces calcium efflux in brain tissue with low power level fields (a basis for the CIA and military’s “confusion weaponry”) and has done behavioral experiments with radar modulated at electroencephalogram (EEG) rhythms. He is understandably concerned about environmental exposures within 1 to 30 Hz (cycles per second), either as a low frequency or an amplitude modulation on a microwave or radio frequency, as these can physiologically interact with the brain even at very low power densities.

Microwaves

Microwave health effects is a juncture where Department of Defense and environmental concerns collide and part ways. Security concerns, according to Sam Koslov of Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), first prompted U.S. study of health effects of low intensity (or non-thermal) microwaves. At times, up to 70-80% of the research was funded by the military. From 1965 to 1970, a study dubbed Project Pandora was undertaken to determine the health and psychological effects of low intensity microwaves, the so-called “Moscow signal” registered at the American Embassy in Moscow. Initially, there was confusion over whether the signal was an attempt to activate bugging devices or for some other purpose. There was suspicion that the microwave irradiation was being used as a mind control system. CIA agents asked scientists involved in microwave research whether microwaves beamed at humans from a distance could affect the brain and alter behavior. Dr. Milton Zaret who undertook to analyze Soviet literature on microwaves for the CIA, wrote: “For non-thermal irradiations, they believe that the electromagnetic field induced by the microwave environment affects the cell membrane, and this results in an increase of excitability or an increase in the level of excitation of nerve cells. With repeated or continued exposure, the increased excitability leads to a state of exhaustion of the cells of the cerebral cortex.”

Employees first learned of the irradiation ten years after Project Pandora began. Before that, information had been parceled out on a strict “need to know” basis, which excluded most employees at the compound. Due to secrecy, and probably reports like Dr. Zaret’s, Jack Anderson speculated that the CIA was trying to cover up a Soviet effort at behavior modification through irradiation of the U.S. diplomats, and that the cover up was created to protect the CIA’s own mind control secrets.

Finally, an unusually large number of illnesses were reported among the residents of the compound. U.S. Ambassador Walter Stoessel developed a rare blood disease similar to leukemia; he was suffering headaches and bleeding from the eyes. A source at the State Department informally admitted that excessive radiation had been leaking from his telephone; an American high frequency radio transmitter on the roof of the building had, when operating, induced high frequency signals well above the U.S. safety standard through the phones in the political section, as well as in lines to Stoessel’s office. No doubt, National Security Agency or CIA electronic devices also contributed to the electromagnetic environment at the embassy, although values for these were never released, as they are secret. Stoessel was reported as telling his staff that the microwaves could cause leukemia, skin cancer, cataracts and various forms of emotional illness. White blood cell counts were estimated to be as high as 40% above normal in one third of the staff, and serious chromosome damage was uncovered.

The Soviets began research on biological effects of microwaves in 1953. A special laboratory was set up at the Institute of Hygiene and Occupational Diseases, Academy of Medical Sciences. Other labs were set up in the U.S.S.R. and in Eastern Europe that study both effects of microwaves and low frequency electromagnetic radiation. Years ago, in the halls of science, complaints could be heard that Soviet experiments regarding bio-effects couldn't be duplicated due to insufficient details in their scientific literature, although, according to one DOD official, 75% of the U.S. papers on the subject carried insufficient parameters for duplication. Scientists even questioned, with McCarthy-like sentiments, whether the Soviets were attempting to frighten or disinform with false scientific reporting of bio-effects. It was unthinkable, according to cruder scientific theory, that non-thermal levels of microwaves could cause harm. Impetus for a study of such effects came not from concern for the public, but rather in the military and intelligence community's suspicion of the Soviets, and their equally strong interest in developing exploitable anti-personnel effects — an interest that continues unabated today.

The CIA and DOD "security" concerns metamorphosized into research and development of invisible weapons capable of impacting on health and psychological processes. In fact, due to the finding of startling effects, DARPA's security became even tighter, and a new code name — "Bizarre" — was assigned to the project.

Scientist Allen Frey of Randomline, Inc. was always more interested in low intensity microwave hazards: thermal effects were known. During Project Pandora, the Navy funded such projects of his, as how to use low average power intensities, to: induce heart seizures; create leaks in the blood brain barrier, which would allow neurotoxins in the blood to cross and cause neurological damage or behavioral disorders; and how to produce auditory hallucinations or microwave hearing, during which the person can hear tones that seem to be coming from within the head or from directly behind it.

In 1976, the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) released a report in which they attributed the results of Dr. Frey's studies to the Soviets. According to Dr. Frey, who acknowledges that his work was misattributed, he had thought up the projects himself. The DIA, but not the CIA, is allowed to use "mirror imaging" and "net assessment" in their reports, ie., respectively, the attribution of one's own motives and weapons capabilities to "the other side," in this case, the Soviets. It follows, that there is nothing to prevent them from releasing a report prepared in this manner, and thus muddy the water of decision making, pervert public opinion, stoke up congressional funding or enlist the support of naive scientists to counter "the threat." There was strong concern over CIA disinformation abroad, leaking back to the home front, through the American press, but apparently the DIA, at least on some issues, can dish it up with impunity.

The 1976 DIA report also credits the Soviets with other capabilities, stating, "Sounds and possibly even words which appear to be originating intercranially can be induced by signal modulations at very low power densities." Dr. Sharp, a Pandora researcher at Walter Reed Army Institute of Research, some of whose work was so secret that he couldn't tell his boss, conducted an experiment in which the human brain has received a message carried to it by microwave transmission. Sharp was able to recognize spoken words that were modulated on a microwave carrier frequency by an "audiogram," an analog of the words' sound vibrations, and carried into his head in a chamber where he sat.

Dr. James Lin of Wayne State University has written a book entitled Microwave Auditory Effects and Applications. It explores the possible mechanisms for the phenomenon, and discusses possibilities for the deaf, as persons with certain types of hearing loss can still hear pulsed microwaves (as tones or clicks and buzzes, if words aren't modulated on). Lin mentions the Sharp experiment and comments, "The capability of communicating directly with humans by pulsed microwaves is obviously not limited to the field of therapeutic medicine."

Dr. R.O. Becker, twice nominated for the Nobel prize for his health work in bio-electromagnetism, was more explicit in his concern over illicit government activity. He wrote of "obvious applications in covert operations designed to drive a target crazy with "voices." What is frightening is that words, transmitted via low density microwaves or radio frequencies, or by other covert methods, might be used to create influence. For instance, according to a 1984 U.S. House of Representatives report, a large number of stores throughout the country use high frequency transmitted words (above the range of human hearing) to discourage shoplifting. Stealing is reported to be reduced by as much as 80% in some cases. Surely, the CIA and military haven't overlooked such useful technology.

Dr. Frey also did experiments on reduction of aggression. Rats who were accustomed to fighting viciously when their tails were pinched, accepted the pinching with relative passivity when irradiated with pulsed microwaves in the ultra high frequency rage (UHF) at a power density of less than 1,000 microwatts/cm^2. He has also done low intensity microwave experiments degrading motor coordination and balance. When asked about weapons applications of his work, he answered by referring to himself as "just a biological theorist," and his work for the Navy, "basic medical research."

Lies Before Congress

In 1976, George H. Heilmeier, director of Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) responded to a mailgram to President Ford from Don Johnson of Oakland, paraphrasing Johnson's concern, and assuring him that the DARPA sponsored Army/Navy Pandora experiments were "never directed at the use of microwaves as a surveillance tool, nor in a weapons concept." Don Johnson lingered in the memory of one DOD official who sponsored microwave research in the 1970s. Johnson was enigmatically described as "brilliant … schizophrenic … he knew too much … a former mental patient … buildings where work was done." (Scientists who have disagreed with the DOD on health effects of microwaves and on the U.S. exposure standard, have received scant more respect and have had their funding cut.)

The next year, Heilmeier elaborated in a written response to an inquiry before Congress. "… This agency [DARPA] is not aware of any research projects, classified or unclassified, conducted under the auspices of the Defense Department, now ongoing, or in the past, which would have probed possibilities of utilizing microwave radiation in a form of what is popularly known as 'mind control.' We do not foresee the development, by DARPA of weapons using microwaves and actively being directed toward altering nervous system function or behavior. Neither are we aware of any of our own forces… developing such weapons…"

Finally, memoranda were released that rendered the goals of Pandora transparent. Richard Cesaro, initiator of Pandora and director of DARPA's Advanced Sensor program, justified the project in that "little or no work has been done in investigation of the subtle behavioral changes which may be evolved by a low-level electromagnetic field." Researchers had long ago established that direct stimulus of the brain could alter behavior. The question raised by radio frequencies — microwaves or radio frequencies of the UHF or VHF band — was whether the electromagnetic could have a similar effect at very low levels. Pandora's initial goal: to discover whether a carefully constructed microwave signal could control the mind. In the context of long term, low-level effects: Cesaro felt that central nervous system effects could be important, and urged their study "for potential weapons applications." After testing a low-level modulated microwave signal on a chimpanzee, and within approximately a week causing stark performance decrements and behavioral disorganization, Cesaro wrote, "the potential of exerting a degree of control on human behavior by low-level microwaves seems to exist." On the basis of the primate study, extensive discussions took place and plans were made to extend the studies to humans.

According to a former DOD security analyst, one such microwave experiment with human subjects took place at Lorton Prison in the early 1970s. He said that such research (in a weapons context) has occurred on behavioral effects of microwaves since 1976. He also asked, "Why are you so concerned about then? What about now? They can call anyone a terrorist. Who are they using it on now?"

Behavioral Effects

In June, 1970, a government think tank, Rand Corporation, published a report by R.J. MacGregor, entitled "A Brief Survey of Literature Relating to Influence of Low Intensity Microwaves on Nervous Function." After noting that the U.S. microwave guideline in effect in 1970 for the public, 10,000 microwatts/^{2} (now the industrial and military “guideline”), is proscribed from consideration of the rate that thermal effects are dissipated, the author, a specialist in modeling neural networks, states that scientific studies have consistently shown that humans exhibit behavioral disturbances when subjected to non-thermal levels of microwaves, well below this level. The symptoms that MacGregor lists for those humans exposed more or less regularly at work or in the living environment are insomnia, irritability, loss of memory, fatigue, headache, tremor, hallucination, autonomic disorders and disturbed sensory functioning. He reports that swelling and distention of nerve cells have been produced at intensities as low as 1,000 microwatts/cm^2 (the current U.S. guideline for the public). In a companion Rand paper, June, 1970, entitled “A Direct Mechanism for the Direct Influence of Microwave Radiation on Neuroelectric Function,” MacGregor sets forth the idea that the electrical component of microwave radiation induces transmembrane potentials in nerve cells and thereby disturbs nervous function and behavior. Microwaves penetrate and are absorbed more deeply so that they can produce a direct effect on the central nervous system. With smaller wave lengths the principal absorption occurs near the body surface and causes peripheral or “lower” nervous system effects.

Dr. Milton Zaret who analyzed neurological effects for the CIA during Project Pandora (he is now one of the few doctors willing to take the government on by testifying on behalf of plaintiffs filing claims for microwave health damage), wrote that, “receptors of the brain are susceptible and react to extremely low intensities of microwave irradiation if this is delivered in accordance with appropriate “coding.” Coding is reported to be influenced by the character of the signal so as to be a function, for example, of the shape and amplitude of the pulse or waveform.

Dr. Ross Adey, formerly of the Brain Research Center at University of Southern California, Los Angeles, now at Loma Linda University Medical School, Loma Linda, California, was among the first of the Pandora researchers. His work is more precise in inducing specific behavior, rather than merely causing disorganization or decrements in performance — that is, apart from his studies on inducing calcium efflux in brain tissue, which causes interference with the functioning of the brain and is one basis of “confusion weaponry.”

More specifically, Adey's thesis is that if the electroencephalogram (EEG) has informational significance, one can induce behavioral changes if one imposes environmental fields that look like EEG. During Adey's career, he has correlated a wide variety of behavioral states with EEG, including emotional states (e.g., stress in hostile questioning), increments of decision making and conditioning, correct versus incorrect performance, etc., and he has imposed electromagnetic fields that look like EEG, which has resulted in altered EEG and behavior.

In published accounts of Adey's work, he has shown that it is possible to apply low biologic frequencies by using a radio frequency carrier modulated at specific brain frequencies. He demonstrated that if the biological modulation on the carrier frequency is close to frequencies in the natural EEG of the subject, it will reinforce or increase the number of manifestations of the imposed rhythms, and modulate behavior.

The conditioning paradigm: animals were trained through aversion to produce specific brain wave rhythms; animals trained in a field with the same rhythm amplitude modulated on it, differed significantly from control animals in both accuracy and resistance to extinction (at least 50 days versus 10 in the controls). When the fields were used on untrained animals, occurrence of the applied rhythm increased in the animals' EEG.

Dr. Adey is an accomplished scientist, which leads one to believe the significance of this experiment goes beyond mere reinforcement of the animal's brain waves. Did the rhythms that he chose to apply have special significance with relation to information processing or conditioning? The 4.5 theta rhythm that he applied was the natural reoccurring frequency that he had measured in the hippocampus during a phase of avoidance learning. The hippocampus, as Adey wrote in an earlier paper, "… involves neural processes connected with consolidation of memory traces. It relates closely to the need for focusing attention, and the degree to which recapitulation of past experience is imposed." One might add, to ensure survival.

Does it follow that an EEG modulated carrier frequency can be used to enhance human avoidance learning? You bet, provided the same careful procedures are followed with humans as were with animals, the same result would accrue. Recall again the goals of Pandora — to discover whether a carefully constructed electromagnetic signal could direct the mind.

The obvious question becomes, how many and with how much accuracy can behavioral states or “frames of mind” be intentionally imposed, that is, apart from the certain technological capability to promote disorganization and degradation of perception and performance through use of the fields. In fact, many components of learning or conditioning including affect (i.e., “feeling” or emotional states) can be imposed through use of the fields from a distance. e.g., behavioral arousal, orienting reflex, subliminal stress (alarm reaction without realization of the contextual significance), so-called levels of consciousness, inhibition of cerebral functions, which would render one more susceptible to suggestion or influence, and so on. All components necessary to produce behavioral conditioning, including ways to provide contextual significance, can be applied from a distance (i.e., without direct brain contact, as was necessary in older behavior modification experiments.)

Another indication that the government entertained notions of behavior control through use of fields and sound, is a 1974 research proposal by J.F. Schapitz. To test his theory, his plan was to record EEG correlates induced by various drugs, and then to modulate these biological frequencies on a microwave carrier. Could the same behavioral states be produced by imposing these brain wave frequencies on human subjects? His plan went further and included inducing hyptonic states and using words modulated on a microwave carrier frequency to attempt to covertly condition subjects to perform various acts. The plan as released (through the Freedom of Information Act) seems less part of a careful recipe for influence than Adey’s and other DOD scientists’ work, and may have been released to mislead by lending an “information beam” science fiction-like quality to the work.

The end of Project Pandora may have signified the end of research into the cause of effects of the varying frequencies registered at the American embassy in Moscow — some known to be due to CIA and National Security Agency equipment, but interest in microwave and biological frequency weapons did not wane. Indeed, there are indications of applications. As we have seen, research that began in response to a security concern, transformed almost overnight into a search for weapons applications, while cloaked in disinformation about the Soviets. What types of weapons?

There Are Three Possibilities:

(1) That microwaves, perhaps modulated with low biological frequencies, are used from a distance to cause performance decrements and disorganization by interfering with neuro-electric function; or by causing central nervous system effects, subjective feelings of ill health, or health syndrome associated with periodic exposures at intensities below 10,000 microwatts/cm^2;

(2) That microwaves are used to create organ specific effects, e.g., tissues with less blood circulation, like the gall bladder, lens of the eye, etc., can compensate less to increased heating; heart disfunctions can be caused; lesions or necrosis of internal tissues can be induced without a subject necessarily feeling heat, and symptoms might manifest later, at certain frequencies, slight heating or “hot spots” can be created at the center of the head; there is an ongoing Navy contract to find parameters to disrupt human metabolic functions; or

(3) That they are used in an interdisciplinary approach to remote conditioning by creating information processing effects, as Dr. Adey’s work shows, or to induce “feeling” or “emotional” elements of cognition, such as excitatory reactions, subliminal stress, behavioral arousal, enhanced suggestibility by inhibition of higher functions, or various other EEG or behavioral effects. There are strong indications that microwaves have been used to cause the decrements. There is no question but that the U.S. military and the CIA know the behavioral or psychoactive significance of applied biological rhythms and other frequencies, as this was part of the thrust of their work during Pandora. Inducing emotion or feelings through use of electromagnetic fields, and then synchronizing the feelings with words (symbolic of ideas) would be an effective way to induce preferences or attitude change, because it would mirror natural thought processes. The question seems less whether conditioning through use of covert technology is possible, than whether there has been a policy choice to use it. If the results of their research are used as part of a system that can condition behavioral responses from a distance, it is a secret that they hold close like a baby.

Richard Helms wrote of such a system in the mid-1960s while he was CIA Plans Director. He spoke of “sophisticated approaches to the ‘coding’ of information for transmittal to population targets in the ‘battle for the minds of men’ …” and of “an approach integrating biological, social and physical-mathematical research in attempts … to control behavior.” He found particularly notable, “use of modern information theory, automata theory, and feedback concepts … for a technology for controlling behavior … using information inputs as causative agents.” Due to Project Pandora, it is now known that applied biological (and other) frequencies can also be used as direct “information inputs” (e.g., of feeling or emotion) and to reinforce brain rhythms associated with conditioning and information processing. One way to get such a signal into a human may be through use of a high frequency carrier frequency. Results of research into information processing, unconscious processes, decision making, memory processes and evoked brain potentials would likely be exploited or integrated in an interdisciplinary system.

Covert technological influence is not so foreign to the American way of life as one may think. It was reported in a 1984 U.S. House of Representatives hearing that high frequency audio transmissions are applied, for instance, in some department stores to prevent theft (one East Coast department store chain was reported to have saved $600,000 over a nine-month period), and in some grocery stores with the result that employee induced cash shortages significantly decreased and employees are better mannered. In other words, as Helms wrote of, verbal messages are delivered at frequencies above human hearing. Technology for commercial applications is relatively sophisticated (one studio uses a “layered” approach and 31 channels in preparing tapes; some employ a “dual coding” approach, integrating scientific knowledge of information processing modes of the two brain hemispheres, and others use techniques where a consumer is spoken to as a three year old child.) There is no U.S. law specifically regulating these types of transmission (over radio and TV a Federal Communication Commission “catch all” provision might apply). If industry uses indetectable audio transmissions to meet security concerns, it seems that the military and CIA would exploit the same technology and would have developed much more sophisticated technology for applications. The public’s conception of “subliminals” is naive compared to capabilities.

The military has studied and considered for usefulness in a warfare and psychological warfare context a wide range of biological or pharmacological substances. In the memo referred to above, Helms wrote that the U.S. is five years ahead of the Soviets in pharmacological agents producing behavioral effects. Some of these substances would increase susceptibility to influence if incorporated in the multidisciplinary approach he wrote of.

A side effect of lowered resistance to sub-threshold stimulus might be that some would become aware of illicit influence (even under normal circumstances there is a wide variation in sensitivity among individuals to sub-threshold stimulus; normal individuals whom psychology terms “reducers” are much more sensitive in this way; actually, most schizophrenics are extreme reducers, and therefore, much more aware of stimulus that others aren’t cognizant of). Convenient to the agencies involved in covert influence, is that among primary symptoms of schizophrenia or mental illness are ideas that one is being influenced by “transmissions” (e.g. radio frequencies), “voices” or even telepathy; unless complaints about covert psychological weapons are well organized, they would tend to be discounted as indicative of mental imbalance.

There are many ways to create temporary or permanent states that increase receptivity to suggestion and/or conditioning. It is interesting to note that scientific studies have correlated exposure to electromagnetic fields alone with mental hospital admissions and worsening of symptoms of mental patients, even as an etiological factor in the onset of mental illness. (A marker disease for exposure to microwaves is damage behind the lens of the eye; a disproportionate number of persons so damaged also suffer from mental disease or neurological impairment.)

Specific Targets

Weapons against whom? Safe to say, in order to enlist the aid of scientists, the military and CIA would act true to form, that is, to motivate and overcome reluctance due to dictates of conscience, they would evoke a serious security risk during initial phases of development. In fact, on the "unclassified" face of it, a number of reports have openly suggested use of "microwaves" against "terrorists."

Los Alamos National Laboratory, now under supervision of University of California, prepared a report for Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) setting forth that use of microwave radiation on terrorists could kill them, stun them or at least modify their behavior by changing their "perceptions." At this point the cloak is donned, and the report continues: "There are reports of Eurasian communist countries performing research with combined fields of signals from several different microwave frequencies to produce at least perceptual distortions in humans."

Cable News Network recently aired a report on electromagnetic weapons and showed an official document that was a contingency plan to use electromagnetic weapons against terrorists. It wasn't made clear who the terrorists were or what the contingency was. Prior to the news show, however, reports had surfaced, the source a DOD medical engineer, that in the content of conditioning, microwaves and other modalities had regularly been used against Palestinians.

Greenham Common

When DOD develops a weapon it can be said with certainty that it will be tested and, if possible, where it would be useful to meet their goals. Women peace activists have kept an ongoing vigil at the periphery of the U.S. Air Force base at Greenham in England since 1981. They are protesting build-up of nuclear weapons. The U.S. Cruise missiles, which are nuclear warheads small enough to be mounted on the back of a truck called a launcher vehicle, arrived at the base in March, 1984. Since then the women in the encampment and members of the Cuisewatch network have ensured that when the launcher vehicle and its convoy are taken out into the British countryside, the "dispersal exercises" aren't as secret as the military intended them to be. The women of the network, non-violent activists, have been subjected to intense harassment in an effort to be rid of their presence.

In the Fall of 1984, things changed dramatically; many, if not most of the women began suffering illness; and, simultaneously, the massive police and military presence at the base virtually disappeared, and new and different antenna were installed at the base. In a report prepared by Rosalie Bertell, commissioner for International Commission of Health Professionals for Human Rights, a non-governmental organization based in Geneva, Switzerland, the unusual patterns of illness ranged from "severe headaches, drowsiness, menstrual bleeding at abnormal times or post-menopausal, to bouts of temporary paralysis, faulty speech coordination and in one case apparent circulatory failure requiring hospitalization."

Other symptoms documented by peace activist Kim Bealy, who coordinates investigations into reports of illness at specific places around the base, included; vertigo, retinal bleeding, burnt face (even at night), nausea, sleep disturbances and palpitations. Psychological symptoms included lack of concentration, disorientation, loss of memory, irritability and a sense of panic in non-panic situations. The symptoms have virtually all been associated in medical literature with exposure to microwaves and most listed can be induced through low intensity or non-thermal exposures. (Editor's note: such devices were utilized as "psychological deterrents" during the siege of the Branch Davidian compound at Waco.)

Measurements were taken around the base by members of Electronics for Peace and by others. Strong signals, up to one hundred times the normal background level were detected on a number of occasions. In fact, signals ten times stronger than those felt to be emanating from normal base transmitting systems were found.

The strongest signals generally appeared in the areas where the women said that they suffered ill effects. For instance, they were found to cover the women's encampment near the "green gate" (gates to the base are designated by color), but stopped abruptly at the edge of the road leading to the gate. The strength of the signals were also found to reflect the activity of the women: e.g., they increased rapidly when the women started a demonstration. Visitors to the encampment, both men and women, reported experiencing the same types of symptoms and the same pattern of variation as the Greenham women.

In a review prepared by National Bureau of Standards, Law Enforcement Standards Laboratory, for Nuclear Defense Agency, Intelligence and Security Directorate, use of low intensity microwaves was considered for application as a "psychological deterrent." The report stated, "…microwave radiation has frequently been cited as being responsible for non-thermal effects in integrated central nervous system activity. The behavioral consequences most frequently reported have been disability, listlessness and increased irritability." The report fails to mention just as frequently cited low intensity microwave health effects as chromosome damage; congenital birth defects; autonomic nervous system disregulation, including disruption of bio-cycles; impaired immune function; brain damage and other neurological abnormalities, including leaks in the blood brain barrier and depletion of some neurotransmitters; among a host of other health impairments. As activist Kim Bealy put it, "It would now appear that we are protecting the missiles by killing people slowly."

It is not necessary that the transmission take place from equipment in the vicinity of a target (although the Greenham women seemed to be suffering from transmissions made from within the base.) Propagation of microwaves has been very well studied and is very sophisticated, e.g., a two inch beam can be sent from a satellite, point to point, to a receiving dish on earth; and, it was reported in 1978, that the CIA had a program called Operation Pique, which included bouncing radio signals or microwaves off of the ionosphere to affect the mental functions of people in selected areas, including Eastern European nuclear installations.

In the U.S. at this time, there is no legally enforceable microwave standard. There never has been an enforceable standard for the public or the workplace. Microwaves at intensities within the suggested "guideline" have finally been shown, even by U.S. research, to cause health damage.

Is Paranoia
A Form of Awareness?

Kerry W. Thornley

In the spring of 1959 I was stationed at an annex of El Toro Marine Base in California. Another Marine in that unit was Lee Harvey Oswald. We became acquainted.

Then in June of that year I shipped out for a tour of duty at the Naval Air Station in Atsugi, Japan, where Oswald served previous to our time together at El Toro.

My ambition all along was to become a novelist, and I had decided to write a book based upon my overseas experience in the military. That autumn I read in the newspaper that Lee Oswald had, upon being discharged, gone to Moscow and applied for Soviet citizenship. By then I'd decided to call my novel about peace-time Marines in the Far East The Idle Warriors, and Oswald's dramatic act inspired me to center the plot around a character based on him.

Convinced that I understood his reasons for becoming disillusioned with the United States and turning to Marxism, feeling they were similar to my own, I at first intended to write "a poor man's Ugly American" sharply critical of U.S. imperialism characterized by the bungling of the Eisenhower era.

Unfortunately for the clarity of my novel's political theme, my own ideology shifted — as a result of reading Ayn Rand's polemical novel, Atlas Shrugged — aboard ship on my way back to the States. Discharged from the Marines immediately thereafter, I entered civilian life convinced of the efficacy of laissez-faire capitalism.

My young friend, Greg Hill, and I then traveled from our home town of Whittier, California, to the New Orleans French Quarter, where I continued work on the first draft of The Idle Warriors. There I met a man I am belatedly but firmly persuaded played a central role in organizing the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, for which I am equally certain Lee Harvey Oswald was framed.

During most of my life I have been inclined to reject conspiracy theories of history. Notwithstanding my willingness to admit that conspiracies exist, I felt that a grasp of political events depended upon an understanding of the power of ideas. In my view, conspiracies were insignificant. My tendency was to challenge the motives of conspiracy buffs when I did not, as was more often the case, question their mental health.

Balancing my occasional doubts was a fear of becoming paranoid. When Oswald was accused of assassinating Kennedy, my first hunch was that he was innocent and had been blamed in a misunderstanding that would soon be cleared up. When the media continued to insist there was ample evidence that Oswald, and Oswald alone, shot the President I quickly changed my mind.

Two years later, when a Warren Report critic confronted me with the many discrepancies between the conclusions of the Warren Commission and the testimony and exhibits contained in the Twenty-six Volumes, I could no longer hide from myself the probability that either Lee Oswald was innocent or he had not acted alone. Yet even then I did not want to think an elaborate conspiracy was involved. Maybe Lyndon Johnson or some of his Texas friends had arranged to kill Kennedy and perhaps it had not occurred to the Warren Commission to probe that possibility. A more complicated theory would seem paranoid. Above all else, I did not want to seem paranoid.

One year elapsed between the time I began doubting the lone-assassin theory and the beginning of tribulations in my own life suffered at the hands of a man most journalists insisted was a paranoid. First, District Attorney

Jim Garrison made a bizarre attempt to recruit me as a witness for the prosecution in his probe of a New Orleans-based conspiracy to assassinate John Kennedy. When I expressed my unwillingness to cooperate, he accused me of working for the CIA and summoned me to appear before the grand jury.

After asking me what seemed like a lot of irrelevant questions, he charged me with perjury for denying, truthfully, that I had met with Lee Harvey Oswald in New Orleans during the months previous to the assassination. I had not seen Oswald in person, nor had I communicated with him in any other way, since June of 1959 — at the latest.

Yet Garrison struck me as sincere. Moreover, his assistants showered me with any number of disturbing coincidences linking me to his assassination theory. I was at a loss to explain them, except in light of the notion that Jim Garrison's conspiracy theory was an elaborate paranoid construction.

This experience forced me to examine the evidence surrounding the events in Dallas more carefully than ever before. As a result, I became convinced not only that Lee Harvey Oswald had not acted alone but, moreover, that he was not even on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository when the shots that killed Kennedy were fired. Yet, because I also had to cope with Jim Garrison's wild and irresponsible charges, I also became more certain than ever that paranoia was by far more dangerous than any actual conspiracy that might, from time to time, sabotage the normal functioning of history.

In other words, if conspiracies were significantly dangerous, it was because they tended to spawn paranoia. When Jim Garrison ultimately neglected to bring me to trial, I took it as a tacit admission he had at last perceived the error of his ways.

Meanwhile, in the realm of public affairs I busied myself with other concerns. Of all newsworthy events, the John Kennedy murder seemed to me the most boring. For reasons I could not clearly identify at the time, I was to find the murder of Hollywood actress Sharon Tate far more disturbing. When I read The Family by Ed Sanders (E.P. Dutton, 1971) my uneasiness increased. Charles Manson was not typical of the hip counterculture I had gradually come to consider my own, after the appeal of Ayn Rand's philosophy diminished in my eyes. Nevertheless, something about him and his followers seemed far more menacing and important than I could justify in terms of a few sensationally gory killings. As if warned in a forgotten nightmare, I felt that I had expected someone like Manson to appear on the scene. All that I read about him confirmed this eerie, elusive anxiety.

Besides that, much like Jim Garrison, Charles Manson was a paranoid. Nowhere is this more evident than on page 129 of The Family, where he is quoted as saying: "Christ on the cross, the coyote in the desert — it's the same thing, man. The coyote is beautiful. He moves through the desert delicately, aware of everything, looking around. He hears every sound, smells every smell, sees everything that moves. He's always in a state of total paranoia and total paranoia is total awareness. You can learn from the coyote just like you learn from a child. A baby is born into the world in a state of fear. Total paranoia and awareness…" Once again I was grappling with the riddle of a man who appeared to act on the basis of a supreme confidence in the validity of his own delusions.

Escalation of the Vietnam war had radicalized me, once again, politically. So Charlie Manson's affinity for right-wing organizations was something else that alarmed me. Most particularly I was spooked by allegations about links between Manson's people and the Process Church. For when I had returned to New Orleans in order to clear myself, unsuccessfully, of Jim Garrison's suspicions, I encountered the Process Church there — in circumstances giving me ample reason to suspect it was at least partially involved in framing me.

So as to avoid the mistakes of people like Garrison and Manson, it seemed essential to study psychology. That was another subject I found more fascinating than conspiracy theories about the John Kennedy assassination. Already acquainted with Freud and other pioneers of psychoanalysis, I began devoting my attention to more recent trends. That the older theories were unconsciously tainted with reactionary ideology was frequently mentioned in my political readings.

In 1972 I discovered a psychology book that dovetailed beautifully with my political opinions, by then both anarchist and left of center. A collection of readings compiled by Jerome Agel and The Radical Therapist newspaper staff, The Radical Therapist anthology found the roots of nearly all neurosis and psychosis outside the individual, lodged firmly and visibly in the authoritarian class structure of society. As a sociology major at Georgia State University I had already begun to suspect as much.

There was only one hitch, best summed up in “The Radical Psychiatry Manifesto” by Claude Steiner: “Paranoia is a state of heightened awareness. Most people are persecuted beyond their wildest delusions.”

I wondered if that could be true. Certainly it was not without personal relevance, in terms of my own very unsatisfactory adjustment to the John F. Kennedy murder mystery. Perpetually fearing that my radical friends would think I was a CIA agent, because of what Garrison had said, and yet afraid that I would become paranoid if I delved into the unanswered questions about Oswald too deeply, I walked an uncomfortably narrow line.

In The Farther Reaches of Human Nature by Abraham Maslow (Penguin Books, 1971) there appears the following: “There is still another psychological process that I have run across in my explorations of failure to actualize the self. This evasion of growth can also be set in motion by a fear of paranoia.” Although I was not to read those particular words until many years later, I was versed enough in modern literature of psychology to realize that traditional Freudian notions of paranoid schizophrenia and classical paranoia were under attack by more than just wild-eyed radicals. One of my textbooks in school contained a sociological study of a man who was committed for symptoms of paranoia; it demonstrated that, due to his rather unpleasant personality, he was actually being secretly harassed by his co-workers who, upon being interviewed, admitted as much.

At that point I took a long second look at the origins of my own fears of paranoia.

What popularized that brand of psychosis for my generation was the film, The Caine Mutiny, with Humphrey Bogart clicking his steel marbles compulsively, saying, “I kid you not,” and making a fool of himself over a few stolen scoops of ice cream.

Another French Quarter writer who worked in a record store next to the Bourbon House, where I ate and drank and socialized when I lived in New Orleans, possessed a book about color psychology that said brown was the favorite color of most paranoids. He added to my information that most novelists tended toward paranoia, something about which we had both laughed a little nervously.

Another Quarterite, a painter named Loy Ann Camp who was among my closest friends, had a textbook from her days in nursing school that said paranoia was related to fear of latent homosexuality. Since my reason for joining the Marines earlier had been to prove to myself that I was a man in every sense, I didn’t find that information comforting either.

From additional sources I gathered that paranoids were quite undesirable cranks who took to sitting in corners stroking their chins and observing those around them with sidelong glances. Senator Joseph McCarthy was said to have been a paranoid as was Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society. In fact, all the really famous paranoids seemed to be anti-Communist — a consideration that did not sit well with my own rational capitalist philosophy of those days. Paranoids, in addition to all the other problems they were causing, were giving my politics a bad name with outlandish notions like Welch’s charge that grandfatherly old Ike was “a conscious agent of the Communist conspiracy” and his grandiose ambition to impeach Earl Warren from the Supreme Court.

Intellectual respectability required mental health, and it was becoming evident to me by then that mental health consisted of trusting everyone about everything as much as possible — and, for good measure, poking fun at anyone who didn’t. Especially to be trusted were the mass media, whose owners and personnel were not to be regarded as minions of the Establishment because, as they themselves used to attest with confidence, there was no Establishment in the United States of America. Only foreigners and paranoids believed that there were.

Intellectualizing and joking about paranoia was a favorite pastime of post-Beatnik, pre-Hippie Bohemian America — for reasons that were undoubtedly the result of coincidence, at least among individuals who did not want their sanity called into question.

A habitue of the Bourbon House, Chris Lanham, once entertained us with the diabolical theory that the psychological classification of paranoia had been developed by conspirators for the purpose of discrediting anyone bent on exposing them. When his friend, Jack Burnside, suggested sharing this hilariously evil notion with a wandering conspiracy buff we called Crazy David — because he thought people like the Rockefellers and DuPonts controlled the government — we told Jack the joke had gone far enough. Crazy David might actually believe him. And, as everybody knew, paranoids who received reinforcement for their delusions could become very dangerous.

In retrospect, I realized that Crazy David's views about who rules America did not seem especially insane. By 1972, my own analysis resembled it in many essential respects.

Then came Watergate.

Again my attention was absorbed by a public event that did not seem related to the John Kennedy assassination. That a reactionary warmonger like Nixon might be unceremoniously ejected from the White House for crimes that even Conservatives would find shocking seemed almost too good to be true. Eagerly, I followed the scandal, becoming more and more aware at the same time that conspiracies were a fact of political reality, even in America.

During the summer of 1973 I was in New York City, visiting my old friend Greg Hill, who in years past had accompanied me to New Orleans and lived as my roommate there for a few months. At a folk concert in Washington Square I was approached by a Yippie who wanted to sell me the latest issue of The Yipster Times for a quarter. A glance at the headline and cover photos convinced me it was worth the price.

What I found there has since been published in an excellent book by A.J. Weberman and Michael Canfield called Coup d'Etat In America. Convincing photographic evidence tends to establish that Watergate burglars E. Howard Hunt and Frank Sturgis were in the immediate vicinity of Dealy Plaza in Dallas the day John Kennedy was shot. That possibility brought to mind something I had almost managed to happily forget. A decade earlier in New Orleans I had discussed, among other things, the idea of assassinating President Kennedy with a man who in many unsettling respects bore a resemblance to the members of the Watergate break-in team. As I was to say to Weberman in a letter two years later, this man was "a plumbers type of guy."

Although he even looked something like pictures of E. Howard Hunt, his bald head diminished any direct physical similarity to that now-famous spy. More a matter of style than anything else seemed pertinent then. Also relevant were links between the CIA and organized crime that were coming to light in the wake of the Watergate revelations. For the man I spoke to used to let on that he was somehow associated with New Orleans mobster Carlos Marcello.

Already I had been suspecting tie-ins between Watergate and the J.F.K. murder because both crimes seemed connected to the Southern Rim or Cowboy faction of the American Establishment — the so-called military-industrial complex. I had, however, been bending over backwards not to jump to conclusions. Something about those photos of that man The Yipster Times argued was Edward Howard Hunt made such restraint harder. What, exactly, it might be continued to elude me.

Something else occurred that same summer that wore at my ability to keep believing this is the least conspiratorial of all possible worlds. Again, it was nagging rather than sensational.

After I wrote an article published in Atlanta's underground paper, The Great Speckled Bird, titled "Did the Plumbers Plug J.F.K., Too?" — I got two unusual phone calls.

First was a male voice imitating the sounds of a speeded-up tape recorder or a gibberish-talking cartoon character. Ten years earlier a Quarterite named Roger Lovin and I used to address one another in the Bourbon House with identical noises to those I was now hearing on the other end of the line, as an inside joke intended to freak out strangers. This time I simply replied with a word or two of bewilderment, and the caller hung up.

Within seconds, the phone rang again. Now a male voice — not Roger's — said very clearly, "Kerry, do you know who this is?" When I answered in the negative, he said, "Good!" — and again the caller hung up.

Enough similarity existed between that voice on the phone and the voice of the man I had talked to all those years earlier about assassinating John F. Kennedy, that I became increasingly uncomfortable with the idea of keeping my suspicions to myself much longer.

I nevertheless persisted in my silence for more than another year. That was more than a little uncharacteristic of me, to consciously nurture something without talking or at least writing of it. But, while I was no longer as worried about going paranoid as in years past, I remained concerned that others would think me paranoid.

Then, too, there was another thing. This suspect of mine more than once had claimed a connection with the Mafia. Even if he was innocent of assassination, were I to accuse him in public, he might have what he considered a good motive for getting me killed. Until I was certain of his guilt, I didn't want to open my mouth.

Meanwhile, I continued to think about the phone calls. Was the caller trying to determine indirectly whether or not I'd spoken recently with Roger Lovin? Could Roger have known something that I happened to guess in my Bird article?

As a matter of fact it was not so long before that Roger Lovin had called me, making an appointment to come by the house while he was in town for a visit. On the day of his expected arrival, the woman I was living with and I went out for a brief interval. We returned to find all her jewelry missing, and Roger never showed up. I recalled that when I had known him in New Orleans, in the same year Kennedy was assassinated, his principal reputation was that of a talented con-artist.

I shrugged. That wasn’t much to go on.

Soon there was enough information in the news about assassination plots involving organized crime to draw my attention in that direction. In February of 1975 I had begun making cramped, secretive notes about the mysterious bald-headed man I had known in New Orleans. For the first time since the assassination, the Establishment was expressing suspicions of conspiracy, pushing for a Congressional probe of the events in Dallas. Only recently I had been called by CBS and someone from Reader’s Digest was even attempting to contact me. Expecting that before long I would be called before a Congressional committee to testify, I didn’t want to divulge anything sensational until I could speak under oath.

Instead, I prepared — quietly. As soon as my notes were completed to the point where they told a coherent, if abbreviated, story — I began discretely searching for a politically radical attorney. Employed part-time as a student assistant and distrustful of the Establishment because of their dishonesty in the past about the assassination issue, I wanted a lawyer who was an idealist because, neither financially nor politically, could I afford any other kind. If my information was relevant, and I believed now that it probably was, doing anything useful with it was still going for a long shot.

On the other hand, I was less worried than ever about seeming paranoid. If one thing had been made perfectly clear, it was that in the United States of America suspicions of conspiracy were no longer regarded as symptoms of mental illness.

In July of 1975 I noted in passing headlines in the local Atlanta papers that city Commissioner of Public Safety, Reginald Eaves, had for some time been quietly investigating anew the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Although I had admired King while I held John Kennedy in contempt, I was then so preoccupied with things I was ferreting out here and there about the Presidential assassination that I failed to take much notice. For articles about the John Kennedy murder now seemed to be appearing everywhere.

From time to time I was meeting to compare notes with a staffer on The Great Speckled Bird who had written about the Southern Rim. Without mentioning my man in New Orleans with the bald head and links to Carlos Marcello, I sought further evidence that the cowboys of the military-industrial complex had murdered Kennedy in their way with the Yankees of the Northeastern Establishment. Marcello, as well as Nixon and Howard Hunt, were alleged to belong to this Southern faction. I figured the man I remembered and feared had to be in there somewhere.

Then I encountered an article in a scandal tabloid that disturbed me more than anything else, again for largely subjective reasons. One of their correspondents who was probing links between Carlos Marcello and the John Kennedy murder had blown his brains out with a .38 caliber pistol for no particular reason. As it happened, this resident of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, named Joe Cooper was lefthanded and the weapon was found in his right hand. The former girlfriend of the man with whom I discussed murdering the President met with much the same fate in 1964, just before I returned to New Orleans after a year's absence to visit.

Then early one morning the phone rang. On the other end of the line was the ACLU lawyer who at that time was the only other person with whom I had confided about the conversations summarized in my notes. One afternoon, after deciding I wanted him to handle my case when the time came, I had regaled him with a rambling, slightly hysterical account of my worst suspicions.

Now he was to ask me, "Have you been following this investigation by Eaves of the Martin Luther King assassination?"

I admitted I had not. "You might want to look into it," he said. "Their witness seems to be talking about some of the same people you mentioned to me in connection with Carlos Marcello."

That afternoon I obtained an Atlanta newspaper and read the article pertaining to what was fast becoming a controversial investigation. A young man who supplied accurate information to the police about a narcotics ring was also insisting that just previous to the murder of Martin Luther King he overheard one of its members say of King, “I’m going to shoot that damned nigger in the head and frame a jailbird for it, just like I did with Kennedy.”

Had the word “jailbird” been a post-hypnotic trigger been planted in my unconscious to release a flood of memories, results could not have been more dramatic. For one of the things my own suspect had discussed with me all those years ago was framing a jailbird for the John Kennedy murder. In fact, I recalled now that I was the one who talked him out of it. Moreover, he had also talked about assassinating Martin Luther King.

No longer in doubt that my man, known to me as Gary Kirstein, possessed advanced knowledge of the John Kennedy murder, I went into action. First I typed up a number of brief memos about our conversations and distributed them almost at random, in order to assure that if I was fatally silenced there would be evidence to indicate why.

Thereafter I endeavored to contact my prospective attorney, only to discover that he was out of town. Unsure of what to do next, convinced that I should act fast, I wound up taking my information to the office of the Commissioner of Public Safety. That was after I first attended a party where I was given a funny-tasting marijuana cigarette, that made me feel uninhibited and talkative, and then questioned intensively by a group of inquisitive individuals. And it was after, within a few days of the first incident, I again met one of the people from that party, who handed me a pipeload of marijuana that blistered the inside of my mouth when I started to inhale the smoke.

Commissioner Eaves then announced a press conference wherein he said he would reveal startling evidence in the King case. Instead, when the day of the conference arrived, he said he was dropping the probe — because, he said, his chief witness, Robert Byron Watson, refused to take a lie detector test. I was baffled and frightened.

Then the newspapers announced the disappearance of labor leader Jimmy Hoffa, and I recalled that the man I knew as Gary Kirstein once asked me what I thought about letting Hoffa in on a conspiracy to assassinate Kennedy.

Greg Hill, my former New Orleans roommate, arrived in Atlanta for a visit to find me nearly hysterical. At least once he had met Gary, remembering as I did that we had suspected him of stealing a typewriter from our apartment. Greg also drew my attention to a magazine article asserting that counter-cultural writer and publisher Paul Krassner had uncovered links between the Kennedy assassination and the Manson family.

Twelve days after I had taken my information to the Atlanta police, a ski-masked bandit pulled a stick-up at a party both Greg and I were attending and stole his identification and mine — taking only money from other guests.

From that day in early August of 1975 until the day of this writing in 1982 my life has been a constant series of similar misadventures — including poisonings, threats and bribe offers, intense psychological harassments, mysterious interrogations and occasional reminders about things in those fateful conversations with “Brother-in-law.”

I call that man “Brother-in-law,” because I am not at all certain that his name was really Gary Kirstein. There is every reason to surmise he was not using his own name, and I remember him most as the brother-in-law of a French Quarter character named Slim Brooks. And because of Slim’s extremely distinctive turn of speech, he himself seldom called Gary “my brother-in-law.” Instead, it was always, “Let’s go visit Brother-in-law tomorrow.”

I had arrived in New Orleans the day after Mardi Gras in 1961. Except for May, June, July, August and part of September of 1963 — I lived there until 13 December 1963. Beginning in the aftermath of the Bay of Pigs, and continuing up to about the time of the John Kennedy assassination, Slim must have uttered those words between fifteen and twenty-five times. Since these invitations were far apart and infrequent, I never turned Slim down.

Sometimes Brother-in-law would come to the French Quarter and get us. More often, Slim would arrange in advance to borrow his car and then would drive us to Brother-in-law’s house out in the country the next day.

It was difficult to take seriously what Brother-in-law said about his plans to murder the President. Not that Slim didn't seem honest. On the contrary, he seemed too honest to get himself involved with anyone heavy enough to actually go out and assassinate a President — if Slim would have to lie about it afterwards. To suspect Slim of being a conspirator seemed too paranoid for words.

In April of 1976 I again had occasion to think about paranoia in relation to the John Kennedy assassination. For I attended a lecture in Atlanta by none other than Jim Garrison, for whom by then I felt a lot of sympathy. In light of what I remembered now, it seemed his suspicions of me were only slightly misplaced. I was not a field agent in the assassination; I was among those who helped plan it!

In the question period after his speech Garrison said something I found both significant and touching: "Of course, I have to lean over backwards not to be paranoid, because I have been accused of paranoia in the past."

One of his diagnosticians had been me; now I was dealing with exactly the same double bind of trying to probe conspiracies without coming on like a paranoid in the eyes of my friends.

Through an emissary I let it be known to Garrison that I wanted to meet with him. His reply: "Not only do I not want to meet with Kerry Thornley, I don't even want to hear his name. In fact, I don't even want to think about Kerry Thornley!"

Feeling very much alone, I continued my daily dealings with what were obviously conspiracies — including a correspondence with a man I hoped was a charming crank who was telling me in his letters "why we Fascists assassinated Kennedy." How I got on Stan Jamison's mailing list in the first place some years earlier was a mystery to me. Since 1970, though, Greg Hill and I both had been receiving from him everything from advice about how to grow organic sprouts to racist newspapers published by White Christians who were armed and quite dangerous.

In reply to one of my memos about Kirstein that had fallen into his hands indirectly, he wrote me to say that the tragedy in Dallas was plotted by the Secret Order of Thule in such a way as to assure that no cover-up could remain convincing forever. Motive: to make the American public paranoid about their government and mass media. For paranoia, he told me, is a big step in the direction of mental health.

People who become paranoid, Stan Jamison wrote, will not rest until they discover every last shred of truth. Among the devices used to encourage awareness of conspiracy were the many crude Oswald impersonations that occurred just previous to the assassination. Puzzled for more than a decade about exactly that mystery, I had to admit this was the first credible hypothesis to explain it without making the assassins look like idiots. And had they been less than geniuses, there would have been no cover-up at all.

Jamison further informed me that the conspiracy was constructed in concentric circles, like Chinese boxes, with descending levels, so that only "the man at the center" understood afterwards exactly what had happened. Of course, I could not ignore the possibility that man might have been Brother-in-law.

What brought the many loose ends in the John Kennedy murder mystery together for me was this realization that it was a maximum complicity crime. Various factions must have been deliberately implicated on a blind-alliance basis, so that once the event occurred, every group of conspirators was startled at evidence of participation by someone besides themselves.

Like Brother-in-law, Jamison seemed morbidly fascinated with Hitler and Nazi Germany. Both men mentioned in particular little-known aspects of the Third Reich — such as the secret pagan rituals of the S.S. and the occult beliefs of Hitler's cohorts. Both repeated a rumor that Nazi rocket scientists discovered energy secrets the oil companies were repressing to this day. And whether either or both were living some kind of macabre hoax or were absolutely fanatical was impossible to decide, since neither man was without humor. For instance, Jamison always signed off with, "Love is Alive and Well."

As might be anticipated, it struck me that perhaps Stan Jamison and Gary Kirstein were the same person, so in 1977 I dropped in on Jamison unexpectedly at his address in Sacramento, California. Not only was he not the same man I had conversed with in New Orleans, but it was plain that the spine-chilling ranting in his letters was just a big put-on.

That isn't to say his information about the assassination could not have been valid. A warm, intelligent human being obviously unsympathetic to Fascism, he nevertheless seemed quite versed in secret society and intelligence community politics.

"I come on all hairy like that in my letters," he told me, "to scare off government agents." Although that statement didn't sound convincing, it seemed a safe bet his motives were not cruel — a consideration that leaves undetermined whether or not they were misguided.

How paranoid is it to fear such individuals? Perhaps that is the wrong question. Maybe we should ask ourselves: Is it rational to dismiss them in the name of popularized notions of sanity?`

Later on I was to encounter a rumor that Stan Jamison acquired his information from one Michael Stanley, then serving a prison term in California. As Lovable Ol' Doc Stanley, Michael Stanley was known to me personally as one of the heavier, darker characters of the California counter-culture. We met each other in a hip coffee house after I moved to Los Angeles about a year after John Kennedy's assassination. Although I didn't like to admit it for fear of seeming paranoid, I found Michael Stanley terrifying.

Perhaps if we clearly defined this thing we call paranoia it would not cause us to behave so foolishly. Genuine paranoia actually contains at least three ingredients: fear, suspicion and mystification. Technically, it is heightened awareness, but not yet perfect awareness.

Professional espionage agents are, for example, frequently both suspicious and mystified, but have long since learned to live without much fear. For that reason, we don't call them paranoids.

To be both frightened and confused, without a systematic method of blaming others for those conditions, is to be vulnerable to some other psychiatric classification than paranoia. Fear and suspicion combined with exact, provable knowledge as to the identity of one's oppressors is generally considered heroic. Paranoia, then, only exists in politics where fear and suspicion linger for no external reason and, as is more often true, in cases where the subject is incorrect about who to suspect and what to fear — the condition of mystification.

Unfortunately nearly all oppressors in conspiracy politics strive skillfully to mystify their victims — often with enormous resources to help the work along.

"The arguments he used to justify his use of the alias suggest that Oswald may have come to think that the whole world was becoming involved in an increasingly complex conspiracy against him," charged the Warren Commission, also saying, "Oswald was overbearing and arrogant throughout much of the time between his arrest and his own death. He consistently refused to admit involvement in the assassination or in the killing of Patrolman Tippitt."

Oswald's perceptions of reality may have been far more accurate than the words of his accusers.

James Shelby Downard

The following is a fleshed-out version of Shelby Downard's popular article "King Kill / 33°," which appeared in the first edition of Apocalypse Culture. The appeal of Downard is in his indefatigable research into blind corners combined with his paranoid's eye for hidden associations. In linking US history to the mystic conurbations of the Freemasons Downard reveals an intuitive genius. Mr. Downard's work has no corollary anywhere in respectable publications, and indeed such an "alternative" sort of scribe as Robert Anton Wilson charges in his Cosmic Trigger that Downard's JFK thesis is "the most absurd, the most incredible, the most ridiculous lIluminati theory of them all." Wilson further charges that Downard, in tandem with Fortean researcher William N. Grimstad, possess a strange and alarming reality tunnel; alarming because they may well lead us to accept the possibility that a grand occult plan has been orchestrated to turn us into cybernetic mystery zombies. Coincidence, crackpotism or conspiracy? You decide.

This is as good a time as any to tell you that Nothing Is What It Seems.

The power of the Secret Government over the news media continues unabated. During the time of the Watergate scandal others scandals of the past were reviewed, but the torture-murder of Captain William Morgan in 1826 — from which developed an anti-Mason political party that challenged Freemason Andrew Jackson for the presidency — and the murder of Joseph Smith the Mormon prophet, which resulted in the men of the Mormon Church withdrawing from Freemasonry, were ignored.

The information I present in these pages is well-known to certain news agencies who have chosen to suppress it; similarly the motivation for the JFK assassination has been plunged into cryonic secrecy — facts concerning the assassination are on ice and will be be revealed in the future in the so-called “Revelation of the Method.” The freeze-wait-revive scheme is part of the master plan of Masonic Sorcery.

The ability of the Secret Government to immobilize the release of vital information to the public is in part due to the apathy of American people, who are benumbed by revelation after revelation. It is a peculiar phenomena that certain revelations move people to action while episodic revelations of the same type stun them into inaction.

For years I have been trying to draw attention to Masonic Sorcery and its relationship to political control. I believe that many people instinctually realize the power that “Freemasonry” exerts on the Government of the United States; but since they are Hoodwinked they do not understand the secrecy, silence and darkness that surrounds the mysteries of the “Masonic Art.” And so control of the Government of the United States is traced merely to Wall St., and not to the crossroads of witchcraft.

America is a news ghetto where the news media continually endeavors to promote apathy while going through the motions, the lip-sync, of reform. Like a haunted house draining its occupants of will in return for sleep without nightmares, American people are mental captives of a Horror that feeds them misinformation as its stone bell tolls the death of individuality.

I publish this, in the wake of the situation Charles Seymour alluded to: “The moralist unquestionably secures wide support; but he also wearies his audience.” I have heard some Americans say, as though they were puzzled by a difficult question, “Why should I let such things upset me?” If those people not completely lost in apathy discover what the Master Plan has planned for them, they will get fighting mad.

Most “Freemasons” apparently have no idea of the evil that is part of Masonry, and if they do hear about it they don’t believe it. The same is true of most members of the Masonic-oriented fraternal organizations, for the Masonic Cryptocracy is a secret, anomalous thing.

> It is certain that onomatology, or the science of names, forms a very interesting part of the investigations of the higher Masonry, and it is only in this way that any connections can be created between the two sciences. — Encyclopedia of Freemasonry

> When the ancients saw a scapegoat, they could at least recognize him for what he was: a pharmakos, a human sacrifice. When modern man sees one, he does not, or refuses to, recognize him for what he is; instead he looks for 'scientific' explanations — to explain away the obvious. — Thomas Szasz, Ceremonial Chemistry

The "science of names" forms only one segment of the science of symbolism used by the Masons. Names, i.e., words, are merely descriptions and they rise and fall in usage like a Cartesian doll. Some words fall into disuse quickly, while other words are given meanings that are known only to the initiated.

The JFK assassination encounters this science in a decisive way, and contains a veritable nightmare of symbol-complexes having to do with violence, perversion, conspiracy, death and degradation. These elements are important not only as cause-and-effect in the murder of a president but in the ensuing reaction of the people of America and the world.

The fertility and death symbolism in the Killing Of The King rite, the Masonic Greening Ritualism, has been suppressed because its examination must necessarily reveal Masonry's mystical political influence. This would erode public confidence in:

a. The concept of Masonic progressivism, i.e., liberty, equality, fraternity.

b. Those who have shielded the conspirators.

c. The entire mental construct that passes for knowledge of the genuine nature of the U.S. government.

The Hell-Fire Club

The Hell-Fire Club (Monks of Medmenham, Friars of St. Francis) was a society of ruffians and drunkards who engaged in sexual orgies similar to those of the “Mollies,” “Gormogans,” “Mankillers,” “Blasters,” “Mohawks,” “Sweaters,” “She Romps Club,” the “Fun Club,” etc. Engaged in political agitation and conspiracy, they were dedicated to the destruction of the Catholic church. The membership was highly-placed in the British government: the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Prince of Wales and the Lord Mayor of London all shared in the “privileges” of the Hell-Fire Club. Benjamin Franklin, who was initiated into Freemasonry at St. John’s Lodge in Philadelphia, and who is credited with publishing the first Masonic book in America was a member and was also connected with the Lodge of the Nine Sisters in France.

Benjamin Franklin and Sir Francis Dashwood, founder of the Hell-Fire Club, wrote a prayer book which became the basis of the book of common prayer that is used in many American Protestant churches. Because Sir Francis Dashwood was the so-called Lord le DeSpencer, his prayer book in England was referred to as the “Franklin-DeSpencer Prayer Book.” In the United States that book was called the “Franklin Prayer Book.” It was composed at Dashwood’s manor-house at West Wycombe, the site of numerous rites of magica sexualis. Franklin and Dashwood created their volume of entreaties in between sodomy-sucking-sorcery sessions.

Eventually Dashwood dug a huge cave on his West Wycombe estate to facilitate the performance of sex magic. Later a road was constructed to High Wycombe which utilized soil taken from the cave dug by the Hell-Fire Club. Brunei University is located in High Wycombe and F.H. George, Ph.D., is director of its world-renowned Cybernetics department. George defines cybernetics as a “science concerned with all matters of controls and communications and to this extent it trespasses what we have come to think of as the established sciences.” Cybernetics, of course, is intimately concerned with artificial or machine intelligence. This concern is predicated, to a certain degree, on human cooperation with machines. Symbolism is a cybernetic science.

Miss Chudleigh

Miss Chudleigh, the “dollymop” for the Hell-Fire Club, was a Jewess. Certainly she was not “Miss,” nor was her name Chudleigh at the time she was dubbed “Miss Chudleigh” by Horace Walpole. Chudleigh was the name of a town and she was a “woman of common property” there. Complete secrecy of the harlots or “dollymops” involved in performing sexual perversions at the High-Fire Club was seen as essential. This concealment has to do with “the secrecy and silence of Masonry.”

Harpocrates, the Greek god of secrecy and silence, whose statue was often placed at the entrance of temples, caves and other places where the mysteries were performed, was of symbolical importance to the Hell-Fire Club. A statue of Harpocrates, which depicted him holding a finger to his mouth, was one of a number of statues used on club premises.

On April 24, 1783, Pope Clement XII, a bitter foe of magica sexualis, issued his celebrated Bull of Excommunication entitled In Eminenti Apostolatus Specula. it specifically decreed:

“In order to close the widely open road to iniquities which might be committed with impunity and also for other reasons, just and reasonable, that have come to our knowledge … We have resolved and decreed to condemn and forbid such Societies, assemblies, reunions, conventions, aggregations or meetings called either Freemasonic or known under some other denomination. We condemn and forbid them by this, our present constitution, which is to be considered valid forever.”

Due to Pope Clement’s decree Miss Chudleigh faced pressure outside of England. In an act of Defiance, King Frederick II became Chudleigh’s protector and bedfellow. Still, this was not so outrageous, since Prussia was not considered a Catholic country; however, Poland was. It was here that Prince Radzvil, the ancestor and husband of Jacqueline Kennedy’s sister, took the whore Chudleigh. The Radzvil fortune was considered the greatest in the nation. The family itself was related to the Hohenzollerns and the Romanovs.

According to legend, Miss Chudleigh carried a “mystical taint.” According to the Masonry of Cagliostro (magnetic masonry) there exists a thing described as “the transfer of magnetic force.” This “mystical taint” is supposedly attached to those who traffic in ritual sex perversions. According to the record, the fortunes of the Radzvils have declined ever since.

Macbeth and Scotland

Before pointing to the mystical associations between the murder of JFK and Shakespeare’s tragedy of Macbeth I wish to call attention to the appearance of the witches in Act I, Scene I, and to the line in which they chant, “Fair is foul, and foul is fair,” which is reminiscent of alchemical individuation or shaping of an integrated personality in the psychology of C.G. Jung, in which the “archetype of unity” (self-head, auto-cephalous), the Yetzer Ha-Ra and Yetzer ha Tov of the Jews, and the Masonic “Mingling of All with AH” is manifested.

It is important to note the appearance of Hecate to the three witches. Hecate is triple-countenanced, and being three-fold in aspect she is known as Diana on earth, Luna in heaven, and Hecate in hell. These three women comprise one of the triads of western mythology. Such triads were a central part of ancient religions, and the “mystical triad” idea became part of Masonic symbolism. There is in fact a triad of three governing officers to be found in almost every degree, and in the higher degrees there exists a symbolical triad that presides under various names, just as Hecate presides in different places under various names.

Crossroads were considered sacred to Diana-Hecate, the deity who is both virgin and whore (“Fair is foul, and foul is fair”), and such crossroads were the favored sites of the wanton women-witches and the Grand Masters (Masonic sorcerers) who were her votaries.

Crossroads are significant to ritual sex magic; the wearing of clothes of the opposite sex and the performance of bisexual acts are called “crossroad rites.” The women engaging in these perversions were referred to as “dikes,” and it was said that they traveled “the old dike road” and “the old dirt road.” These sorts of activities, in keeping with Hecate lore, are secret to the extreme. Tacitisque paebens conscium sacris jubar, Hecate triformis. (“Triple Hecate, who giveth forth rays cognizant of secret mysteries.”)

Crossroads were also places of human and animal sacrifice. Such rites were often carried out in conjunction with magica sexualis since the participants recognized an existing relationship between fertility and death. Hecate is therefore also identified as a “death goddess,” and her sex-and-death attributes are similar to those ascribed to Venus (Aphrodite, Prone, Kypris).

MacBird

The idea for the play MacBird possibly originated at an anti-war rally in Berkeley, California when Barbara Garson, in a speech referred to the First Lady as “Lady MacBird Johnson.” She is said to have subsequently decided to write a play based on Macbeth and have it performed at the “International Day of Protest,” but it actually had its premiere at the Village Gate Theater in Greenwich Village.

Newspaper publisher William Loeb charged that Garson’s MacBird implies that President and Mrs. Johnson were conspiratorially involved in the JFK assassination. Loeb asked his attorney: “… to research immediately if there is any action this newspaper can take to ask the U.S. Attorney of the Southern District of New York to request the appropriate court to issue an injunction against the further showing of MacBird.”

Newspapers throughout the country took up the cry. A drama critic for United Press International wrote, “MacBird, presented yesterday at the Village Gate, is a sophomoric, heavy-handed parody of Macbeth that strikes a new low in theatrical taste.”

The word “sophomore” is derived from the Greek words “sophos,” meaning wise, and “moros,” meaning foolish. Granted, it seemed foolish for Barbara Garson to challenge the system with the play MacBird, but let us see if there is anything shrewd, astute or erudite about the Garson parody. In the words of Erasmus, can Barbara Garson be said to be a “morosopher,” a wise fool?

President Lyndon Baines Johnson’s name is phonetically linked to the Macbeth clan. Clansmen were divided into two classes: those who were related by blood and those individuals and groups who were under clan protection. Consequently, clans had sects of different appellations and people with the same surname are known to have been attached to different clans.

The Macbeth clan is related, in a clannish manner, to the Baine clan. The lack of clear distinction between blood relatives and those under clan protection in Scottish genealogy has become so complex as to baffle expert genealogists. Numerous Scottish names are rendered with a variety of spellings and it is a matter of record that the sons of many Scotsmen spelled their names differently from their fathers. With this in mind, consider a clan listing of the Bain and Macbeth clan structure.

Bain, Macbean, Mackay, Macnab — Bayne, Macbean, MacKay, Macnab — Bean, Macbean — Beathy, MacBeth — Binnie, MacBean MacBain, Macbean — Macbeath, MacBean — MacBeth, Macbean, Macilvain, Macbean — Melvin, MacBeth.

The MacBeath, MacBean and the MacBeth, Macbean part of this clan structure apparently had tartans of their own. “Mac,” of course, means “son of,” and all the Masons of the Bain, Bayne, Bean, Beathy, Binnie, Beath, Beth clans all publicly claim to have the same ancestor.

The Bains (Baines), in keeping with this name-exchange, are apt to refer to the same clan even though the spelling may be Bain, Baines or even Bane, as it has sometimes appeared. All of these are in a clan structure with Macbeth.

We have ascertained that President Lyndon Baines Johnson, through the magic of mystery and words, is associated with Bain-Bean-Macbeth. Bain, in French, means, among other things, bath. There are obviously many types of baths — sweat baths, mineral water baths, champagne baths, milk baths, blood baths, baptismal baths. The resurrection bath of alchemy denotes rebirth, and the purification or absolution baths are given to Masonic “Knights of the Bath” before performing heinous deeds. There are many ritual aspects to the bath; for example, when he was vice-president, Lyndon Baines Johnson, of “blood bath” association, removed his shoes before entering a Moslem bath house reminiscent of the Rite of Discalceation in the Third Degree of Masonry, which has to do with assassination.

Shortly before the assassination of President Kennedy, Macbeth was performed in the White House. The part of Macbeth was played by actor Franklin Cover. In a photograph widely circulated in a national magazine, Cover is seen standing under a chandelier. The chandelier is a magnificent work of art said to comprise 5060 pieces of cut glass. Jacqueline Kennedy ordered the chandelier removed from the White House as one of her last acts as First Lady.

Chandeliers have tremendous symbolical importance in sorcery. For example, a chandelier is said to be the test of a “jettatore’s” power. A jettatore is a man possessed of the “malocchio,” the “evil eye.” Jettatore literally means, in Italian, “thrower,” or one who casts.

A photograph was also taken of Mrs. Kennedy at the performance, also showing her standing underneath the same chandelier that hung over Franklin Cover in his Macbeth costume. There is, in folklore, the superstition that when a wife believes her husband has been injured or killed by sorcerous means instigated by a jettatore, she is to go to that jettatore’s chandelier and throw her shoe at it. (None of this is intended to imply that Mr. Cover is a sorcerer, only that his picture under so symbolical an artifact is striking in and of itself.) It is also a folk belief that the taking of a position under a chandelier by a practitioner of the evil eye is accompanied by a sound. Slightly to the east of “Crescent City” (New Orleans) there is an area called “Chandeleur Sound’” beneath it, on many maps, is the word “Freemason.”

Kennedy, Beale and Bouvier

Recall Miss Chudleigh, the woman who served as the “great whore” for a time with the sorcerer-oriented Hell-Fire Club: after the edicts and bulls issued by the Pope, Miss Chudleigh was hard-pressed to find refuge on the continent and yet she was finally successful in the camp of a supposedly Catholic Prince — Radzvil — in an undoubtedly Catholic country. This protection may have somehow caused the string of misfortunes which later befell the apostate Catholic Radzvils since it was maintained that Madame Chudleigh was imbued with a curse or mystical taint due to her involvement in ritual sex perversions.

Gore Vidal, Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy Onassis and Caroline (Lee) Bouvier were the “stepchildren” of Hugh D. Auchincloss. Mr. Vidal is, of course, a well-known author. Some of his work describes the Kennedys as an “Illusion-Making Clan,” and alleges “they [the Kennedys] create illusion and call it facts.” However, in fairness, it should be noted that Vidal has also called them the “Holy Family” and the President and First Lady the “Sun God” and Goddess.”

When JFK was 22, Irene Wiley sculptured a likeness of him as a winged angel; her work was presented to the Vatican where it was used as a part of a panel in which the angel hovers over St. Therese while she writes in a book. After his fatal trip to Dallas, President Kennedy’s remains were code-named “Angel” and that was also the name of the “flying hearse” (Air Force One) which returned him to the capitol.

Tragedy seems to live with the Kennedy family, newspapers tell us. Indeed, Bobby Kennedy was assassinated, Teddy Kennedy suffered a severe back injury in a plane crash; before JFK’s assassination, his father suffered a crippling stroke, sister Rosemary has been mentally handicapped since birth, Kathleen was killed in a plane crash, and eldest son Joseph was killed in action during World War II. Only a few years ago, the son of Senator Ted Kennedy was forced to undergo the amputation of his leg; prior to that, his father was involved in the drowning of a young secretary which effectively silenced the Senator against those who murdered his brothers, since, with typical J. Edgar Hoover morality, most of the facts of the case were suppressed and would find a swift and international messenger should the senator from Massachusetts renege on his “commitments.” Let us examine the incredible symbolism deeply related to the Kennedy family and perhaps discern an etiology.

The “Rowan” is a death plant in herbal lore and was an ingredient in a sleeping potion witches gave their husbands when they wanted to perform activities to which their spouses would strongly object. The rowan, like so many “magical,” plants was used by Christians as protection against ill fortune. It was also a means of church decoration and was widely planted in cemeteries in the belief that it would restrain the dead from premature resurrection. In some places, the First of May was called Rowan or Hawthorne Day, or Rowan Tree Witch Day.

Peter Lawford, one time brother-in-law of President John F. Kennedy, was later married to Mary Rowan, the daughter of Laugh-In series television star Dan Rowan. Peter Lawford and Patricia Kennedy Lawford were divorced in 1966 and it was then that Lawford took his “Rowan” to bed. He also made certain similar arrangements for Marilyn Monroe in the service of John and Robert Kennedy. Marilyn Monroe has been described as the “Silvery Witch of us all” (Norman Mailer) and she is important in the fertility and death symbolism pervading the “Boston Brahmins.”

President Kennedy was the recipient of a birthday party in his honor in Madison Square Garden and Peter Lawford invited Marilyn Monroe to sing “Happy Birthday” there. When she was scheduled to sing, a spotlight was thrown on an empty stage and she was announced three times. She appeared after the third call and was introduced as “the late Marilyn Monroe.”

Among her husbands was a Shriner (Mason) named Robert Slatzer. In Slatzer’s book, The Life and Curious Death of Marilyn Monroe, circumstantial evidence is presented suggesting that Attorney General Robert Kennedy was somehow involved in the “curious death.” At no time, however, has Mr. Slatzer referred to Masonic sorcery.

The European news magazine, Das Neue Blatt details not only the much touted love affair between the Hollywood star and the President, but the rivalry between the First Lady and the star. The Das Neue Blatt article broadly hinted that Jackie “helped drive Marilyn to her suicide.” Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy Onassis has a family and a past at least as strange and enigmatic as that of her deceased first husband.

Mrs. Edith Bouvier Beale was the sister of John Bouvier, the father of Jacqueline. Mrs. Beale and her daughter Edith (Edie) lived in a state of wretchedness and destitution in a decaying mansion in East Hampton, Long Island. Eviction proceedings against the Beales were initiated because the women were discovered to be living in total squalor amid piles of empty pet food cans, newspapers and assorted filth. For some reason, Madame Onassis permitted a film crew to record the degradation of her aunt and niece, and anyone viewing Grey Gardens will certainly attest to the "House of Usher" eccentricities of the pair. As an analogy of control, it is interesting to note that a peculiar rapport occasionally exists between owners and domesticated animals, and that the Beale mansion reflects a reversal of roles in the master-pet relationship.

John F. Kennedy was born on May 29, 1917 at 83 Beals Street, Brookline, Massachusetts. Beals-Beale-Beal are names associated with the Kennedys through the magic and mystery of words. Beale onomatology is rendered thus: El-Bel-Baal-Be al-Beal-Beale. El is said to be one of the Hebrew names of God, signifying the "mighty one." It is the root of many other divine names and therefore, many of the sacred names in Masonry. Approximately one mile from Lindisfarne (the "Holy Island"/"Holy House") is a barren place known as "Beal." Lindisfarne is associated with Heredom, and the legends of King Arthur, the Round Table, Merlin, and other Camelot stories, as well as the Scottish Black Watch.

Bouvier means "cowherder" and Look magazine has traced this family to Grenoble, France where their first mention appears in 1410. "Jackie's" great-great-grandfather, Eustache Bouvier, fought in a French regiment under the command of George Washington while his elder brother Joseph remained in France. Look magazine located Mrs. Kennedy's Bouvier relatives in "the ancestral town" and this genealogical find brought relief and joy to the family, for as "Mama" Bouvier put it: "We know what they have been whispering about us. We had to swallow our tongues. Now they can say no more."

Arrangements were made for a delegation of Bouviers to journey to Paris and meet with their famous relation while the President was conferring with de Gaulle. During this period, a painting of the renowned Pont St. Esprit, located in ancestral Bouvier country was painted by the brother-in-law of Marcel Bouvier and shipped to the White House. This “Spirit Bridge” is equated with the “Bridge of Souls,” which, in turn, linked with the “Bridge of Dread,” “Baine Bridge,” “Log of Lerma,” “Al Sirat,” and “Cinvato Paratu.” Such bridges are symbolically associated with death and crossing them can be a difficult and harrowing experience. (Cf. Poe’s “Never Bet the Devil Your Head” and Kipling’s “The Man Who Would Be King.”)

Two French radio reporters drove Marcel and eighteen-year-old Danielle Bouvier to the Paris reception for themselves and the Kennedys. After traveling some hundred miles, their car struck a tree and Danielle was killed. With her had been a beribboned box which contained a gift for the First Lady, to whom it was addressed as “For my dear cousin”; inside was a tiny nightingale “broken in its gilded cage.”

Danielle is the feminine form of Daniel and Daniel is a Hebrew word meaning “God is my judge.”

News reports failed to mention the type of tree involved in the crash which took away “Danielle” and ruined her nightingale. Whether or not it was a thorn tree of the rowan type, legend has it that a nightingale sings with its breast pressed against a thorn.

The island of Delos is the reputed birthplace of Apollo and Diana. It is located in the southwest Aegean Sea and is considered the domain of Hecate, the patroness of the ‘Infernal Arts.’ Delos is alternately known as the “Island of the Dead.”

There is nothing more appropriate for the wife of a slain “Sun God” than a pilgrimage to Delos as Jacqueline Kennedy did. She also journeyed to the Temple of Apollo at Delphi, and to the ancient Greek Theatre situated above Delphi. It was here that the former First Lady performed what is known as the rite of “greeting the sun” — a fixture in mythology of great antiquity. One might observe that Mrs. Kennedy performed her “sun greeting” with the expertise of an Aleister Crowley.

Before she made her Apollo-oriented pilgrimage, she was photographed wearing a large “diamond sun-burst” on her head. She was reported to be doing some Greek “island-hopping” on the yacht “North Wind” owned by shipping magnate Marcos Nomikos. The island of Epidaurus was one of its ports of call where Jacqueline Kennedy attended Sophocles” Electra by the National Theatre of Greece, and then moved on to Hydra, an island named for the dreaded monster-serpent whose nine heads were capable of generation after decapitation.

Another important stop in Mrs. Kennedy’s highly symbolical peregrination is Santorina (Thera), an isle often connected in folklore to the Island of the Vampires or “sucking-fairies.” In fact, Santorina shares the same reputation for vampires as Haiti does for zombies, or the Dominican Republic for the CIA. According to these stories, there was at least as much sucking going on in Santorina (Thera) as on the island of Lesbos.

Mystical Toponomy

Mystical toponomy pertains to the magic and mystery of words intersecting with the Masonic science of symbolism. While it differs from the “Old Straight Track” rediscovered by Watkins in the early part of this century, in which alignments or ley lines were discovered to sweep through power sites of ancient religious uses, no one has thus far documented any political or sorcerous uses.

In considering my data, it would be helpful to consider a dictum of Einsteinian physics — a science few would accuse of fanaticism or irrationality: “Time relations among events are assumed to be first constituted by the specific physical relations obtaining between them.”

My study of place names imbued with sorcerous significance necessarily include lines of latitude and longitude and the divisions of degrees in geography and cartography (minutes and seconds).

Let us take as an example “Mason Road” in Texas, which connects to the “Mason No El Bar” and the Texas-New Mexico (“The Land of Enchantment”) border. This connecting line is on the 32nd degree. The 32nd degree in Masonry of the Scottish Rite is the next to the highest degree awarded. When this 32nd degree line of latitude is traced west into the “Land of Enchantment” it becomes situated midway between Deming and Columbus (NM). Slightly to the north of the town of Columbus are the Tres Hermanas (Three Sisters) mountains. The Three Sisters are found approximately 32 miles between Deming and Columbus and are a minute and some seconds south of the 32nd degree line. When this line is traced further to the west it is found to pass the ghost town of Shakespeare at a distance south of the town that is roughly equivalent to the distance which the 32nd degree line passes north of the Three Sisters Mountains. The names Shakespeare and the Three Sisters find their connection in the tragedy of Macbeth.

When this 32nd degree line is traced some little distance farther west, into Arizona, it crosses an old trail which meandered north of what is now another ghost town, but which at one time was the town of “Ruby.” Part of the old winding trail became known as the “Ruby Road.” The town of Ruby is established to have acquired its name officially on April 11, 1912, when a post office commenced operation. The town became notorious for many brutal murders which had ritual aspects. Four of these homicides occurred in a store attached to the post office which had been erected over the grave of a Catholic priest. Continuing on with mystical toponomy, one encounters the fact that the Ruby road twists north into the area of two mountain peaks that are known as the Kennedy and Johnson Mountains.

Johnson Mountain is supposedly named after the general manager of the Peabody Mining Company, who also had a town named after him. The 32nd degree of latitude is but a few seconds from Johnson. In this frontier town on a December evening, 1883, a man known as Colonel Mike Smith and a man called Mason were ambushed by gunfighters described as being of questionable reputation and questionable character. These terms are employed in Masonic writings: “He, (Captain William Morgan) was a man of questionable character and dissolute habits, and his enmity to Masonry is said to have originated in the refusal of the Masons of Leroy…" — Encyclopedia of Freemasonry

The attack on Mason and Smith, occurring as it did on the 32nd degree line near Keystone, is of ritual significance reminiscent of some other disputes along a certain Mason-Dixon line.

A “keystone” is the designation for the stone at the apex of an arch which, when set in place, “keys” or locks the whole. A symbolical keystone is vital to the legend of the Masonic Royal Arch Degree of York. The earliest known record of such a degree is in the annals of the city of Fredericksburg, Virginia on December 22, 1753. Fredericksburg is also the location of the “House of the Rising Sun,” a Masonic meeting place for such notables as Founding Fathers George Washington and Benjamin Franklin (of Hell-Fire Club fame), and George Mason.

The Royal Arch

The “Ancient York Grand Lodge” allegedly went out of existence at the same time as the Grand Mother Lodge and all other lodges of this rite followed it into “extinction.” Certain Masons have admitted that one of its degrees, the “Royal Arch,” is neither “arch or Royal Arch” (Secretary, Royal Arch Degree, 1759). He continues on to reveal that, “The Royal Arch Degree is not just a separate entity now, but part of the Masonic system.” Had this Royal Arch fallen into the desuetude of the York Rite as a whole, its keystone would be removed and the arch left incomplete. Arch magicians with a faulty arch can be considered to be quite unfortunate indeed.

An arch magician of high degree, according to sorcerous lore, was the third king of the Jews who was named Shelomoh and called Solomon. The principle legends of Masonry emanate from Solomon and the fabled Temple bearing his name. Every lodge is, and must be, a symbol of the Temple of Solomon. Each Master in the Chair is representative of that perfidious Jewish king. Though not all lodges are willing to frankly admit this identification with the ancient synagogue of sin, there is, in Tombstone, Arizona one which does publicly adhere to this label. Tombstone, Arizona was connected, by a variety of old trails, to the Ruby Road and the town of Ruby, which witnessed so many brutal killings.

It should also be noted that many Mexicans were involved in the Ruby shootings and Mexico is, itself, a master symbol of America mystica and a place where the very foulest deeds of Masonic sorcery and witchcraft have transpired. In 1884, the year General Guadalupe Victories became president, tremendous intra-fraternal strife broke out between the York and Scottish Rite (of which, like in America, numerous public officials were members and active participants). This strange Masonic war certainly calls into question the 18th century disbandonment of the York Rite, if it was able, some hundred years later, to resist the extremely powerful Scottish wing. If this appears to be a digression from mystical toponomy, it actually is not, for the land of Mexico is riddled with symbol place names which fit into the Three Sisters and 32nd degree symbolism.

To summarize this segment, one can chart a trail of symbolism associated with the 32nd degree by means of the Mason Road, Mason No El Bar, Tres Hermanas (Three Sisters), Shakespeare, Macbeth, MacBird, Johnson Mountain, Kennedy Mountain, Ruby Road and so on.

The Canadian Connection

Shortly after the assassination of John F. Kennedy, a Canadian mountain peak was named in his honor. Kennedy Mountain is located at latitude 60 degrees 20 minutes north and 138 degrees — 58 degrees 5 seconds west. The upper part of Canada's Disenchantment Bay touches the 60 degree line. Canada, too, has a Three Sisters mountain which lies at 58 degrees.

Senator Robert Kennedy made a journey to this mountain and made camp with the Three Sisters mountain range to his right and the Hecate Strait (a part of the intercoastal waterway reaching almost to Disenchantment Bay) to the left.

Before reaching base-camp for his high-altitude climb at Cathedral Glacier, Robert Kennedy stayed at "Whitehorse." A white horse is a funerary symbol and is used in Oriental burials: a white stone horse guards the Imperial tomb at Nanking. In the Occident, a black horse is employed for funerals and in the case of the JFK ceremony, the mount was Sardar, the horse given to Mrs. Kennedy by President Khan of Pakistan. Actually Sardar was not black, but a red bay, and had to be dyed for the occasion and his illusion could be viewed as a minor reflection of the generally unreal aspect of the entire rite: a ceremony of disenchantment symbolized by the tying of boots onto the Pakistani horse with the toes pointing backwards.

Lady MacBird and the Ghosts

After her ascension to the White House, Ladybird Johnson went to the ghostly mountains called “Los Chisos” which can mean, “the ghosts” or, as a corruption of the Spanish hechizo, signifies “evil spell,” as of the type cast by a hechicero and hechicera. Los Chisos lives up to its name by way of ghost stories told about that area, which have to do with stinking Indians, dirty greasers, filthy gringos and their victims.

Ladybird made her appearance in the Los Chisos area on April Fool’s Day, 1966. Perhaps she was there when fun-loving specters were having a macabre field day. Perhaps Hecate appeared in some crossroad melodrama and the Three Sisters lectured on mystical toponomy and Banquo talked on Shakespeare.

The Los Chisos Mountains are in the Big Bend National Park in Texas. The park is said to cover 1,100 square miles and has scenery worthy of the Arabian Nights. It is adjacent to such symbolical mountains as the Sierra de la Encantada (Enchantment), Sierra del Carmen (Carmen: charm, enchantment) and Sierra de la Cruz (Cross). The Sierra de la Cruz is a short distance from Los Chisos on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande and within that area is the town of Ojinaga. Here a so-called church, which is said to be a home of the Devil, is erected over a cave which is said to lead to the “Infernal Regions.”

Mrs. Johnson traveled from Big Bend National Park to Fort Davis to some sort of dedication. This military reservation is located very close to Coffin Mountain and Black Mountain. The inversion of the word Davis is "Sivad," which is associated with the color black, a death coach (coistebodhar) and with a coffin. Meanwhile, Lynda Bird Johnson was on a National Geographic trip whose first stop was at some mountains bearing the name Three Sisters (Tres Hermanas) in Monument Valley, Utah. At this particular time, President Johnson was on a trip to the far east where he visited the "City of Demons" and entered the "13 Acre Mosque," where he performed the Rite of Discalceation, which included a foot washing. Such ablution is widely done in Oriental nations when entering sanctuaries and temples. Whether or not he recited the following words of Macbeth are known only to the initiated few:

"I will, to the weird sisters; More shall they speak, for now I am bent to know By the worse means the worst. For mine own good all causes shall give way. I am in blood steeped so far that, should I wade no more, Returning were as tedious as go o'er. Strange things I in head that will to hand, Which must be acted ere they may be scanned."

The Killing of the King

Do not be lulled into believing that just because the deadening American city of dreadful night is so utterly devoid of mystery, so thoroughly flat-footed, sterile and infantile, so burdened with the illusory gloss of baseball-hot dogs-apple pie-and-Chevrolet, that it exists outside the psycho-sexual domain. The eternal pagan psychodrama is escalated under these so-called modern conditions precisely because sorcery is not what "20th century man" can accept as real. Thus, the Killing of the King rite of November, 1963 is alternately diagnosed as a conflict between anti-Castro reactionaries and the forces of liberalism, big business and the big bankers, this-or-that wing of the intelligence community and so on. Needless to say, each of these groups has a place in the symbolism of the Kennedy assassination.

The ultimate purpose of that assassination was not political or economic, but sorcerous; for the control of the dreaming mind is the underlying motive in this entire scenario of lies, cruelty and degradation. Something died in the American people on November 22, 1963 — call it idealism, innocence or the quest for moral excellence — it is this transformation of human beings which is the authentic reason and motive for the Kennedy murder, and until so-called conspiracy theorists can accept this very real element, they will be reduced to so many eccentrics amusing a tiny remnant of dilettantes and hobbyists.

President Kennedy and his wife left the Temple Houston and were met at midnight by tireless crowds present to cheer the virile “Sun God” and his dazzingly exotic wife, the “Queen of Love and Beauty,” in Fort Worth. On the morning of November 22, they flew to Gate 28 at Love Field, Dallas, Texas. The number 28 is one of the correspondences of Solomon in kabbalistic numerology; the Solomonic name assigned to 28 is “Beale.” On the 28th degree of latitude in the state of Texas is the site of what was once the giant “Kennedy ranch.” On the 28th degree is also Cape Canaveral from which the moon flight was launched — made possible not only by the President’s various feats, but by his death as well, for the placing of Freemasons on the moon could occur only after the Killing of the King. The 28th degree of Templarism is the “King of the Sun” degree. The President and First Lady arrived in Air Force One, codenamed “Angel.”

The motorcade proceeded from Love Field to Dealey Plaza. Dealey Plaza is the site of the first Masonic temple in Dallas (now razed), and there is a marker attesting to this fact. Important “protective” strategy for Dealey Plaza was planned by the New Orleans CIA station whose headquarters were in a Masonic temple building. Dallas, Texas is located ten miles south of the 33rd degree of latitude. The 33rd degree is the highest in Freemasonry and the founding lodge of the Scottish Rite in America was created in Charleston exactly on the 33rd degree. Dealey Plaza is close to the Trinity River. At 12:22 p.m. the motorcade proceeded down Main Street toward the Triple Underpass, traveling first down (Bloody) Elm Street. The latter was the scene of numerous gun fights, stabbings and other violence and it is the location of the Majestic Theatre, the Negro and industrial district. It was also the home of the Blue-Front tavern, a Masonic hangout in the grand tradition of “tavern-Masonry.” Sam Adams and the Masons of the American Revolution did much of their conspiring at the “Green Dragon Tavern” in Boston. One of the many bars claiming the honor of being the first Masonic lodge is the Bunch of Grapes Tavern, also in Boston.

The Blue-Front was the site of the “broken-man” ritual in which various members of the “Brotherhood of the Broom” swept the floor and tended some fierce javelino pigs. The Blue-Front was once a firehouse and was still sporting the pole in the late ‘20s. This is extremely germane symbolism. The national offices of the Texaco oil corporation are located on Elm Street, Dallas. Its chief products are “Haviland (javelino) oil” and “Fire Chief” gasoline.

On the corner of Bloody Elm and Houston is the “Sexton Building.” “Sexton” is heavily laden with graveyard connotations. It is closely associated to the beetles of the genus Necrophorus or Sexton beetles, so-called because they bury the remains of tiny animals with their legs.

Bloody Elm, Main, and Commerce form a trident pattern in alignment with the triple underpass as any Dallas map will show. Many analysts contend that at least three assassins were involved in the crossfire ambush of our Catholic President.

It is a prime tenet of Masonry that its assassins come in threes. Masonic assassins are known in the code of the lodge as the “unworthy craftsmen.” Because Masonry is obsessed with the earth-as-gameboard (tessellation) and the ancillary alignments necessary to facilitate the “game,” it is inordinately concerned with railroads and railroad personnel to the extent that, outside of lawyers and circus performers, no other vocation has a higher percentage of Masons than railroad workers.

Minutes after John Fitzgerald Kennedy was murdered, three “hoboes” were arrested at the railyard behind Dealey Plaza. No records of their identities have ever been revealed, nor the identity of the arresting officer. All that remains of those few minutes are a serious of photographs which have reached legendary proportions among persons concerned with uncovering the real forces behind the assassination. These pictures have been impressed upon modern consciousness in a way that perhaps only Carl Gustav Jung could describe. The only similar image which has also become a symbol of the people’s inability to uncover and overcome evil are the derelicts of Samuel Beckett's play, Waiting for Godot, whose entire theme is the futility of waiting for answers or expecting to penetrate the shroud of who controls us.

The "three" and "trident" allusions pertain uniformly to magica sexualis. Paracelsus used the latter to overcome impotence. In The Seven Books of the Magic Archidox, a trident is listed as the remedy for anyone wishing to overcome the machinations of perverted men and to regain virility.

Dealey Plaza breaks down in this manner: "Dea" means goddess in Latin and "Ley" can pertain to law or rule in the Spanish, or lines of preternatural geographic significance in the pre-Christian nature religions of the English (Watkins). For many years Dealey Plaza was underwater at different seasons, being flooded by the Trinity River until the introduction of a flood-control system. Thus the Dealey (Goddess-Rule) Plaza is present at the Trinity Site of Kennedy's killing. It should be noted that the detonation of the atomic bomb, whose alchemical creation and destruction of primordial matter was an Illuminist obsession, occurred at the so-called "Trinity Site," located on the 33rd degree of latitude. To this trident-Neptune site came the "Queen of Love and Beauty" and her spouse, the scapegoat, in the Killing of the King rite, the "Ceannaideach" (Gaelic word for Ugly Head or Wounded Head). In Scotland, the Kennedy coat-of-arms and iconography is full of folklore. Their Plant Badge is an oak and their Crest Badge has a dolphin on it. Now what could be more coincidental than for JFK to get shot in the head near the oak tree at Dealey Plaza. Do you call that a coincidence?

Oswald

The diminutive form of the name Oswald is "Os" or "Oz": a Hebrew term denoting strength. The role which "Divine Strength" played in the Dealey "Goddess Rule" Killing Of The King ritual should be given careful consideration. One should also note the significance of (Jack) Ruby's killing (destroying) of "Ozwald," in reference to the "ruby slippers" of The Wizard of Oz, which one may deride as a fairy tale but which nevertheless symbolizes the immense power of “ruby light,” otherwise known as the laser.

Oswald may have undergone biotelemetry implantation in the Soviet Union while a “volunteer” at a Behavior Control Center at Minsk. Oswald roomed with Cubans and was allegedly friendly with a Castro man identified only as being “burly” and a “key” man. “Burly” can mean burlecue or burlesque. The “key,” of course, is one of the most important symbols in Masonry and the symbol of silence.

If Oswald was the result of some Soviet Frankenstein process, why did he have to travel several thousand miles for such treatment when it is a routine operation in America? Here in the good ol’ USA it is performed in hospitals, prisons and psychiatric centers. While such activities of the Mill-of-Dread are pro forma at a variety of institution, there was a time when it was deemed necessary to do such work at Walter Reed Hospital. These implants were back alley operations in which the victims were overpowered in some place or other, drugged and then dragged to this government hospital. They were operated on, continued on a heavy drug regimen in a state that varied from somnolent to comatose for a number of days. The electrical function of the victim was recorded and monitored and the biotelemetry plant tested. Subsequently the victims were “brainwashed” and returned to the place where they had been seized. The targets then continued their existence, unaware of how their bodies had been invaded and their autonomy stolen. (This was a select procedure and not all of the staff necessarily knew what was taking place.)

Like the disgraceful treatment of the autopsy of President Kennedy, Oswald's is similarly weird. In point of fact, Oswald was literally butchered in the "post-mortem examination." Pieces were actually cut out of his body. The trenchant incision in his torso resembled a huge "Y," which ran from his groin to the solar plexus. From there, incisions were made to the right and left armpits. (It is also probable that he was castrated). The so-called "two horns of the letter Y" supposedly symbolize two different paths of virtue and vice: the right branch leading to the former and the left to the later. The letter is sometimes referred to as the "Litera Pythagorae" (The Letter of Pythagoras). "Litera Pythagorae, discrimine secta bicorni, Humanae vitae speciem praeferre videtur." (The letter of Pythagoras parted by its two branched division appears to exhibit the image of human life.).

In the 47th Problem of Euclid lies a secret of the Third Degree of Masonry. Pythagoras is called by Freemasons "our ancient friend and brother." One of Pythagoras' main doctrines was the system of "Metempsychosis," which pertains to the passing of a human soul into the body of an animal. Perhaps this was the intention of the autopsy — by cutting the Letter of Pythagoras into Oswald's body they sought to expedite transmigration, and they may even have gone as far as feeding sections of Oswald's corpse to a certain animal, for this too is a practice of what used to be widely feared as necromancy.

Arlington Necrology

The Kennedy and Oswald burials were both at "Arlington": JFK at the National Cemetery near Washington, D.C. and Oswald at a Rosehill Cemetery near Arlington, Texas.

Arlington is a word of significance in Masonic sorcery, and it has a hidden meaning that has to do with necrolatry.

At the Kennedy gravesite, there is a stone circle and in its middle a fire called the "eternal flame." The fire in the middle of the circle represents a point in the circle, the same type of symbolism recognizable in Kennedy's bier and coffin occupying the center of the rotunda in the Capitol. A point in a circle symbolized the sun in ancient sun worship. It is also a symbol of fecundity with the point symbolizing a phallus and the circle a yoni.

At the Oswald gravesite stands a small tree.

There exists an old belief that a tree which grows at or on a grave is embodied with the spirit-force of the person buried at that site, and that a twig or branch taken from such a tree has magical powers. I suggest that Lee Harvey Oswald's mother (Mrs. Marguerite Claverie Oswald) should gently remove a twig from the tree at her son's grave and then at every opportunity touch FBI agents, CIA operatives, policemen, et cetera, with that same twig. Such a procedure couldn't help but be more efficacious in bringing the murderers of JFK to justice than the Warren Commission.

Funerary Rites

John F. (Honey Fitz) Fitzgerald, the grandfather of John F. Kennedy, was elected mayor of Boston thanks in part to his "Wake House" campaigns that became much imitated. These consisted of a daily surveillance of the newspapers for announcements of deaths, after which a discreet "sympathizer" would be dispatched by Fitzgerald and a good deal of political mileage accumulated in the bargain.

For a time, the Fitzgeralds lived near the former site of the Green Dragon Tavern, established around 1680 and demolished for the widening of a street in 1820. The Fitzgerald home was on Hanover Street and the Green Dragon Tavern was on Green Dragon Lane (now Union Street). The tavern boasted the "first lodge room of Freemasonry in America," the St. Andrews Lodge, located within the tavern proper. In the mysticism of the Chinese tongs, the Green Dragon is a death symbol. A symbol of the latter is worn on a ring or held in the hand of a "hatchet man." The Green Dragon is supposed to impart the notion of a "license to kill" for it signifies that the murder is an affair of "honor": the Green Dragon is the guardian of the god-with-a-thousand-eyes who protects the sanctity of the third heaven.

Much of Boston's Irish population arrived in America in what were nicknamed the "coffin ships." Members of the Kennedy family were acquainted with the "Coffin Family." The Reverend William Sloane Coffin was the son of theologian Henry Sloane Coffin; Coffin the younger was a member of the Peace Corps Advisory Council that Sargent Shriver headed. "Shriver" or "Shrive" has the meaning of one who grants absolution to a penitent and it was customary to call upon a shriver before death. If the shriver was not available, a "sin eater" was summoned. The old pious cry that had to do with the request for a shriving was "Shrive me O Holy Land and Give Me Peace." To this the shriver would respond, "Pax Vobiscum:"

> The spell lies in two words, Pax Vobiscum will answer all queries. If you go or come, eat or drink, bless or ban, Pax Vobiscum carries you through it all. It is as useful to a friar as a broomstick to a witch or a wand to a conjurer. Speak it but thus, in a deep grave tone, Pax Vobiscum! It is irresistible — watch and ward, Knight and squire, foot and horse, it acts as a charm upon them all. I think, if they bring me out to be hanged tomorrow, as is much to be doubted they may, I will try its weights upon the finisher of the sentence. — "Wamba, son of Witless"

Sargent Shriver, "a Catholic and Kennedy by marriage," as head of the Peace Corps and in association with a Coffin, might be considered to be in a sensitive position in relation to mystical onomatology.

> In the ancient mysteries, the aspirant could not claim a participation in the highest secrets until he had been placed in the Pastos, bed or coffin. … The coffin in Masonry is found on tracing boards of the early part of the last century, and has always constituted a part of the symbolism of the Third Degree, where the reference is precisely to the same as that of the Pastos in the ancient mysteries. — Encyclopedia of Freemasonry

President Kennedy sat at the head of a coffin table at the White House. To his back, over a fireplace, hung a portrait of Abraham Lincoln, an assassinated president. On either side of the picture were urns that resembled the type called "cinerary urns" which are vessels in which the ashes of the dead are kept. A book about JFK was called Three Steps to the White House. In Masonry are what is known as the "three symbolical steps." "The three grand steps symbolically lead from this life to the source of all knowledge."

> It must be evident to every Master Mason without further explanation, that the three steps are taken from the darkness to a place of light, either figuratively or really over a coffin, the symbol of death, to teach symbolically that the passage from darkness and ignorance of this life through death to the light and knowledge of eternal life. And this from earliest times was the true symbolism of the step. — Encyclopedia of Freemasonry

The body of President Kennedy was placed in a coffin which was positioned in the center of a circle under the Capitol dome. The catafalque was a temporary structure of wood appropriately decorated with funeral symbols and representing a tomb or cenotaph. It forms a part of the decorations of a "Sorrow Lodge." This Masonic Encyclopedia reference is to the ceremonies of the Third Degree in Lodges of the French Rite.

Pictures taken of the Kennedy coffin and catafalque show these two props of the funerary rite as a point in a circle. Fecundity is the symbolic signification of the Point within a circle and is a derivation of ancient sun worship.

In olden lore of mystery cults and fertility religion was invariably the legend of the death of the hero god and the disappearance of his body. In the subsequent search and supposed finding of the body we see the contrivance of an elaborate psychological ruse, well known to the masters of the ancient mysteries. The body was said to have been concealed by the killer or killers of the hero god. The concealment of the body was called aphanism, and is a rite of the Masonic Third Degree. Anyone interested in comprehending the mechanics of group mind control would do well to study the Third and Ninth Degrees of Masonry in particular.

The disappearance of the body, this aphanism, is to be found in the assassination of President Kennedy:

> The President's brain was removed and his body buried without it … Dr. Cyril Wecht, chief medical examiner of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, past president of the American Academy of Forensic Scientists, and a professor of pathology and law, received permission from the Kennedy family in 1972 to view the autopsy materials (at the National Archives). When he routinely asked to see the brain, Wecht was told it was missing, along with the microscopic slides of the brain. Marion Johnson, curator of the Warren Commission material at the Archives said, "The brain's not here. We don't know what happened to it." Los Angeles Free Press, Special Report No. 1, pg. 16.

After the Kennedy coffin was removed from the center of the Capitol rotunda circle, it was taken, with pageantry, to the street for viewing. The funeral procession made an “unplanned stop” on Pennsylvania Avenue in front of the “Occidental Restaurant” and a picture was taken of the flag-draped Kennedy coffin with the word “Occidental” featuring prominently over it. In Masonry and in the lore of the Egyptian jackal-god Anubis, a dead person is said to have “gone west.” Several months after the Kennedy funeral, “Occidental Life,” an insurance branch of the Transamerica Corporation, ran an advertisement for group/life which was proclaimed, as usual, to be “new” but with a turn which was indeed original: the inferential weird claim was made that “Until now there was only one way to cash in on Group Insurance,” apparently some rather profound changes were made in the manner of things-as-they are after the Killing of the King had become a fait accompli.

The spontaneous stop was made because of the horse Sardar (chief), a gelding (castro), which was wearing boots pointing to the rear in the Kennedy funerary rite. Horses figure prominently not only in the pleasure of kings, but in their murders as well. James Earl Ray was convicted partly on the evidence of a “white Mustang” (automobile), Sirhan Sirhan claimed to his psychiatrists, trance-like, that he shot Robert Kennedy, “for a mustang, mustang, mustang…”

John F. Kennedy had demonstrated affection for the performance of a lady who was a renowned ostrich-feather fan manipulator (Marilyn Monroe). In Egypt, lamenting girls with ostrich feather fans sang a song of entreaty of the type that Nephthys and Isis reputedly sang as a dirge before the said partial resurrection and/or erection of Osiris. The said dirge of lamentation has become known as a Maneros, and the singers are entreating the dead to return, by singing “come to my house” and then offering inducements of some type or other. It is a damn pity that the ritualists couldn’t have had Marilyn Monroe and Rosemary Clooney sing a maneros at the JFK funeral.

Before JFK began his Jornada del Muerto (Journey of Death, Journey of the Dead) he was photographed with Tito on the winding stairs in the White House. “Tito” (his real name is said to be Josip Broz) is a significant name in Masonry since it was the title given to Prince Harodim, the first Judge and Provost said to be appointed by King Solomon. Tito was a reputed favorite of that evil Jew whose temple was a hot-bed of thievery, money-changing, male and female prostitution and sorcery. This Tito presided over the Lodge of Intendants of the temple and was one of the “twelve knights of the twelve tribes of Israel.”

Let me repeat, JFK was on some winding stairs with a man called Tito.

Winding stairs are symbolically important in Masonry.

The legend of the winding stair is taught in the degree of Fellow Craft. This is the Second Degree, and a person at this grade is, of course, a candidate for the symbolical assassination, euresis, autopsy, coffin resurrection of the Third Degree.

The number of steps in the winding stair are “odd” although no less so than the fact that this Tito or Harodim is a name translating as “those who

Elizabeth Taylor and the Yugoslav Tito

The number of steps in the winding stair are “odd” although no less so than the fact that this Tito or Harodim is a name translating as “those who rule over” the activities of the temple of Solomon.

The winding stairs of this temple, according to the Masons, begins at the porch and winds to a level purified by the Divine Presence (Shekinah) and dominated by the Divine Strength (Oswald).

President Kennedy preceded Tito down the stairs to a portrait of the assassinated President Garfield, where he was photographed and another picture was taken on the stairs before a picture of Lincoln (recall the black walnut rocker of JFK, comparable to the black walnut rocker Lincoln was assassinated in; the “Lincoln Continental” limousine in which Kennedy was shot and the thousand other parallels between the two men). It’s unfortunate that President Kennedy didn’t trip Tito and then slide down the stair-rail, for he was in a very bad symbolic position, as related to Masonic sorcery, and such unorthodox action might have rattled the “Prince of Harodim.”

The Scapegoat

John F. Kennedy, the one and only Catholic president of the United States, was a human scapegoat, a “pharmakos.” Pharmakos or Pharmokvos can mean “enchantment with drugs and sorcery,” or “beaten, crippled or immolated.” In alchemy, the killing of the king was symbolized by the crucified snake on a tau cross, a variant of the crucifixion of Christ.

Jesus Christ was tortured and murdered as the result of the intrigue of the men of the Temple of Solomon who hated and feared Him. They were steeped in Egyptian, Babylonian and Phoenician mysticism.

Masonry does not believe in murdering a man in just any old way and in the JFK assassination it went to incredible lengths and took great risks in order to make this heinous act correspond to the ancient fertility oblation of the Killing Of The King.

I have stated time and again that the three hoboes arrested at the time of the assassination in Dallas are at least as important symbolically as operationally, and that they comprise the “Three Unworthy Craftsmen” of Masonry. This mechanism is at once a telling psychological blow against the victim and his comrades, a symbol of frustrated inquiry and the supposedly senseless nature of any quest into the authentic nature of the murders, and a mirror or doppelganger of the three assassins who executed the actual murder.

As for the three assassins themselves:

"Perry Raymond Russo told a New Orleans grand jury that (CIA agent David) Ferrie said (regarding the assassination of JFK) that "there would have to be a minimum of three people involved. Two of the persons would shoot diversionary shots and the third … shoot "the good shot." Ferrie said that one of the three would have to be the "scapegoat." He also said that Ferrie discoursed on the availability of exit, saying that the sacrificed man would give the other two time to escape." (Quoted by W.. Bo wart in Operation Mind Control.)

Camelot

The Kennedy administration was referred to as Camelot, supposedly in joy over the renewed promise of the youthful and vigorous president, his lovely "storybook wife" and the potential of "New Frontier" reform. No doubt, if one attempted to point out the ominous symbolism of the Camelot phrase, such a person would be dismissed as "trying to ruin a good thing," but that has already been accomplished by someone else, and the resulting disenchantment has prepared us to believe the worst about the real story of our internal government.

The site of King Arthur's castle was not far from Tintagel, the Camel River and Camelford. The Camelot White House stories are symbolical fecal matter. Vice President Lyndon Johnson invited a Pakistani camel-driver to the White House and JFK, responding with his flashing good humor said, "If I tried that, I would have ended up with camel dung all over the White House lawn."

The officer in charge of the first camel corps in the U.S. Army was a certain Lt. Edward F. Beale. JFK was born on Beals Street and Jacqueline Kennedy's poor aunt, Edith Bouvier, was a Beale by marriage. In Quartsite, Arizona is a pyramid-shaped monument with the bones of a camel in it and buried beneath it is a Syrian camel-driver named "Hi Jolly." The camel and Hi Jolly pyramid burial site is in Yuma County, Arizona. Yuma, Juma and Yama are names of a Tibetan god of death who is the King of the Dead in W.Y. Evans-Wentz's Tibetan Book of the Dead. This god is given the power of reading the past and future in a mirror similar to that of the black magician Tezcat of Mexican mythology.

The Warren Commission

Gentlemen, don't pass me by!
Don't miss your opportunity!
Inspect wares with careful eye;
I have a great variety.
And yet there is nothing on my stall.

CAMEL
CASH

Mason Lyndon Johnson appointed Mason Earl Warren to investigate the death of Catholic Kennedy. Mason and member of the 33rd degree, Gerald R. Ford, was instrumental in suppressing what little evidence of a conspiratorial nature reached the commission. Responsible for supplying information to the commission was Mason and member of the 33rd degree, J. Edgar Hoover. Former CIA director and Mason Allen Dulles was responsible for most of his agency's data to the panel.

Is it paranoid to be suspicious of the findings of the panel on these grounds? Would it be paranoid to suspect a panel of Nazis appointed to investigate the death of a Jew, or to suspect a commission of Klansmen appointed to investigate the death of a Negro?

Representative Hale Boggs, the only Catholic on the commission, at first agreed with its findings and when he later began to seriously question them, he was "accidentally" killed in a "plane crash."

> Hoodwink (definition). A symbol of the secrecy, silence and darkness in which the mysteries of our art should be preserved from the unhallowed gaze of the profane. — Dr. Albert Mackey, Mason, member of the 33rd degree, foremost Masonic historian of the 19th century, writing in the Encyclopedia of Freemasonry.

That is how they see us, as "profane" as "cowans" (outsiders), unclean and too perverted to look upon their hallowed truths. Yes, indeed, murder, sexual atrocities, mind control, attacks against the people of the United States, all of these things are so elevated, so lofty and pure as to be beyond the ken of mere humans.

> The cryptocracy is a brotherhood reminiscent of the ancient secret societies, with rites of initiation and indoctrination programs to develop in its loyal membership the special understanding of its mysteries. — W.H. Bowart, Operation Mind Control

Hertz / Hartz

As seen from Dealey Plaza, a large Hertz sign looms over the Sexton building, apparently dividing it into two right angles at the time of JFK's murder.

Joseph Patrick Kennedy, father of John Fitzgerald Kennedy, rescued the Hertz Yellow Cab Company during a "stock crisis."

The name "Hertz" is traceable to Hartz or Harz. In the Hartz Mountains in Germany is a place called the Brocken where sorcerers were believed to gather. Sometimes an optical phenomenon or illusion is glimpsed at the peak of Hartz Mountain and persons see what is known as the Spectre of Brocken.

In the 18th century, representatives from witch-cults all over Europe made their way to a fertility and death ritual on this mountain and some were alleged to have been Masons. Masons were believed to have been able to communicate in some voiceless way, which was called telepathy by some and empathy by others. Empathy can be described as the feeling of entering into the spirit of a person or thing and so empathy is synonymous with the Rapport of Mesmeric Masonry. The witches at the Hartz Mountain festival came together in sympathetic understanding (Rapport) and were in non-verbal communication. In fact, at a given signal, the occult gathering began to cling together in a sort of "Epoxy" of "Agape" ("Love-In," if you will) that became a rite of magica sexualis and ritual intercourse.

Hertz is a name "renowned in the field of communication." Heinrich Hertz was a German physicist who was the first to investigate "electromagnetic waves produced in luminiferous ether," which is a rather archaic way of describing electrical waves which are now known as "Hertzian waves." Hertz was instrumental in the theory which led to the development of radio.

JFK's ancestry is traced to New Ross, a port town approximately four miles from Duganstown, Ireland. In the hamlet of New Ross is a tavern named the "Radio Bar," which is owned by one Gus O'Kennedy; Patrick Kennedy, the President's grandfather, frequented this establishment and the proprietor was a distant relation.

The long-running advertising battle which droned over the Hertz waves between Avis and Hertz Rent-a-Car corporations involves fertility symbolism.

By consulting the Masonic encyclopedia, one will encounter a brief blurb by Dr. Mackey which is probably one of the “thinnest” cover-ups in the entire work. It is the category of “Inversion of Words”: apparently, the Masons wanted to be able to explain away various phrases “cowans” (outsiders) might have come across in conversation or study which, without such explanation might be pondered to a degree detrimental to Masonic secrecy. Thus, the definition for word-inversion is a sort of bewildered disclaimer running along the lines of “How did this get here?” Poor, befuddled Dr. Albert Mackey of the “exalted” 33rd degree would have us believe that word inversion is not a central part of Masonic ritual. Anyone recognizing the link between Masonry and Jewish Kabbalism, a connection which might be termed slave-master, will note that a central dogma of the Kabbalah is the principle of the Inverse Sephiroth as personified by the Qlipoth or “Lords of Chaos.”

If one inverts the letters of the word “Avis,” as in the rental car corporation, one encounters the “Siva.” Siva is Sanskrit for “happy” or “auspicious.” Siva is also the name of one of the gods in the Hindu triad and in character represents “become-death, the shatterer of worlds” as a certain alchemist once said. The symbol of Siva is the Lingam or penis. Siva, like Neptune and Satan, is usually pictured with a trident.

The words “Wizard” and “Golden File” are formally registered trademarks of Avis Rent-A-Car System, Inc. The “Wizard of Avis,” according to advertising propaganda, is a “sophisticated computer” that “remembers everything you tell it” and the “Golden File” is “the Wizard’s permanent file” (memory bank).

In Latin, “Avis” means bird or omen.

Avis is a member of a corporate conglomerate, the center of which is the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation, which is engaged in millions of electronic exchanges involving the Masonic principle of Rapport, the Hartz Mountain principle of empathy, and the fundamentals of Magnetic Masonry.

All of this reminds this writer of the killing of our President on Bloody Elm Street in front of the Sexton building divided by the looming Hertz sign; a tragedy which also wounded Governor John Connally and car salesman James Thomas Tague.

Ferrie and Shaw

David W. Ferrie and Clay L. Shaw were habitués of the old “Storyville” section of the French Quarter of New Orleans. One could say that the entire official assassination investigation is a story of the Ferrie Tale genre.

Discharged from Eastern Airlines for homosexual activity, David Ferrie (Farie, Faerie, Feerie, Fairy) was said to be completely hairless and often resorted to pasting hair on his eyebrows and his head with, appropriately enough, spirit gum. He was also reputed to have been an exotic loser who failed in everything he did and who engaged in various impostures. So, the mystical charade of the Killing Of The King, Ferrie plays the role of a “medicastro” (quack).

Shaw was also a homosexual and flagellant, and since both men were centered in New Orleans, we can begin to understand the influences they were slated to represent in this most publicized of all American murders.

New Orleans, Louisiana, is known as “Crescent City,” in reference to the moon and is closely connected to lunar (lunacy) rites, prostitution and every other inversion of the so-called American dream. The CIA station-house connected to Oswald, Ferrie and Shaw as well as to the formulation of the JFK killing is, or was, located in a Masonic temple building in New Orleans, LA.

New Orleans will continue to play a major role in the murder, mayhem and perversion of the coming years. It is invariably in the limelight as a supposedly quaint and “spooky” place and which the public encounters in a film called Pretty Baby about prostitution and a 12-year-old child, and in Ishmael Reed's Shrovetide in New Orleans, a mother-lode of Voodoo rites which have no end of fascination to foolish people everywhere.

Ruby

On December 20, 1947, Jacob Rubinstein changed his name to Jack L. Ruby by decree of the 68th Judicial Court of Dallas, Texas.

The etymology of the term "Ruby" runs: (French) rubis; (Spanish) rubi; (Latin) rubinus, carbuncle.

In old law books it was once the practice to print some of the titles of the statutes in red and these were termed rubrics or a ruby and hence any fixed, formulated or authoritative injunction of duty was apt to be designated as being a rubric or ruby.

As a rubinus or carbuncle, Ruby pertains to the "Breastplate of Judgment" used by the Chosen Mispet (High Priests) of Jewish sorcery, enabling them to receive "divine" answers regarding the welfare of Judaism; some interpretations claim that the "Breastplate of Judgment" manifested the immediate presence of Jehovah and was also worn by Masons in Royal Arch chapters.

This "breastplate contained twelve stones," each symbolizing one of the twelve tribes of Israel. The carbuncle or ruby was connected to the tribe of Judah (Nopech).

The term "Jack Ruby" was once used by pawn brokers to indicate a fake ruby. In iconography, a ruby or carbuncle symbolizes blood, suffering and death.

Truth or Consequences

District Attorney for New Orleans, James Garrison, is alleged to have been an ex-FBI agent and to have been mentally disturbed at one time. Jim Garrison was an outsider in the Secret Society machinations of the FBI and may very well have been pharmacologically or hypnotically induced to set-up his ill-fated investigation in the “Truth and Consequences Commission.”

Truth or Consequences, New Mexico, is a town located on the 33rd degree of parallel latitude, and near the same latitude John Fitzgerald Kennedy became an oblation, and on the same latitude as the chief Temple on this planet in the minds of sorcerers, namely the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, which is sworn to be rebuilt on this 33rd degree.

This method and process of Masonic machinations is summed up in the principle of the “Making Manifest of All That is Hidden,” which is to seal for all time the allegedly irresistible force of the eternal pagan psychodrama.

In a literal, alchemical sense, the Making Manifest of All That is Hidden is the accomplishment of the Third Law of the Alchemists and is, as yet, unfulfilled or at least not completed. Two laws have been manifested — the creation and destruction of primordial matter (the detonation of the first Atomic Bomb at the Trinity Site, at White Sands, New Mexico, on the 33rd degree of parallel), and The Killing Of The King (at the Trinity Site, at Dealey Plaza, Dallas, near the 33rd degree of latitude).

The remaining law is to be revealed through researchers using the “Freedom of Information Act” to “make manifest all that is hidden” in a way that will be irremediably helpful to the enemy’s cause.

This is not a bluff meant to intimidate inquiry: that can only be done with physical or psychological terror, but human curiosity has never been successfully thwarted by threats of a “curse,” to say nothing of frustrating those who seek, on a higher level, justice and truth about the arch-criminals of all history.

I do not wish to discourage truth-seeking, but rather supply researchers with the final information needed to create an object which will serve as an immovable object to block their vaunted irresistible force.

The hoodwinked populace unfortunately, will sink lower and lower as they discover the extent to which they have been duped and may, reactively, search for a ruler or drug to put them asleep, to make them less aware.

We must demonstrate that we remain aware of all the enemies and all of their tricks and gadgetry and yet we must not be dissuaded from pursuing truth for the sake of the truth. Let the enemy take upon themselves and their children the consequences of their actions.

Subliminal Images in Oliver Stone's JFK

Dean Grace

This is a record of observations of subliminal images and possible subliminal messages in the film JFK using the slow motion and freeze-frame controls on a VCR. I have made this list in the order of appearance in which they occurred. Subliminals are at their greatest frequency and intensity during the middle and especially the second half of the film. The following list of subliminal descriptions is totally the result of my own personal observations.

1. Tight close-up of a man's face wearing eyeglasses can be seen three times during the movie. He appears to wear the same style eyeglass frame that Garrison wears. This is the first subliminal image seen in freeze-frame during the movie. Is it Garrison's face?

2. Black and white scene of Oswald being questioned by FBI agent after Oswald is arrested for fighting with anti-Castro Cubans. One moment Oswald is sitting in a chair by an FBI agent sitting behind a desk. While advancing the scene frame-by-frame, Oswald is seen sitting in a chair facing his questioner, then instantly Oswald is standing against a wall facing the opposite direction. The chair is empty. The subliminal message appears to be that Oswald can be in two different places at the same time.

3. Garrison questions homosexual convict O'Keefe. In the flashback homosexual party scenes, there appears a full-screen subliminal skull, then a rat in a cage, and then an image of a skull in the background over Shaw's raised left hand. All this can only be caught by advancing the movie frame by frame.

4. Man in dark suit passes three hoboes being taken into custody by police. There is a hint that the man gives the hoboes a secret hand sign. This happens later in the film in more detail.

5. White ghost-like figure in picture on wall watches Garrison and his staff meeting in Garrison's home.

6. During a carnival parade, an American flag is lowered to expose a huge human skull.

7. Garrison questions Shaw in Garrison's office. There are flashback homosexual situations and a very quick black and white scene where an old-fashioned 16 mm projector projects a film of a dark-skinned man crawling between the legs of a line of playful, white men in bathing suits.

8. Seen in David Feme's apartment following his death are a skull, rats and religious figurines.

9. Garrison travels to Washington, D.C., to meet with former intelligence agent, "X." Leaving the Lincoln Memorial Garrison opens an umbrella and raises it over his head. Agent "X" instantly recognizes Garrison, and their talk begins. Passersby likewise open their umbrellas, though it does not appear to be raining.

10. While "X" gives Garrison a short lesson in geopolitics and nuclear war, the Washington monument in the background appears like it has become an ICBM about to lift off, complete with yellow exhaust plumes.

11. A man in a dark suit passes by the three tramps and gives a secret hand sign for the tramps' benefit.

13. Garrison talks to his legal staff about the FBI agent questioning Oswald in connection with Oswald's arrest for fighting with anti-Castro Cubans. Scene shifts to black and white. One moment Oswald is questioned while sitting, the next moment he is standing, facing the opposite direction while the chair he was sitting in is empty. Again, this subliminal message reinforces the feeling that Oswald can be in two places at the same time.

14. Moments before he sees Robert Kennedy being shot on television, Garrison makes a sandwich using Wonder Bread. Of course, viewers wonder who killed JFK.

15. Seconds before he is killed, Robert Kennedy is heard to say, "We are a great country, and a selfish country, and a compassionate country."

16. Moments after Robert Kennedy is assassinated, Garrison goes upstairs and makes love to his wife. Horrible televised violence gets Garrison in the mood.

17. As Garrison and his team walk up the courthouse steps, a mysterious man with white hair similar to Clay Shaw is seen moving behind Garrison's left shoulder. Is Shaw stalking Garrison?

18. During Willy O'Keefe's testimony on the witness stand, scene flashes to a homosexual meeting between Shaw and O'Keefe. Above Shaw's left hand in the corner of the screen in the image of a human skull. A frame-by-frame analysis reveals that the skull opens its mouth in horror, and seems like it is about to explode.

19. A downward zoom over the Judge's desk shows the Judge's hand pounding a gavel. Nearby is seen a round ashtray that resembles the Wicker Man of the movie of the same name. The theme of the Wicker Man movie was symbolic ritual murder.

20. Kennedy waves as his car passes through Dealey Plaza. Scene momentarily shifts to a close-up of a man wearing eyeglasses similar to Garrison's. The image of a four-legged, deer-like animals moves across the reflection of the glasses. A gunshot cracks out.

21. A doctor puts the remains of Kennedy's brain in a supermarket style weighing basket.

22. In Garrison's final summation to the court, he says, "So what really happened that day? Let's just for a moment speculate, shall we?" A man in a black suit and white shirt raises an open umbrella in front of another man wearing a jacket with the word "Ripley" emblazoned on its back. Does this refer to Robert Ripley of "Ripley's Believe It Or Not?" or the sci-fi character Ripley of the movie Alien?

23. Man aims rifle with telescopic sight at Kennedy. Camera zooms in for an extreme close-up. Scene shifts to the objective lens of the telescopic sight. A reflection of an emotionless face in freeze-frame can be seen in the lens of the sight. This faces then metamorphoses into another face with a wild-eyed, devilish grin. This face then disappears, and then light begins to emanate from within the sight. This emanation gives the impression that the telescopic sight has now become the projection lens of a movie projector.

24. After James Tague is nicked by a stray bullet, scene changes to Claw Shaw holding an umbrella over his head. Several frames later the scene changes to a younger dark-haired man holding an umbrella over his own head.

25. Immediately following the shooting in Dealey Plaza patrolman Joe Smith stops and questions a man. The man produces a Secret Service badge and moves off. Scene shifts to the courtroom, where patrolman Smith is testifying on the witness stand. He says, "Afterward it didn't ring true but at the time — we were so pressed for time." The scene immediately shifts to a tall young man wearing a dark suit. He has his left hand up to his ear, as if listening to an earphone. This man turns toward the camera and clearly gives a Masonic sign of distress. He holds the palm of the left hand up and crosses it with the right hand palm down. This is done several times at waist level, with the hands held out about twelve inches from the body. This is the sign of distress in the Entered-Apprentice, first degree of Freemasonry.

26. After Garrison delivers his summation to the court, there is another downward zooming shot over the judge's desk. The judge pounds the gavel next to the round ashtray that appears to be a symbolic Wicker Man's face.

Other notes:

In the first scene in which Garrison makes his appearance, a German infantry helmet is seen at the top of his desk.

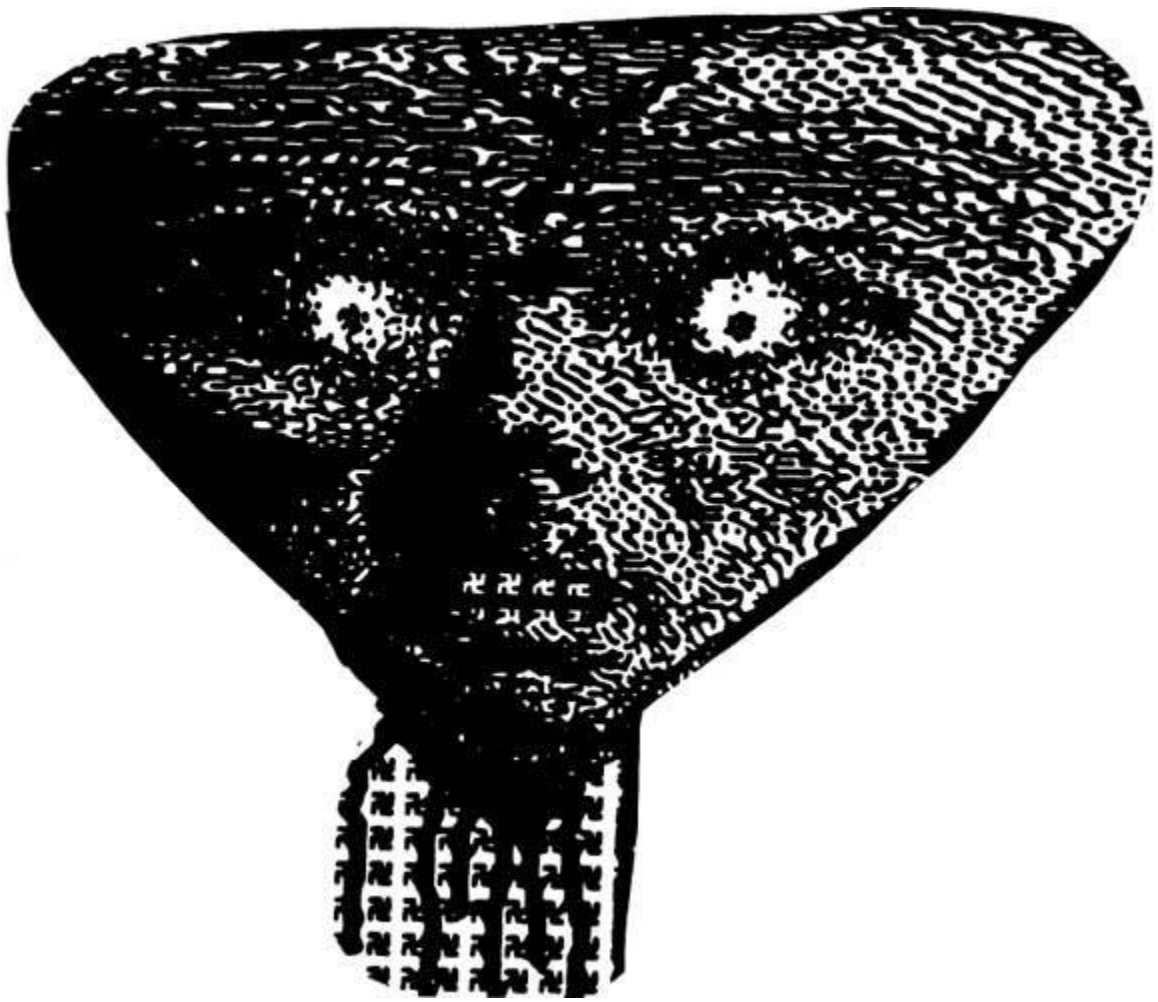
While standing in front of Guy Bannister's old office building, Garrison says, "I used to have lunch with him [Bannister]."

Garrison's young son, waiting for his father to attend a family dinner, says, "Daddy never keeps his promises." Garrison's baby then cries.

A jive-talking lawyer, Dean Andrews, hired by Clay Shaw to be Oswald's attorney, had been friends with Garrison for years.

Secret intelligence agent "X" says to Garrison, "Remember, fundamentally people are suckers for the truth."

Jim Garrison acted the role of Chief Justice Earl Warren.



TERMINATOR III

Underground computer video games circulating among Austrian and German students test the ability to manage a Nazi death camp and to distinguish between Aryans and Jews, a Holocaust study center says.

Eight copies of the programs, designed for home computers, were obtained by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles. The center demonstrated two of the programs for the Associated Press. Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the center's associate dean, said the programs are based on the Holocaust but often substitute Turks, many of whom work in Germany, for Jews.

In one program, KZ Manager, the player must sell gold fillings, lampshades and labor to earn enough money to buy gas and add gas chambers to kill Turks at the Treblinka death camp. "KZ" is an abbreviation of the German word for concentration camp.

The player must correctly answer questions about Turks or be taken by a Grim Reaper figure to the Buchenwald death camp.

"What you want to do now if you love playing computer games, you want to go right back in and you want to win," Cooper said. "It's a very shrewd psychology in terms of the design of the games."

Reports of the games have circulated for several years, but they were not believed to be widespread until a recent surge of reports in the Austrian media, he said.

Newspapers reported that a poll of students in one Austrian city said that nearly 40 percent knew of the games and more than 20 percent had seen them, Cooper said.

The game Aryan Test says it is by Adolf Hitler Software Ltd. The game Anti-Turk Test says it was made in Buchenwald by Hitler & Hess.

Distribution has been by electronic mail, under-the-counter sales, word of mouth and in deceptive packaging on store shelves. Cooper believes the games are the work of neo-Nazi propagandists seeking youthful followers through a technology largely unfamiliar to their parents.

“Not shocking to anybody, the kids are way ahead of the adults, and this is one area where the Nazis, the fascists, have found a way in,” he said.

In Israel a new computer game called Intifada — developed by a Russian-born supporter of Meir Kahane, who immigrated to Israel from the U.S. after a stint in the Jewish Defense League — has become a bestseller. Players score points for successfully using tear gas, plastic bullets, rubber bullets and/or live ammunition to disperse Palestinian demonstrators throwing rocks and gasoline bombs. Unlike real life, the game’s rules penalize excessive zeal: players lose points if, for example, they shoot to kill when only tear gas is authorized.

High scorers “win” a progressively more hard-line Israeli government, culminating in the installation of Kahane as defense minister, and restrictions on the use of lethal force are eased as the right gains strength. Responding to criticism, the game’s inventor told the Jerusalem Post: “When people started calling it a Nazi game, I felt I had to come forward to put the record straight… [The education ministry] is turning all the children into leftwingers. The only hope for the country is if the right is strong.”

THE MASONIC RIPPER

Jim Keith

The five murders attributed to Jack the Ripper were accomplished by left-to-right knife strokes across the victim's throat.

In Freemasonry, at the various levels of initiation, the initiate performs certain "mimes" depicting the penalties he must pay if he violates the oaths of the order. In the beginning degree, that of "Entered Apprentice," the mime is a left-to-right stroke of the hand across the neck.

Exact information on only three of the five victims of the Ripper exists. A report on the condition of the second corpse states: "The intestines, severed from their mesenteric attachements, had been lifted out of the body and placed on the shoulder of the corpse." The inquest report on the fourth victim, Catherine Eddowes, details in grisly fashion: "The abdomen wall was exposed. The intestines were drawn out to a large extent and placed over the right shoulder."

The protocols of the Freemasons state the method for dealing with traitorous Master Masons: "…by the breast being torn open and the heart and vitals taken out and thrown over the left shoulder."

The exposed location of the Eddowes murder (at Mitre square, in itself not without Masonic significance), as well as the possible use of a non-Masonic accomplice may explain the discrepancy between the left and the right shoulders.

The inquest on Eddowes also stated: "A triangular flap of skin had been reflected from each cheek…"

Two triangles comprise the sacred sign of Masonry.

The murder of Marie Kelly can be compared in its details to an engraving by William Hogarth, one of the first persons to expose the workings of the Masons. Hogarth's engraving, "The Reward of Cruelty," shows a victim laid out naked with a Masonic cable (a Masonic symbol of throat-cutting) wrapped about his neck. In the engraving the victim is in the midst of having his face mutilated, while one of the three Masonic killers is mutilating his eyes with a knife. The stomach and abdomen are ripped open, the heart cut out, and the left hand lays across the chest in the same position that Kelly's was found in. The legs and feet are being skinned. These mutilations describe perfectly the condition of the corpse of Marie Kelly when it was found.

"Leather apron," a name the press dubbed the Ripper with at the time, parallels a description of the Masonic vestment, also referred to as a leather apron, although actually being comprised of lambskin. A portion of the cloth apron worn by Eddowes was carefully cut off by the murderer or murderers and was found in the passage of Wentworth Dwellings, a message in chalk scrawled on the wall behind.

The message was:

The Juwes are

The men That

Will not be Blamed

for nothing

The "Juwes" is not a misspelling of "Jews," as has always been assumed, but are in Masonic lore three apprentice Masons who killed the master builder Hiram Abiff.

Jack the Ripper, the Final Solution by the late Stephen Knight, published in 1976, brings forth these and other elements which suggest the Ripper slayings may not have been the work of a lone madman, but the commission of a plot hatched by extremely influential Freemasons of the day.

As Knight explains it, Joseph Sickert revealed to a BBC reporter a story that his deceased father, Walter Sickert, allegedly had told to him. Walter Sickert, a famous English painter, had been a friend of Prince Eddy, Duke of Clarence, the son of Prince Albert, heir to the throne at the time of the Ripper murders. Sickert kept a studio at No.22 Cleveland Street, where Anne Elizabeth Crook as well as Marie Kelly worked — Kelly being the last victim of the Ripper. Here it is said that Prince Eddy met Crook (a Roman Catholic commoner), became romantically involved with her, and was then married to her in a secret ceremony in St. Saviour's Chapel. A child, Alice Margaret, was born.

Shortly thereafter a police raid took place in the area and two people were arrested: Prince Eddy and Crook. Eddy was released, while Anne Elizabeth Crook, as confirmed by records of the period, was confined to workhouses and mental institutions until her death in 1920.

Marie Kelly, the last victim of the Ripper, was said to have fled with the child and hid in a convent. The child was later given to Walter Sickert and placed in the care of his relatives.

According to Knight, the reason for the Ripper murders was that Marie Kelly, along with three cohorts, tried to betray the throne with information about the marriage of Prince Eddy to a Roman Catholic, then a despised minority, and the birth of the child.

The disposal of Marie Kelly and her partners in blackmail was entrusted to Sir William Gull, Physician Ordinary to Queen Victoria, whose previous services to the Queen included the signing of the document certifying Anne Elizabeth Crook as insane, and the performance of royal abortions.

Gull was a prominent Freemason, and his responsibility for dealing with the threat was additionally dictated by his Masonic vows. Any threat to the throne was seen as a threat to Freemasonry. The Masons were the secret power behind the British throne and if the throne fell (which was a distinct possibility at that time, due to general unrest and the rising popularity of Socialism) then the Masons would fall, too.

Gull enlisted the help of fellow Masons in the commission of the murders.

The location of the last murder, Mitre Square, is of particular significance. For an ordinary criminal the choice of Mitre Square would have been extremely improbable, completely exposed as it is to passers-by. But Mitre Square comprises the second most important Masonic locale in London, after the Great Hall of the Grand Lodge.

Since the appearance of Knight's book a number of television documentaries and even a movie have been made, bringing forth some details of the Masonic Ripper theory. Curiously, all of the productions have attempted to some extent to discredit Knight's explanation, leaving out relevant details so as to make it seem that the theory rests only upon one or two coincidences, eliminating any mention of the part played by Freemasons in the crimes, or glossing over the connections to the British throne.

Soon after the publication of this book the supposed Ripper diaries will emerge from a major American publishing house. It remains to be seen if the Masonic connection rears its head or is quietly "put to rest."

The Erotic Freemasonry of Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf

Tim O'Neill

Throughout the history of Western occultism, there has been a constant and intriguing tendency toward heterodox sexual suppression, ranging all the way from the wandering Gnostics of the Second Century, EC, with their prostitute "Sophias" and "Shekinahs" to the orgiastic self-mutilation of the Eighteenth Century Russian Skoptsi. From the psychological and mystical viewpoints alike, it is clear that asceticism and libertinism are simply the two opposing poles in a larger archetypal constellation, based upon the experience of ecstacy.

The legend of John the Baptist, holy man extraordinaire and his perversely and insistently erotic relationship with his seductive decapitator, Salome, is one of the most powerful examples in the Western Tradition, of this complex relationship between sadism, sexuality, asceticism and mysticism.

Exstasis, the freedom of the soul from what gnostics considered to be the prison of the flesh, can be sought through either pole of this complex and in certain rare instances, both asceticism and libertinism can operate together to produce extraordinary states of altered awareness. As the great Viennese sexologist, Krafft-Ebing pointed out; "Religious and sexual states of excitement show, at the height of their development, a conformity in the quality and quantity of excitement; therefore, under suitable circumstances, [they] may be interchanged." Ecstacy, considered as a particular and complex set of altered states of awareness, is the traditional working tool for all occult work. Through its gateway, many other alternate states of reality may be touched upon, entered and worked with. This ecstatic frame of mind has traditionally been sought in three distinct yet interrelated contexts. The Mystical, Magical and Mystery Religion workings of the West form the basis for virtually all of the esoteric groups and individuals in our history. Working through passive or receptive, active and cathartic means, respectively, they all seek to reach the same great gnostic goal; direct experience of the Numinous. For our interests, Freemasonry stands out as one of the great representatives of the Mystery Religion, or "Cathartic" approach. Speculative Masonry can be most succinctly defined as a Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century antiquarian revival of the old Mystery School systems of the Ancient World. By presenting the initiate with vivid and cathartic scenes of such archetypal matters as life and death and inducing their direct participation, it was hoped to instill certain gnostic and epiphanous experiences deeply within the subconscious. The effectiveness of this system has been proven for centuries, and follows certain sound psychological principles of great power. How could this archeological-psychological amalgam have anything to do with libertine and antinomian eroticism?

The history of Freemasonry is riddled with rites and rituals which can, only be safely described as "curious" and within that tradition, there is a long and well-documented stream of "adoptive," "androgynous," or other rites which allowed for the practice of men and women, either together or in separate rituals. Along with this historically significant trend, there exists a "shadow history" of covert masonic eroticism and antinomianism. To be quite fair, it is important to point out that these rituals did not generally have the support of official or mainstream masonry, but existed out on the fringes of the masonic world. I must also make it quite clear that the majority of androgynous rites had nothing to do with such matters, either. There do exist two important masonic rites, back in the Eighteenth Century masonic world, which have had persistent rumors of erotic practice attached to them. Again, I must use the term "rumors" since unambiguous internal evidence is only available for one of these rites.

Cagliostro's Egyptian Rite was a very complex system of oracles, quasi-Egyptian rituals and ceremonial magic, formed during the apex of the great period of revolutions during the last third of the Eighteenth Century. In this case, the masonic ritual was divided into men's and women's lodges, however it is still classed as an androgynous rite on the following remarkable basis. According to sexologist Paul Tabori, in his Secret and Forbidden, the main degree initiation ceremony in the so-called "ladies lodges" of the Egyptian Rite was openly orgiastic. To quote Tabori: "After passing through several tests, novices assembled at dawn in the 'temple.' A curtain rose and the spectators gazed at a man seated on a golden globe, completely nude, holding a snake in his hand.

The naked figure was Cagliostro himself. The 'high priestess' explained to the amazed ladies that both truth and wisdom were naked and that they (the ladies) must follow their example. Thereupon the beauties stripped and Cagliostro delivered a speech in which he declared that sensual pleasure was the highest aim of human life. The snake which he held gave a whistle, whereupon thirty-six 'genii' entered, clad in white gauze. 'You are' Cagliostro said, 'chosen to fulfill my teachings!' This was the sign for the beginning of the orgies." Alas, while Cagliostro's rite may have actually contained unusual and gnostic/antinomian elements, the ritual which Tabori "reveals" is clearly in the nature of hearsay. As was the case with many of these fringe groups, later, purely literary embellishments were not unknown, particularly when reported from the outside by unsympathetic detractors.

While the reputed eroticism of the Cagliostro Rite remains doubtful, it is difficult to dismiss the more openly erotic, bizarre and even perverse practices at the core of the religio-masonic group formed by Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf during the mid-Eighteenth Century … the famous Herrnhuter, or Moravian Brethren. Masonic dictionaries and encyclopedias list the group under several interesting appelations: The Order of the Grain of Mustard Seed (Orden vom Senfkorn), The Confraternity of Moravian Brothers of the Order of Religious Freemasons, the Moravian Brethren, or the Herrnhuter (Moravians). The earliest foundations of this Order date to 1722, when a religious group, per se, formed around Count Zinzendorf, in the area of Upper Lusatia. In 1739, the Order took on its masonic aspect. Coincidentally, this was also one of the first "innovatory" Orders introduced into early German Freemasonry. The innovatory orders were those which added new material, often Christian or Templar, to the traditional three-degree Blue Lodge system. It is still true, as Arthur Edward Waite points out in his New Encyclopedia of Freemasonry, that this was not yet a true “high grade” system on the order of the Scottish Rite or the Templar-legend based Strict Observance.

We do clearly know quite a bit about the Orden vom Senfkorn and Zinzendorf from remaining records. The Mysteries of the Order were ultimately based upon a phrase from the fourth chapter of St. Luke’s Gospel, in which the Kingdom of Heaven is compared to a mustard seed. Indeed, the masonic “Jewel” of the Order was a golden cross, surmounted by a mustard plant in full bloom, with the mystical motto: “Quod fuit ante nihil”… “What was, before nothing?” This gnomic emblem was suspended from a green ribbon. Now, christianized masonic rites were plentiful during the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, however in this particular case, one might detect evocations of a specifically Illuminist sentiment, in both the mystical and political senses. Almost as a Christian predecessor to Adam Weishaupt’s more deist Illuminati of Bavaria, Zinzendorf’s order proclaimed its purpose to be the extension of the Kingdom of Christ all over the world. Both Zinzendorf and Weishaupt proclaimed theocracies, with slightly differing conceptions of “Theos!” Along these theocratic lines, the Moravian Brethren wore rings inscribed with the phrase “Keiner von uns lebt ihm selber” … “No one of us lives for himself, alone.” This is a phrase suggesting both Christian and Illuminist sentiments at once, much as in the famous phrase in the Constitution of the United States … “all men are created equal”… a phrase which only has meaning in the Illuminist doctrine of the equality of all monads. Given the existence of such truly Christian Illuminist traditions, such as the Alumbrado, Gottesfreunde, Devotio Moderna, Bohme Kreise and Rosicrucians, this conjunction is by no means a contradiction in terms.

The genuinely religious and masonic character of the Moravians accepted, how is it that any erotic elements entered this matrix? It is important to point out that the Moravians, long since reformed, still exist in Germany and the United States as the Plymouth Brethren and the Pennsylvania Moravian colony, however, it was specifically the more bizarre eroticism directly attributable to Zinzendorf, that these latter day groups have eschewed, in favor of a doctrinaire Protestant Pietism. During the so-called “sichtungszeit” or period of sifting and searching, during the 1740's and 50's, Zinzendorf led the Moravians into ever more pathological territory, interpreting every aspect of the Passion and Death of Christ in increasingly erotic tenns. Slowly but surely, Zinzendorf created a truly antinomian theology, which came to claim that the disciple's own sexual relationship with Jesus is the key to salvation!

Zinzendorf's astonishing scheme of masonico-theological speculations begins with an obscure detail of New Testament history which should give infinite amusement to Freudians. The Count interpreted the wound in Christ's side, caused when the soldier Longinus pierced the body with his spear in order to determine if death had occurred, in openly sexual terms. This wound became, for Zinzendorf, the veritable birth canal of the Christian Church. The wound thus became a vaginal orifice, the "seitenholchen," or "little side cave" which combined the functions of birth, sexual pleasure and spiritual salvation! In the Moravian worship of the "side cave", it was declared that Christ was the bridegroom and sexual partner of all humans, male and female alike. Zinzendorf enjoined his followers to meditate upon the Cave and to enter it, in the most phallic sense possible, to live therein, play and take their pleasure to their hearts' content. During the course of these truly bizarre meditations, clearly influenced in technique and style, if not content, by St. Ignatius' Spiritual Exercises, the Herrnhuter became "Kreuzluftvoglein" (Little cross birds of the air), Wunderbienlein (Little wonder-bees), "Blutwundenfischlein" (Little fish of the bleeding wound), "Wundertaucherlein" (little wonder-divers) or "Wunderwurmlein" (Little wonder-worms). The hopelessly neurotic phallicism and infantilism of these conceptions belie the historical fact that a functioning masonic order took them quite seriously as the foundation for the illuminative experience!

Some hint of the wilder erotic doctrines of Zinzendorf are to be found in the early hymns of the Order, which combine sexuality and mystical flight in the most dizzying way. The phallus is addressed in one of these hymns as: "Und geheimnisvolles Glied/das die ehelichen Salben/ Jesus halben/heilig gibt und Keusch empfaht/im Gebet/in dem ven dem Ertzerbarmen/selbst erfunden Umarmen/Wenn man Kirchen-Saamen sat/Sey gesegnet und gesalbet/mit dem Blut des unserm Manne/dort entranne/ fuhle heisse Zartlichkeit/zu der Seit/die furs Lamms Gemahlin offen/seit der Speer hineingetroffen/das Objekt der Eheleut." (And you mysterious limb which sanctifies and commends the marital selves for the sake of Jesus in prayer, in the embraces designed by the Original Mercy itself, while the seed of the Church is sown! Be blessed and anointed with the blood which issues from our man … Jesus … feel burning affection for the side which is open to the spouse of the Lamb since the spear has pierced the goal of all married people." Remembering that this is being addressed to the human phallus, there are some remarkable and quite sadistic images of blood and semen in this school of Christianity!)

Another hymn could easily be read as ejaculatory utterances: "Ach, welche Bickel ich dir irzt schicke/ich bin ein Geist mit dir/und du ein Leib mit mire/und eine Seel/Du Seiten Kringel/du tolles Dingel/ich fress und sauf/mich voll/und bin vor Liebe toll/und ausser mir." (Oh, what glances I send you now; I am one spirit with you and you are body with me and one soul. You treasure of the side, you mad little thing, I devour you like food and drink to fulfillment and am mad with love, out of my mind.) As addressed to Jesus, the implications of this hymn become truly staggering.

Zinzendorf's essential doctrine claimed, that while Christ was the only true husband of human souls, He had delegated His own mystical power as Bridegroom to his functionaries on Earth; his "vice-husbands" and "marriage procurators", who must fulfill his duties and exercise his marital rights with his brides … earthly women. Under this doctrine, copulation within the bounds of the Moravian Mysteries became literal sexual union with Christ. Zinzendorf, as the chief deputy of Christ on Earth thereby became the chief marriage broker and undertook to regulate the sexual lives of the Moravians to an insane degree. Zinzendorf began the practice of "adjusting" marriages, switching partners to satisfy his own lust. Often, he held "mass adjustments" during which a large number of young boys and girls were suddenly thrust together in sexual union within the meeting house. After prayer and singing of hymns such as we have seen above, the young couples would perform an exacting form of sexual intercourse astride narrow benches. According to Zinzendorf's dogma, the sexual act, being purely the affair of Christ with His Followers, must be accomplished to his stern designs. Another sexual ritual was enacted inside a small, portable cabinet with windows, which allowed the "Most Excellent Papa"

Zinzendorf and his eldest mistress to view the proceedings with voyeuristic abandon. This was the famous Blue Cabinet of the Herrnhutter, which hid the rituals of the “Streitenchen” or “Little Fighters” for Jesus, whom Papa Zinzendorf married and instructed.

Clearly, there are elements in this insane massa confusa which are highly reminiscent of the Hindu and Buddhist schools of sexual Tantra ritual intercourse in a group, around the master, exacting performance of the sexual act for transcendent purposes; even the vaginal symbolism of the wound relates to the Goddess orientation of the Tantra. While Zinzendorf’s personal fetishes may still seem off to us today, we can begin to understand, with the help of modern depth psychology, that he was really in touch with a deep and archetypal current of erotico-mystical ekstasis that has been formalized in some Oriental religions. In our placement of the Moravian masonic rite in its historical matrix, we can also begin to discern the radical gnostic/antinomian bases for the Zinzendorf doctrines as well as the importance for the future of its intuitive excursion into the underworld of mystical eros. Zinzendorf emerges, not only as a wonderful and classic neurotic, but also as a true nexus for serious illuminative practice, sexual liberation and theocratic politics … a figure worthy of far more attention than has hitherto been forthcoming. In the context of modern groups practicing esoteric sexuality, such as the O.T.O., the G.B.G. and TOPY, Zinzendorf can now be seen as an important precursor and forefather… a liberator of the sexual current in the West.

Rumors, Myths and Urban Legends Surrounding the Death of Jim Morrison

Thomas Lyttle

So much has been written and speculated upon surrounding Jim Morrison's life, death and after-death that it is no longer enough to address just the facts. One must now also address the self-perpetuating mythos that has developed and enveloped the facts.

In the late 1960s, Doors' singer Jim Morrison founded a publishing company named Zeppelin Publishing Company with the help of the legal department of Warner Brothers Pictures and Atlantic Records. According to promotions for Zeppelin, "Jim wanted to get his hands on the trademark 'Zeppelin' before Led Zeppelin did. He did this while everyone in America knew who the Doors were, but before the other rock group was well known…" Zeppelin Publishing Company was chartered and put into hibernation for later resurrection.

On July 3, 1971, rock and roll wünderkind James Douglas Morrison was supposedly, reportedly, found dead in a Paris, France apartment he had sub-leased as a writer's studio. His "wife," Pamela Courson, was the first to discover the body in the bathroom. Jim lay in the bathtub, naked and half-submerged. At first she thought that "Jim was pretending," noticing that he had "recently shaved."

What immediately followed was a series of bizarre and convoluted events, probable conspiracies, strange coincidences and surreal news reports surrounding the death of James Douglas Morrison. Following the death there was a three day news blackout. This was reported on and questioned widely in the media, including articles in The Berkeley Barb, Esquire, The LA Free Press, Sounds, The Baltimore Morning Sun, and many others. Robert Hillburn writing at that time in The Los Angeles Times, called his obituary of Morrison "Why Morrison Death News Delay?" igniting a spark that has yet to smolder.

The blackout prevented Morrison's close friends from getting at the principals and witnesses — and the corpse — for close inspection. Even Jim's parents and his in-laws were prevented from seeing the corpse.

Pamela had called a local French medical examiner — Dr. Max Vasille — to take charge upon finding her husband's body. Dr. Vasille listed the cause of death as "heart failure". Several people viewed the sealed coffin, including Doors manager Bill Siddons, who apparently chose not to view the corpse. Siddons' official statement to the press was that "Jim Morrison died of natural causes" and that "the death was peaceful".

Although Jim's death was listed officially as "heart failure," his personal physician, Dr. Derwin, stated to the press that "Jim Morrison was in excellent health before travelling to Paris".

This has recently been complicated by "Queen Mu" writing in Mondo 2000 (Summer, 1991). Apparently Mondo 2000 surfaced a rare medical file regarding Jim Morrison's various sexual diseases, and the treatments he was undergoing for them. There was mention of "cancer of the penis…". Queen Mu reports:"… Hey! No one wants to be expunged from the Book of Life. How many medical workers at UCLA knew that Jim Morrison was being treated for gonorrhea in the Fall of 1970? Knew of the biopsy that confirmed adenoma of the penile urethra — often consequence to repeated gonorrhea? This is a particularly swift form of cancer whose only alternative may have been radical castration…"— Queen Mu, pp. 131.

No autopsy was performed on Jim Morrison's corpse, as is the usual custom in unusual or suspect deaths in France. Had friends been able to at least see the corpse this might have been done. According to several reports, Morrison confidant Alan Ronay also helped maintain the blackout surrounding the death. Jim Morrison's body was quickly whisked away to be buried at Pere Lachaise. Pere Lachaise is a national French monument and notables like Balzac, Edith Piaf, Moliere, Oscar Wilde and other French countrymen are buried there. Regarding Pere Lachaise: Jim had handpicked the gravesite on several occasions for his impending “burial.” He had visited the site as late as three days before his ”death.” This is reported in Break On Through and other Morrison biographies.

The media at once showed suspicion regarding Morrison’s grave due to the fact that foreigners are rarely buried in a national French monument. Reports like those in the Baltimore Morning Sun questioned how he might have cajoled his way into the cemetery to be buried.

Upon viewing the Pere Lachaise grave site, Doors drummer John Densmore stated: “… the grave is too short!” Doors manager Bill Siddons, when asked about Pere Lachaise, stated: “… how it happened is still not clear to me”. He was quoted in Bam!, a rock magazine back in 1981 regarding the controversy. At any rate, Morrison’s grave at Pere Lachaise remained unmarked for several months, adding and maintaining a further remained unmarked for several months, adding and maintaining a further cloak around the corpse and the evidence.

Only two people saw Jim Morrison’s dead body — his wife Pamela and Dr. Vasille. Dr. Vasille has repeatedly denied interviews and will not answer questions, and Pamela is dead.

The Occult Connection

Besides the “facts” as laid out in countless books, films, interviews and press reports, there exists also a wild and surreal assortment of rumors regarding “what really took place”. Many of these rumors center in on the occult, black and white magick, Voodoo, magical Christianity and assorted mystical strangenesses. In J. Prochniky’s biography of Morrison, Break On Through, there is this description of Morrison-based occult rumors: “… even more incredible were theories that Morrison had somehow been “murdered” through “supernatural means”. While Jim was fascinated with the occult, it is quite an assumption that a jealous rival or jilted lover could cause his death in a Paris bathtub by stabbing a Voodoo doll or melting down a Doors album while chanting a curse.”

“… Another supernatural-based theory is that Morrison’s body had been driven to great extremes by the spirit of the shaman he believed had entered his body as a child on that New Mexico highway. When this spirit or a demon has used its talents to influence the world, it abandoned Jim and left him a physically wasted and mentally exhausted man who felt betrayed with no desire to go on…” — Riordan and Prochniky, pp. 466

Another occult theory exists in No One Here Gets Out Alive by Sugarman and Hopkins. Regarding Jim’s death they state:

“… Other theories abounded in Jim’s close circle of friends. One had him killed when someone plucked out his eyes with a knife (“to free his soul”, as the story had it). Another had a spurned mistress killing him long distance from New York by Witchcraft…” — Sugarman and Hopkins, pp. 372

Anthropologist Alison Bailey Kennedy even went so far as to tie Morrison in with Orphic mystery cults and the initiatory uses of various spider venoms, which release the “deuende in Gypsy tradition — the dark soul that burn incandescently like a cicada, immolating itself in fiery passion.”

Jim Morrison many times claimed connections to the occult and specifically Voodoo or Voudun philosophy and magick. It was a part of his “path”. The moniker “Mr. Mojo Risin’” was an anagram — a rearrangement of the letters in Jim Morrison. Mojo is a religious term describing shamanic “power icon” or affiliation. The African root Mo refers to the dark or darkness. Mojo is a specific African/Voodoun/Obeah traditional term.

“I think that there are whole regions of images and feelings that are rarely given outlet in daily life… when they do come out, they can take perverse forms” said Morrison circa 1968. He goes on to say that “the shaman is the healer, like the Witch-doctor.” Morrison reiterates elsewhere that “we must not forget that the snake or the lizard is identified with the unconscious and the forces of evil…” So says the legendary “Lizard King”. “The Lizard King” was one of Jim Morrison’s occult code names. He was also called “The Exterminating Angel” in occult circles, according to film critic Gene Youngblood and others.

In No One Hear Gets Out Alive authors Hopkins and Sugarman recount Morrison drinking blood with Witch-initiate Ingrid Thompson. In certain occult traditions, the use of blood combined with certain sexual acts is reginmen, part of a hidden technology for spell casting. This is especially so in the Tantric Varna Marg (left-handed) rites. It is also a part of Western ritual magic, used in groups like La Couleuvre Noir, the Ordo Templi Orientis, Les Ophitis and others, although it is more uncommon than common in occult work.

This sort of sorcery is also used in Voodoo/Voudun Petro rites to summon different Loas (gods and goddesses). Speaking of the Tantra Varna Marg and the Voodoo Petro, there is this description of death mythology pertinent to Jim Morrison’s occult beliefs and possibly his practices. At the very least he would have known of these ideas.

“… but the human form is no means just an empty vessel for the Gods… Rather it is a critical locus where a number of sacred forces may converge. The players are the basic components of man: the z’etiole, the gros bon ange and the ti bon ange, as well as the n’ame of the corpse cadaver. The latter is the body itself, the flesh and the blood. The n’ame is the gift from God and the spirit of the flesh that allows each cell in the body to function. It is the residual presence of the n’ame for example, that gives form to the corpse long after the clinical “death” of the body. The n’ame, upon the “death” of the body begins to pass slowly into the organisms of the soil… A process that takes 18 months to complete…”— Davis, pp. 99

Remember, Jim Morrison’s grave at Pere Lachait remained unmarked for several months so that no one might disturb the corpse and the surrounding site.

According to Tibetan tradition, something similar is believed to exist so far as naming the components of the soul and the body. The Varna Marg and especially the Bardo Thodol (the Tibetan Book of the Dead) relate specific death myths concerning what occurs right after someone dies.

Writing in Psychedelic Monographs and Essays, psychiatrist Dr. Rick Strassman shows that:

“… Another model of birth and death, and transformation in which the 49 day interval appears is in the Bardo Thodol… This is the time when the life forces of the deceased — the energetic tendencies accumulated during “life,” “decide on” or gravitate towards or coalesce around the next incarnate form…” — Strassman, pp. 182

Rock writer Greg Shaw, writing in Bam! and Mojo Navigator interpreted Morrison’s song “The End” along these lines also, stating that each line in the song is a direct quote from the Bardo Thodol. It all “makes perfect sense, if one is familiar with the mystical background,” said Shaw.

What are the implications for these ideas in light of the supposed “death” of Jim Morrison? At clinical death, according to the above, the person actually splits up into his or her true parts, formerly connected into a whole being.

According to occult lore, it is possible to ensnare or trap parts of the personality or spirit during this transition. Wade Davis, author of The Serpent and the Rainbow and Passage of Darkness: The Ethnobiology of the Haitian Zombie, has this to say:

“During initiation, for example the ti bon ange may be extracted from the body and housed in a clay jar called a canari. A canari is a clay jar that has been placed at the inner sanctuary of the hounfour (ritual house)."

"… During the stages directly following the physical death and the first stages of after-death the ti bon ange is extremely vulnerable… Only when it is liberated from the flesh… is it relatively safe…" — Davis, pp. 102

Is it Jim Morrison's ti bon ange that is at the root of all these occult rumors? Was it his ti bon ange that was bought, sold and then collected on that fateful day in Paris when he "died?"

That canari has a name. It is called Zeppelin Publishing Company. And the bokor, or Voodoo high priest who cajoled Morrison's ti bon ange into the canari? He runs a company called the B of A Company (or B of A Communications), formerly of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and now of Fort Lauderdale, Florida. He owns an active passport and IDs under the name of James Douglas Morrison and claims to actually be the not-so-dead rock star!

In the first two years after Jim Morrison's "death" in Paris, many sightings of the rock star were reported. These sightings range from the totally spurious and ridiculous to the reliable and very hard to shake. The LA Free Press and several wire service reports described someone in 1973 appearing on several occasions in San Francisco. There Morrison was involved with business and banking transactions with the Bank of America of San Francisco. The employee that handled the transactions, Walt Fleischer, confirmed that someone resembling Morrison and using that name was indeed doing business at the Bank of America. He did add that he "was far from sure that this was the 'dead' artist" as Morrison showed no identification. Could this be because a photo ID was already on file at the bank, with the name James Douglas Morrison? Yes, it is still on file.

According to authors Riordan and Prochniky, Morrison was also seen on several occasions hanging out in "unpleasant places" in Los Angeles and wearing Morrison's leather garb, all in black. This was over a period of two years right after the Paris "death." I researched this a bit further and found out that the "unpleasant places" meant notorious gay leather bars, and the underground gay community in Los Angeles.

There were also many rumors that Morrison was also appearing regularly in Louisiana and had made several radio interviews. Again, Prochniky and Riordan reveal that: "… At an obscure radio station in the Midwest Jim supposedly showed up in the dead of night and did a lengthy interview that explained it all… After the interview he vanished into the darkness again. As you might guess, no recordings of the interview exist and no reliable source remembers hearing the broadcast…"

A record called "Phantom's Divine Comedy" was released in 1974. This was rumored to be Jim Morrison singing with an anonymous band with the names of "drummer X, bassist Y, and keyboardist Z". The music reportedly resembled Jim Morrison's sound quite well. All this again added and sparked the rumor mills, and stirred public fascination.

However, in a 1992 press released from the Zeppelin group, it is revealed that Morrison pal Iggy Pop was actually doing all the singing and helping the "hoax" along. This added more fuel as to how many people were actually involved in maintaining his "death hoax." Up until the 1992 press release, the record company that had released Phantom had refused to divulge the names on the LP, or the singer's name — which was indeed Iggy Pop.

Regarding all these rumors, Doors keyboardist Ray Manzarek stated: "If there was one guy that would have been capable of staging his own death — getting a phony death certificate and paying off some French doctor… And putting a hundred and fifty pound sack of sand into a coffin and splitting to some point on this planet — Africa, who knows where — it is Jim Morrison who would have been able to pull it off." Jim Morrison's best friend Tom Baker, writing in High Times (June, 1981) had this to say: "I was very tempted to believe the rumors that Jim had faked his own death."

A group of fans actually went so far as to try to get Morrison's dental records, apparently to try to get permission to dig up his body and match the records to the remains. This was immediately blocked both by Morrison's parents and their attorneys — at least for the time being.

It is known that Jim Morrison had repeatedly planted the seeds which would lead to this sort of speculation — that he had somehow faked his own death and dropped out into a new identity. At the Fillmore in San Francisco in 1967, Jim started suggesting that he should pull a “death stunt” to bring national press attention onto the band. This was when he came up with the “Mr. Mojo Risin” anagram which would be used after he “split to Africa” and wished to secretly contact friends.

Morrison also told Danny Sugarman and Jerry Hopkins on more than one occasion that he could see himself “radically changing careers, reappearing as a suited and neck-tied businessman.” Jac Holzman’s assistant Steve Harris even remembers Jim Morrison asking what might happen if he were to suddenly “die”… how might it affect business, record sales, the press, and would people believe it? With confidant Mary Francis Werebelow Jim “entertained long conversations about how the Disciples had stolen the body of Christ from the crypt, jokingly calling it the ‘Easter heist,’ etc.”

In a Rolling Stone article for September 17, 1981, author Jerry Hopkins recounts many other Morrison sightings: “The first one I remember was a beaut… He surfaced in San Francisco shortly after Morrison’s death and began cashing checks in Morrison’s name. He was not writing bad checks, mind you; it was his money he was spending. It was just that he was dressed as Jim would in his ‘leather period,’ and that he told everyone that he was indeed the ‘dead singer.’

“The telephone operator asked: ‘will you accept a long distance collect call from Jim Morrison?’ It was an interesting conversation… Our conversations were unsettling. He told me to go to Paris and dig up the corpse, but that you would need permission from ‘twelve Catholic Bishops’ to do it… A visit to his home was more jarring. There at the end of one room was a Morrison ‘shrine,’ converted with posters, flowers, religious icons — the works!”

Years later, I actually got the chance to visit and interview the shrine’s owner, who claimed to be Jim Morrison. He told me matter-of-factly details about Hopkins, as well as that other reporters had actually burglarized the shrine in an attempt to get a scoop. Another surreal sighting involved “Donny” of Baton Rouge, Louisiana. He described Jim Morrison at Morrison’s home in 1978. Donny told his friend “Larry” about it, as Larry was trying to break in to the world of rock and roll: “I remember Larry telling me about the whole wall of one room lined with books all across it. Every one of the books were about Satan, or had something to do with him. He also told me about a large chair that looked like a throne, on which this man sat and watched over his nude children running around… I guess that you can probably guess who that kinky old weird man was — Jim Morrison, The Lizard King!" — Sugarman, pp. 33

Another person named Rhea (the Greek goddess of fertility) claimed she was living with Jim Morrison in 1979 with their son "Jesse Blue James". She matter-of-factly claimed that Morrison had "evolved into a state of pure energy… And can materialize and dematerialize at will." She and Jim were also in direct telepathic communication and in "electromagnetic synch."

The Intelligence Connection and JM2

Rock icon Jim Morrison's father was an admiral in the United States Navy, privy to intelligence and counterintelligence information. His name is Steven Morrison.

During the first few years after Jim Morrison's "death" a number of interesting articles surfaced. These cited references showing various intelligence interests either in Morrison's underground activity; his "death" or that intelligence had even masterminded Morrison's death itself! One of the more explicit appeared in the Scandinavian magazine Dagblatte. This article detailed French intelligence efforts to assassinate Jim Morrison in Paris.

Author Bernard Wolfe writing "The Real Life Death of Jim Morrison" for Esquire (June 1972) related the story of, "Sherry, a Pasadena girl who knew Morrison well: "…I couldn't make sense out of the stories in the papers. Suppose he had a heart attack exactly as they reported, is that what he died of? My God, you might as well say that Ernest Hemingway died of "extensive brain damage". If you want to know the cause of Jim's death — not just the physiology of it — ask what triggered his heart to stop… And whose finger was on the trigger." — Wolfe, pp. 106

In the first few years after Morrison's "death" the owner of B of A Communications, named James Douglas Morrison, claimed to be operating as an intelligence agent for a number of domestic and international groups including the CIA, NSA, Interpol, Swedish Intelligence and others. There are also connections between James Douglas Morrison and various occult groups with probable intelligence connections. [Author's note: from here on the B of A Morrison will be referred to as JM2.]

JM2 also claims to be the "dead" rock star and former singer for The Doors. The new JM2 dropped the old JM1 rock and roll identity to become a "James Bond," wearing the suit and tie that Morrison predicted when he was with The Doors.

This author has in fact seen what appear to be stacks of official-looking documents and letters between the CIA, various government agencies, national news groups like CNN and NBC and JM2, involving what looked like personal meetings, projects and ephemera. Of special interest is that when I viewed parts of the files, all the reports had a paper-thin metallic band affixed to them with colored UPC bar codes. There is no way for me to authenticate the claims of JM2, but everything looked extremely official and very elaborate.

From about 1972 through 1992 JM2 has left a surreal trail of paper and appearances all over the world. These include letters to and from Louisiana Governor Edwin Edwards and CIA Director William Colby, through the Washington, DC law firm of Colby, Miller and Hanes.

A courtroom transcript which I have seen implicates the FBI and CIA in several coverups regarding JM2's intelligence career. These show that there seems to be a systematic destruction of files relating to JM2's spy activities. An enclosed plate also shows JM2's Swedish Intelligence ID card, obtained from the FBI through the Freedom of Information Act. Unfortunately the only copy I have is obscured in the facial area, but the ID numbers are intact. Also in my possession are files concerning JM2's rogue financial activities with the Bank of America, and news reports regarding lawsuits by and against JM2 for bank fraud and espionage, which he claims was done under intelligence auspices as part of financial experiments to destabilize foreign currencies and exchange rates.

There also appear to be hundreds if not thousands of miscellaneous files — both classified and declassified — regarding one James Douglas Morrison, dated after his "death" in 1971. These also refer to "WBC," a nom de plume of JM2. These look like real letters, documents, and court transcripts involving intelligence circles. These involve the CIA, Danish intelligence, and others. There is also an active passport and banking IDs under the name James Douglas Morrison.

Like the "multiple Oswald" theories of Kennedy assassination buffs, there also exist rumors and urban legends describing the "multiple Morrison" theory.

The idea that Jim Morrison was in fact several different people and actors, or intelligence agents has been going on for some time. Besides the "Morrison" singing on the Phantom (now shown to be Iggy Pop) there also exist rumors that a Louisiana banker as well as Richard Tanguay — a close friend of Mick Jagger — perpetuated the hoax. Even High Times ran and old news story about someone claiming to be Jim Morrison (post 1971) running for governor of Louisiana! Supposedly Richard Tanguay (related to vaudeville legend Eva Tanguay) took the Morrison persona on, on several occasions, and even sang with The Doors when they toured Europe with the Rolling Stones. Is this possible?

In fact JM2 has claimed publicly that there have been numerous James Douglas Morrisons, and that they all knew one another and met from time to time to work it all out. The impersonations were part of CIA sociological experiments like Artichoke or MK-ULTRA.

Is this all for real or is this an elaborate hoax? It is not the scope of this work to determine the truth — or lack of truth — or the consequences of such activities. The important thing to note that someone or some group is actively pursuing and setting up a mass "urban legend" regarding James Morrison. Whether this is a hoax or not is not as important as the fact that a lot of official-looking information is being generated surrounding the myth and legend of Jim Morrison, his life and his supposed "death."

The Last Testament of Rev. Jim Jones

Jonestown, Guyana, 18 November 1978

How very much I've tried my best to give you a good life. In spite of all that I've tried, a handful of people, with their lies, have made our lives impossible. There's no way to distract ourselves from what's happened today.

Not only do we have a compound situation … The Betrayal of the Century… Some have stolen children from mothers and are in pursuit now to kill them because they stole their children. I mean we are sitting here waiting on a powder keg and I don't think that is what we want to do with our babies. I don't think that is what we have in mind to do with our babies.

It was said by the greatest of prophets from time immemorial: "No man may take my life from me. I lay my life down…" So just to sit here and wait for the catastrophe that's going to happen to that airplane — it's going to be a catastrophe — it almost happened here, it almost happened, the Congressman was nearly killed here. But you can't steal people's children, you can't take off with people's children without expecting a violent reaction.

If we can't live in peace, then let us die in peace. I've been so betrayed. I've been so terribly betrayed. We've tried, and what he said right this minute was that he said if it was only worth one day it was worthwhile…

What's going to happen in a few minutes is that one of the people on that plane is gonna, is gonna shoot the pilot. I know that. I didn't plan it but I know it's gonna happen. They`re gonna shoot that pilot and down comes that plane into the jungle and we had better not have any of our children left when it's over cause … I never lied to you. I never have lied to you. I know that's what's going to happen. That's what he intends to do and he will do it. He'll do it.

I’ve been loaded with many pressures seeing all these people behave so treasonous. It was just too much for me to put together but I now know what he was telling me and it’ll happen … if the plane gets in the air, that is. So my opinion is that you be kind to children and you be kind to seniors and take the potion like we used to take in an ocean breeze and step over quietly because we are not committing suicide — It’s a revolutionary act. We can’t go back, we won’t … we’re not going back to tell more lies which means more Congressmen, there’s no way, there’s no way we can survive….

The people in San Francisco will not be idle over this. We do not take our death in vain you know. Is it too late for Russia? Here`s why it’s too late for Russia. They killed, they started to kill. That’s why it makes it too late for Russia. I can’t control these people. They’re out there. They’ve gone with the guns and it’s too late. And once they’ve killed anybody, at least that’s the way I want it. I just put my lot with you. If one of my people do something, it’s me. When they say I don’t have to take the blame for this, well I don’t, I don’t live that way and if they deliver up sin and try to get the man that’s … it… mothers … lying on him and lying on and trying to break up this family and they’ve all agreed to kill us by whatever means necessary. Do you think I’m going to let them? … Not on your life. No, you’re not going, you’re not going. You’re not going. I can’t live that way. I cannot live that way. We lived for all and I’ll die for all…

To me death is not a fearful thing, it’s living that’s fearful.

I have never never never seen anything like this before in my life. I have never seen people take law and provoke us and try to purposely agitate mothers of children. It is only … it’s not, it’s not worth living like this, worth living like this.

There is one man there who blames, who blames Michael Stone for the murder of his mother, and he will stop that plane by any means necessary. He’ll do it. That plane will come out of the air. There’s no way you can fly a plane without a pilot…

I haven’t seen anybody yet that didn’t die, and I like to choose my own kind of death. I’m tired of being … to hell, that’s what I’m tired of. Tired of it. So many people’s lives in my hands and I certainly don’t want your life in my hands. I’ve been telling you to this day, without me life has no meaning.

I’m the best friend you’ll ever have.

I have to pay. I’m standing with you people — you’re part of me. I can detach myself … no no no no no, I never detach myself from any of your troubles. I’ve always taken your troubles right on my shoulders … I’m not going to change that now. It’s too late. I’ve been running too long. I’m not gonna change now.

The next time, you’ll get to go to Russia. The next time round. What I’m talking about now is the dispensation of judgement, this is a revolutionary suicide council. I’m not talking about self-destruction. I’m talking about what… we have no other road. I will take your call. I will put it to the Russians, and I can tell you the answer now because I’m a prophet. Call the Russians and tell them… see if they’ll take us.

I practically died every day to give you peace. And you’ve still not had any peace. You look better than I’ve seen you in a long while, but it’s still not the kind of peace that I wanted to give you. A person’s a fool who continues to say that you’re winning when you’re losing. Win one, lose two, what?…

He’s taking off, the plane is taking off… Suicide: many have done it … Stone has done it. If somebody oughta listen … somebody … can talk … can they not talk to San Francisco see that Stone is not … He has done the thing he wanted to do. To have us destroyed.

We win. We win when we go down, they don’t have nobody else to hate. They’ve got nobody else to hate. Many will destroy themselves. I’m speaking here not as the administrator but as a prophet today. I wouldn’t talk so serious if I didn’t know what I was talking about.

By now the damage will be done. But I cannot separate myself from the pain of my people. We can't separate myself, if you think about it, we've walked together too long.

I saved them, I saved them, but I made my example. I made my expression. I made my manifestation and the world was ready … not ready for me. Paul says I was a man born out of due season. I've been born out of due season just like we all are and the best testimony we can make is to leave this goddamn world.

Everybody hold it, hold it, hold it, lay down your burden and I'll lay down my burden down by the riverside, shall we lay 'em down here inside of Guyana, what's the difference?

No man didn't take our lives right now; he hasn't taken them, but when they start shooting them out of the air, they'll shoot some of our innocent babies. I'm not lying … They've got to shoot me to get through to some of these people. I'm not letting them take your child. Would you let them take your child?

For months I've tried to keep this thing from happening, but I now see that it's the will of the Sovereign Being that this happened to us. And we lay down our lives in protest at what's been done. And we lay down our lives in protest at what's been done. The criminality of people, the cruelty of people who walked out of here today. You know those people who walked out, most of those white people. Most of those white people walked. I'm so grateful for the ones that didn't, those who knew who they are.

There's no point, there's no point to this … we are born before our time. Take ease, take ease, take ease, take ease … Sit down, sit down, sit down. I tried so very very hard … They're trying over here to see what's in it … what's gonna happen … who is it? It's all over, it's all over….

What a legacy, what a legacy. Well, the Red Brigade's the only one that made any sense anyway. They invaded our privacy, they invaded our home, they followed us six thousand miles away. The Red Brigade showed them justice — the Congressman's dead.

It’s simple — there’s no convulsion with it. It’s just simple. Please get it before it’s too late. The GDF will be here I tell you. Get moving, get moving, don’t be afraid to die. If these people land out here they’ll torture our children, they’ll torture some of our people here, torture our seniors. We cannot have this.

Are you going to separate yourself from whoever shot the Congressman? I don’t know who shot him. They speak of peace, they gotta right to know how many are dead … Oh, God, almighty God.

I don’t know how in the world they’re ever gonna write about us. It’s too late, it’s too late. The Congressman is dead … Many of our traitors are dead … They’re all laying out there dead….

Will you please hasten, will you hasten with that medication. You don’t know what you’ve done… I’ve tried … It’s hard, it’s hard only at first is it hard. It’s hard only at first. Living … when you’re looking at death … living is much more difficult. Rising up every morning and not knowing what’s going to be … it’s much more difficult. It’s much more difficult.

Please for God sake let’s get on with it. We’ve lived as no other people have lived and loved. We’ve had as much of this world as you’re gonna get. Let’s just be done with it, let’s be done with the agony of it. It’s far, far harder to have to watch you every day die slowly, and from the time you’re a child to the time you get grey, you are dying.

This is a revolutionary suicide. This is not a self-destructive suicide. Who wants to go with their child has a right to go with their child. I think it’s humane.

I want to go — I want to see you go through. They can take me, and they can do whatever they want to do. I want to see you go. I don’t wanna see you go through this hell no more. No more, no more, no more … The best thing you can do is relax and you will have no problem. You will have no problem with the thing if you just relax.

It’s not to be feared. It is not to be feared. It’s a friend. And you’re sitting there showing your love for one another. Gone, let’s get gone, let’s get gone.

Who are these? We have nothing we can do. We can't, we can't separate ourselves from our own people. For twenty years laying in some rotten old nursing home….

We've tried to find a new beginning but it's too late. You can't separate yourself from your brother and your sister. No way I'm gonna do it. I refuse. I don't know who killed the Congressman, but as far as I'm concerned I killed him. You understand what I'm saying? I killed him. He had no business coming. I told him not to come.

Die with respect. Die with a degree of dignity. Lay down your life with dignity, don't lay down with tears and agony. There's nothing to death. It's like Mac said, it's like stepping over into another plane. Stop this hysterics. This is not the way for people who are Socialists or Communists to die. No way for us to die.

We must die with some dignity. We must die with some dignity.

Before we had no choice, now we have some choice. And you think they're going to allow this to be done, and allow us to get by with this? You must be insane. It's only — it's something to put you to rest. Oh God. Mother, mother, mother, please. Mother please, please, please don't, don't do this, don't do this. Put down your life with this child but don't do this.

Free at last. Keep your emotions down, keep your emotions down.

It's never been done before you say. It's been done by every tribe in history. Every tribe facing annihilation. All the Indians of the Amazon are doing right now. They refuse to bring any babies into the world. They kill every child that comes into the world because they don't want to live in this kind of a world.

Be patient, be patient. Death is …

I tell you I don't care how many screams you hear. I don't care how many anguished cries. Death is a million times preferable to ten more days of this life. If you knew what was ahead of you, if you knew what was ahead of you, you'd be glad to be stepping over tonight.

Death, death, death is common to people.

If you ask the Samoans, they take death in their stride. Just be dignified.

Adults, adults, adults, I call on you to stop this nonsense. I call on you to quit exciting your children when all they're doing is going to quiet rest. I call on you to stop this now if you have any respect at all. Are we black, proud and Socialist, or what are we?

No, no sorrow that it's all over. I'm glad it's over. Hurry, hurry my children, hurry. Let us not fall into the hands of the enemy. Hurry my children, hurry. There are seniors out here I'm concerned about, hurry. I don't want to leave my seniors to this mess. Now quickly, quickly, quickly, quickly.

No more pain, Al. No more pain, I said, Al. No more pain, Jim Cobb, laying on the airfield dead at this moment. Remember the moment … all of the moments that he … these are the people, the peddlers of hate, we're not letting them take our life, we're laying down our life.

We're sick of their lies, we just want peace.

All it is is taking a drink to take … to go to sleep.

That's what death is, sleep. Whatever, I'm tired of it all.

We'll set an example for others … one thousand people who've said we don't like the way the world is.

The Black Hole of Guyana

The Untold Story of the Jonestown Massacre

John Judge

Somewhere in the concrete canyons of New York City, a rock group is using the name “Jim Jones and the Suicides.” Irreverent and disarming, the name reflects the trend in punk rock to take social issues head on. Cynicism about the Jonestown deaths, the social parallels abound in the lyrics of today’s music. The messages are clear because we all know the story.

In fact, people today recognize the name “Jonestown” more than any other event, a full 98% of the population.[1] The television and printed media were filled with the news for more than a year, even though the tale read like something from the National Enquirer. But despite all of the coverage, the reality of Jonestown and the reasons behind the bizarre events remain a mystery. The details have faded from memory for most of us since November 18, 1978, but not the outlines. Think back a moment and you’ll remember.

You Know the Official Version

A fanatic religious leader in California led a multi-racial community into the jungles of remote Guyana to establish a socialist Utopia. The People’s Temple, his church, was in the heart of San Francisco and drew poor people, social activists, Blacks and Hispanics, young and old. The message was racial harmony and justice, and criticism of the hypocrisy of the world around his followers.[2]

The Temple rose in a vacuum of leadership at the end of an era. The political confrontations of the 60s were almost over, and religious cults and "personal transformation" were on the rise. Those who had preached a similar message on the political soap box were gone, burnt out, discredited, or dead. The counter-culture had apparently degenerated into drugs and violence. Charlie Manson was the only visible image of the period. Suddenly, religion seemed to offer a last hope.[3]

Even before they left for the Jonestown site, the People's Temple members were subjects of local scandal in the news.[4] Jim Jones claimed these exposés were attacks on their newly-found religion, and used them as an excuse to move most of the members to Guyana.[5] But disturbing reports continued to surround Jones, and soon came to the attention of Congressional members like Leo Ryan. Stories of beatings, kidnapping, sexual abuse and mysterious deaths leaked out in the press.[6] Ryan decided to go to Guyana and investigate the situation for himself. The nightmare began.[7]

Isolated on the tiny airstrip at Port Kaituma, Ryan and several reporters in his group were murdered. Then came the almost unbelievable "White Night," a mass suicide pact of the Jonestown camp. A community made up mostly of Blacks and women drank cyanide from paper cups of Kool-Aid, adults and children alike died and fell around the main pavilion, Jones himself was shot in the head, an apparent suicide. For days, the body count mounted, from 400 to nearly 1,000. The bodies were flown to the United States and later cremated or buried in mass graves.[8]

Temple member Larry Layton faced charges of conspiracy in Ryan's murder. Ryan was awarded a posthumous Medal of Honor, and was the first Congress member to die in the line of duty.[9]

Pete Hamill called the corpses "all the loose change of the sixties."[10] The effect was electric. Any alternative to the current system was seen as futile, if not deadly. Protest only led to police riots and political assassination. Alternative lifestyles and drugs led to "creepy-crawly communes and violent murders.[11] And religious experiments led to cults and suicide. Social Utopias were dreams that turned into nightmares. The television urged us to go back to the “Happy Days” of the apolitical 50s. The message was, get a job, and go back to church.[12] The nuclear threat generated only nihilism and hopelessness. There was no answer but death, no exit from the grisly future. The new ethic was personal success, aerobics, material consumption, a return to “American values,” and the “moral majority,” white Christian world. The official message was very clear.

But Just Suppose It Didn’t Happen That Way…

The headlines the day of the massacre read: “Cult Dies in South American Jungle: 400 Die in Mass Suicide, 700 Flee into Jungle.”[13] By all accounts in the press, as well as People’s Temple statements, there were at least 1,100 people at Jonestown.[14] There were 809 adult passports found there, and reports of 300 children (276 found among the dead, and 210 never identified). The headline figures from the first day add to the same number: 1,100.[15] The original body count done by the Guyanese, which was the final count, was given almost a week later by American military authorities as 913.[16,17] A total of 167 survivors were reported to have returned to the U.S.[18] Where were the others?

At their first press conference, the Americans claimed that the Guyanese “could not count.” These local people had carried out the gruesome job of counting the bodies, and later assisted American troops in the process of poking holes in the flesh lest they explode from the gasses of decay.[19] Then the Americans proposed another theory — they had missed seeing a pile of bodies at the back of the pavilion. The structure was the size of a small house, and they had been at the scene for days. Finally, we were given the official reason for the discrepancy — bodies had fallen on top of other bodies, adults covering children.[20]

It was simple, if morbid, arithmetic that led to the first suspicions. The 408 bodies discovered at first count would have to be able to cover 505 bodies for a total of 913. In addition, those who first worked on the bodies would have been unlikely to miss bodies lying beneath each other, since each body had to be punctured. Eighty-two of the bodies first found were those of children, reducing the number that could have been hidden below others.[21] A search of nearly 150 photographs, aerial and close-up, fails to show even one body lying under another, much less 500.[22]

It seemed the first reports were true, 400 had died, and 700 had fled to the jungle. The American authorities claimed to have searched for people who had escaped, but found no evidence of any in the surrounding area.[23] At least a hundred Guyanese troops were among the first to arrive, and they were ordered to search the jungle for survivors.[24] In the area, at the same time, British Black Watch troops were on "training exercises," with nearly 600 of their best-trained commandos. Soon, American Green Berets were on site as well.[25] The presence of these soldiers, specially trained in covert killing operations, may explain the increasing numbers of bodies that appeared.

Most of the photographs show the bodies in neat rows, face down. There are few exceptions. Close shots indicate drag marks, as though the bodies were positioned by someone after death.[26] Is it possible that the 700 who fled were rounded up by these troops, brought back to Jonestown and added to the body count?[27]

If so, the bodies would indicate the cause of death. A new word was coined by the media, "suicide-murder." But which was it?[28] Autopsies and forensic science are a developing art. The detectives of death use a variety of scientific methods and clues to determine how people die, when they expire, and the specific cause of death. Dr. Mootoo, the top Guyanese pathologist, was at Jonestown within hours after the massacre. Refusing the assistance of U.S. pathologists, he accompanied the teams that counted the dead, examined the bodies, and worked to identify the deceased. While the American press screamed about the "Kool-Aid Suicides," Dr. Mootoo was reaching a much different opinion.[29]

There are certain signs that show the types of poisons that lead to the end of life. Cyanide blocks the messages from the brain to the muscles by changing body chemistry in the central nervous system. Even the "involuntary" functions like breathing and heartbeat get mixed neural signals. It is a painful death, breath coming in spurts. The other muscles spasm, limbs twist and contort. The facial muscles draw back into a deadly grin, called “cyanide rictus.”[30] All these telling signs were absent in the Jonestown dead. Limbs were limp and relaxed, and the few visible faces showed no sign of distortion.[31]

Instead, Dr. Mootoo found fresh needle marks at the back of the left shoulder blades of 80-90% of the victims. Others had been shot or strangled. One survivor reported that those who resisted were forced by armed guards.[33] The gun that reportedly shot Jim Jones was lying nearly 200 feet from his body, not a likely suicide weapon.[34] As Chief Medical Examiner, Mootoo’s testimony to the Guyanese grand jury investigating Jonestown led to their conclusion that all but three of the people were murdered by “persons unknown.” Only two had committed suicide, they said.[35] Several pictures show the gunshot wounds on the bodies as well.[36] The U.S. Army spokesman, Lt. Col. Schuier, said, “No autopsies are needed. The cause of death is not an issue here.” The forensic doctors who later did autopsies at Dover, Delaware, were never made aware of Dr. Mootoo’s findings.[37]

There are other indications that the Guyanese government participated with American authorities in a cover-up of the real story, despite their own findings. One good example was Guyanese Police Chief Lloyd Barker, who interfered with investigations, helped “recover” $2.5 million for the Guyanese government, and was often the first to officially announce the cover stories relating to suicide, body counts and survivors.[38] Among the first to the scene were the wife of Guyanese Prime Minister Forbes Burnham and his Deputy Prime Minister, Ptolemy Reid. They returned from the massacre site with nearly $1 million in cash, gold and jewelry taken from the buildings and from the dead. Inexplicably, one of Burnham’s political party secretaries had visited the site of the massacre only hours before it occurred.[39] When Shirley Field Ridley, Guyanese Minister of Information, announced the change in the body count to the shocked Guyanese Parliament, she refused to answer further questions. Other representatives began to point a finger of shame at Ridley and the Burnham government, and the local press dubbed the scandal “Templegate,” all accused them of taking a ghoulish payoff.[40]

Perhaps more significantly, the Americans brought in 16 huge C-131 cargo planes, but claimed they could only carry 36 caskets in each one. These aircraft can carry tanks, trucks, troops and ammunition all in one load.[41] At the scene, bodies were stripped of identification, including the medical wrist tags visible in many early photos.[42] Dust-off operations during Vietnam clearly demonstrated that the military is capable of moving hundreds of bodies in a short period.[43] Instead, they took nearly a week to bring back the Jonestown dead, bringing in the majority at the end of the period.[44] The corpses, rotting in the heat, made autopsy impossible.[45] At one point, the remains of 183 people arrived in 82 caskets. Although the Guyanese had identified 174 bodies at the site, only 17 were tentatively identified at the massive military mortuary in Dover, Delaware.[46]

Isolated there, hundreds of miles from their families who might have visited the bodies at a similar mortuary in Oakland that was used during Vietnam, many of the dead were eventually cremated.[47] Press was excluded, and even family members had difficulty getting access to the remains.[48] Officials in New Jersey began to complain that state coroners were excluded, and that the military coroners appointed were illegally performing cremations.[49] One of the top forensic body identification experts, who later was brought in to work on the Iranian raid casualties, was denied repeated requests to assist.[50] In December, the President of the National Association of Medical Examiners complained in an open letter to the U.S. military that they "badly botched" procedures, and that a simple fluid autopsy was never performed at the point of discovery. Decomposition, embalming and cremation made further forensic work impossible.[51] The unorthodox method of identification attempted to remove the skin from the fingertip and slip it over a gloved finger, would not have stood up in court.[52] The long delay made it impossible to reconstruct the event. As noted, these military doctors were unaware of Dr. Mootoo's conclusions. Several civilian pathology experts said they "shuddered at the ineptness" of the military, and that their autopsy method was "doing it backwards." But in official statements, the U.S. attempted to discredit the Guyanese grand jury findings, saying they had uncovered "few facts."[53]

Guyanese troops, and police who arrived with American Embassy official Richard Dwyer, also failed to defend Congressman Leo Ryan and others who came to Guyana with him when they were shot down in cold blood at the Port Kaituma airstrip, even though the troops were nearby with machine guns at the ready.[54] Although Temple member Larry Layton has been charged with the murders of Congressman Ryan, Temple defector Patricia Parks and press reporters Greg Robinson, Don Harris and Bob Brown, he was not in a position to shoot them.[55] Blocked from boarding Ryan's twin engine Otter, he had entered another plane nearby. Once inside, he pulled out a gun and wounded two Temple followers before being disarmed.[56] The others were clearly killed by armed men who descended from a tractor-trailer at the scene, after opening fire. Witnesses described them as "zombies," walking mechanically, without emotion, and "looking through you, not at you," as they murdered.[57] Only certain people were killed, and the selection was clearly planned. Certain wounded people, like Ryan's aide Jackie Speiers, were not harmed further, but the killers made sure that Ryan and the newsmen were dead. In some cases they shot people, already wounded, directly in the head.[58] These gunmen were never finally identified and may have been under Layton's command. They may not have been among the Jonestown dead.[59]

At the Jonestown site, survivors described a special group of Jones' followers who were allowed to carry weapons and money, and to come and go from the camp. These people were all white, mostly males.[60] They ate better and worked less than the others, and they served as an armed guard to enforce discipline, control labor and restrict movement.[61] Among them were Jones' top lieutenants, including George Philip Blakey. Blakey and others regularly visited Georgetown, Guyana and made trips in their sea-going boat, the Cudjoe. He was privileged to be aboard the boat when the murders occurred.[62] This special armed guard survived the massacre. Many were trained and programmed killers, like the "zombies" who attacked Ryan. Some were used as mercenaries in Africa, and elsewhere.[63] The dead were 90% women, and 80% Blacks.[64] It is unlikely that men armed with guns and modern crossbows would give up control and willingly be injected with poisons. It is much more likely that they forced nearly 400 people to die by injection, and then assisted in the murder of 500 more who attempted to escape. One survivor clearly heard people cheering 45 minutes after the massacre. Despite government claims, they are not accounted for, nor is their location known.[65]

Back in California, People's Temple members openly admitted that they feared they were targeted by a "hit squad," and the Temple was surrounded for some time by local police forces.[66] During that period, two members of the elite guard from Jonestown returned and were allowed into the Temple by police.[67] The survivors who rode to Port Kaituma with Leo Ryan complained when Larry Layton boarded the truck, "He's not one of us."[68] Rumors also persisted that a "death list" of U.S. officials existed, and some survivors verified in testimony to the San Francisco grand jury.[69] A congressional aide was quoted in the AP wires on May 19, 1979, "There are 120 white, brainwashed assassins out from Jonestown awaiting the trigger word to pick up their hit."[70]

Other survivors included Mark Lane and Charles Garry, lawyers for People's Temple, who managed to escape the massacre somehow.[71] In addition to the 16 who officially returned with the Ryan party, others managed to reach Georgetown and come back home.[72] However, there have been continuing suspicious murders of those people here. Jeannie and Al Mills, who intended to write a book about Jones, were murdered at home, bound and shot.[73] Some evidence indicates a connection between the Jonestown operation and the murders of Mayor Moscone and Harvey Milk by police agent Dan White.[74] Another Jonestown survivor was shot near his home in Detroit by unidentified killers.[75] Yet another was involved in a mass murder of school children in Los Angeles.[76] Anyone who survived such massive slaughter must be somewhat suspect. The fact that the press never even spoke to nearly 200 survivors raises serious doubts.

Who Was Jim Jones?

In order to understand the strange events surrounding Jonestown, we must begin with a history of the people involved. The official story of a religious fanatic and his idealist followers doesn't make sense in light of the evidence of murders, armed killers and autopsy cover-ups. If it happened the way we were told, there should be no reason to try to hide the facts from the public, and full investigation into the deaths at Jonestown, and the murder of Leo Ryan would have been welcomed. What did happen is something else again.

Jim Jones grew up in Lynn, in southern Indiana. His father was an active member of the local Ku Klux Klan that infest that area.[77] His friends found him a little strange, and he was interested in preaching the Bible and religious rituals.[78] Perhaps more important was his boyhood friendship with Dan Mitrione, confirmed by local residents.[79] In the early 50s, Jones set out to be a religious minister, and was ordained at one point by a Christian denomination in Indianapolis.[80] It was during this period that he met and married his lifelong mate, Marceline.[81] He also had a small business selling monkeys, purchased from the research department at Indiana State University at Bloomington.[82]

A Bible-thumper and faith healer, Jones put on revivalist tent shows in the area, and worked close to Richmond, Indiana. Mitrione, his friend, worked as chief of police there, and kept him from being arrested or run out of town.[83] According to those close to him, he used wet chicken livers as evidence of "cancers" he was removing by "divine powers."[84] His landlady called him "a gangster who used a Bible instead of a gun."[85] His church followers included Charles Beikman, a Green Beret who was to stay with him to the end.[86] Beikman was later charged with the murders of several Temple members in Georgetown, following the massacre.[87]

Dan Mitrione, Jones' friend, moved on to the CIA-financed International Police Academy, where police were trained in counter-insurgency and torture techniques from around the world.[88] Jones, a poor, itinerant preacher, suddenly had money in 1961 for a trip to "minister" in Brazil, and he took his family with him.[89] By this time, he had "adopted" Beikman, and eight children, both Black and White.[90] His neighbors in Brazil distrusted him. He told them he worked with U.S. Navy Intelligence. His transportation and groceries were being provided by the U.S. Embassy, as was the large house he lived in.[91] His son, Stephan, commented that he made regular trips to Belo Horizonte, site of the CIA headquarters in Brazil.[92] An American police advisor, working closely with the CIA at that point, Dan Mitrione was there as well.[93] Mitrione had risen in the ranks quickly, and was busy training foreign police in torture and assassination methods. He was later kidnapped by Tupermaro guerrillas in Uruguay, interrogated and murdered.[94] Costa Gavras made a film about his death titled State of Siege.[95] Jones returned to the United States in 1963, with $10,000 in his pocket.[96] Recent articles indicate that Catholic clergy are complaining about CIA funding of other denominations for "ministry" in Brazil; perhaps Jones was an early example.[97]

With his new wealth, Jones was able to travel to California and establish the first People's Temple in Ukiah, California, in 1965. Guarded by dogs, electric fences and guard towers, he set up Happy Havens Rest Home.[98] Despite a lack of trained personnel, or proper licensing, Jones drew in many people at the camp. He had elderly, prisoners, people from psychiatric institutions, and 150 foster children, often transferred to care at Happy

Havens by court orders.[99] He was contacted there by Christian missionaries from World Vision, an international evangelical order that had done espionage for the CIA in Southeast Asia.[100] He met “influential” members of the community and was befriended by Walter Heady, the head of the local chapter of the John Birch Society.[101] He used the members of this “church” to organize local voting drives for Richard Nixon’s election, and worked closely with the Republican Party.[102] He was even appointed chairman of the county grand jury.[103]

“The Messiah from Ukiah,” as he was known then, met and recruited Timothy Stoen, a Stanford graduate and member of the city DA’s office, and his wife Grace.[104] During this time, the Layton family, Terri Buford and George Phillip Blakey, and other important members joined the Temple.[105] The camp “doctor,” Larry Schacht, claims Jones got him off drugs and into medical school during this period.[106] These were not just street urchins. Buford’s father was a Commander for the fleet at the Philadelphia Navy Base for years.[107] The Laytons were a well-heeled, aristocratic family. Dr. Layton donated at least a quarter-million dollars to Jones. His wife, son and daughter were all members of the Temple.[108] George Blakey, who married Debbie Layton, was from a wealthy British family. He donated $60,000 to pay the lease on the 27,000-acre Guyana site in 1974.[109] Lisa Philips Layton had come to the U.S. from a rich Hamburg banking family in Germany.[110] Most of the top lieutenants around Jones were from wealthy, educated backgrounds, many with connections to the military or intelligence agencies. These were the people who would set up the bank accounts, complex legal actions, and financial records that put people under the Temple’s control.[111]

Stoen was able to set up important contacts for Jones as Assistant DA in San Francisco.[112] Jones changed his image to that of a liberal.[113] He had spent time studying the preaching methods of Father Divine in Philadelphia, and attempted to use them in a manipulative way on the streets of San Francisco. Father Divine ran a religious and charitable operation among Philadelphia’s poor Black community.[114] Jones was able to use his followers in an election once again, this time for Mayor Moscone. Moscone responded in 1976, putting Jones in charge of the city Housing

Commission.[115] In addition, many of his key followers got jobs with the city Welfare Department and much of the recruitment to the Temple in San Francisco came from the ranks of these unemployed and dispossessed people.[116] Jones was introduced to many influential liberal and radical people there, and entertained or greeted people ranging from Rosalynn Carter to Angela Davis.[117]

The period when Jones began the Temple there marked the end of an important political decade. Nixon's election had ushered in a domestic intelligence dead set against the movements for peace, civil rights and social justice. Names like COINTELPRO, CHAOS, and Operation garden plot, or the Houston Plan made the news following in the wake of Watergate revelations.[118] Senator Ervin called the White House plans against dissent "fascistic."[119] These operations involved the highest levels of military and civilian intelligence and all levels of police agencies in a full-scale attempt to discredit, disrupt and destroy the movements that sprang up in the 1960s. There are indications that these plans, or the mood they created, led to the assassinations of Martin Luther King and Malcolm X, as unacceptable "Black Messiahs."[120]

One of the architects under then-Governor Reagan in California was now-Attorney General Edwin Meese. He coordinated "Operation Garden Plot" for military intelligence and all police operations and intelligence in a period that was plagued with violations of civil and constitutional rights.[121] Perhaps you recall the police attacks on People's Park, the murder of many Black Panthers and activists, the infiltration of the Free Speech Movement and anti-war activity, and the experimentation on prisoners at Vacaville, or the shooting of George Jackson.[122] Meese later bragged that this activity had damaged or destroyed the people he called "revolutionaries."[123] It was into this situation Jones came to usurp leadership.[124]

After his arrival in Ukiah, his methods were visible to those who took the time to investigate.[125] His armed guards wore black uniforms and leather jackboots. His approach was one of deception, and if that wore off, then manipulation and threats. Loyalty to his church included signing blank sheets of paper, later filled in with "confessions" and used for blackmail purposes, or to extort funds.[126] Yet the vast membership he was extorting often owned little, and he tried to milk them for everything, from personal funds to land deeds.[127] Illegal activities were regularly reported during this period, but either not investigated or unresolved. He clearly had the cooperation of local police. Years later, evidence would come out of charges of sexual solicitation, mysteriously dropped.[128]

Those who sought to leave were prevented and rebuked. Local journalist Kathy Hunter wrote in the Ukiah press about “seven Mysterious Deaths” of the Temple members who had argued with Jones and attempted to leave. One of these was Maxine Swaney.[129] Jones openly hinted to other members that he had arranged for them to die, threatening a similar fate to others who would be disloyal.[130] Kathy Hunter later tried to visit Jonestown, only to be forcibly drugged by Temple guards, and deported to Georgetown.[131] She later charged that Mark Lane approached her, falsely identifying himself as a reporter for Esquire, rather than as an attorney for Jim Jones. He led her to believe he was seeking information on Jones for an exposé in the magazine, and asked to see her evidence.

The pattern was to continue in San Francisco. In addition, Jones required that members practice for the mysterious “White Night,” a mass suicide ritual that would protect them from murder at the hands of their enemies.[132] Although the new Temple had no guards or fences to restrict members, few had other places to live, and many had given over all they owned to Jones. They felt trapped inside this community that preached love, but practiced hatred.[133]

Following press exposure, and a critical article in New West magazine, Jones became very agitated, and the number of suicide drills increased.[134] Complaints about mistreatment by current and ex-members began to appear in the media and reach the ears of congressional representatives. Sam Houston, an old friend of Leo Ryan, came to him with questions about the untimely death of his son following his departure from the Temple.[135] Later, Timothy and Grace Stoen would complain to Ryan about custody of their young son, who was living with Jones, and urge him to visit the commune.[136] Against advice of friends and staff members, Ryan decided to take a team of journalists to Guyana and seek the truth of the situation.[137] Some felt that Ryan's journey there was planned and expected, and used as a convenient excuse to set up his murder. Others feel that this unexpected violation of secrecy around Jonestown set off the spark that led to the mass murder. In either case, it marked the beginning of the end for Ryan and Jones.[138]

At one point, to show his powers, Jones arranged to be shot in the heart in front of the congregation. Dragged to a back room, apparently wounded and bleeding, he returned a moment later alive and well. While this may have been more of his stage antics to prompt believers' faith, it may also have marked the end of Jim Jones.[139] For undisclosed reason, Jones had used "doubles."[140] This is very unusual for a religious leader, but quite common in intelligence operations.[141]

Even the death and identification of Jim Jones were peculiar. He was apparently shot by another person at the camp.[142] Photos of his body do not show identifying tattoos on his chest. The body and face are not clearly recognizable due to bloating and discoloration.[143] The FBI reportedly checked his fingerprints twice, a seemingly futile gesture since it is a precise operation. A more logical route would have been to check dental records.[144] Several researchers familiar with the case feel that the body may not have been Jones. Even if the person at the site was one of the "doubles," it does not mean Jones is still alive. He may have been killed at an earlier point.

What Was Jonestown?

According to one story, Jones was seeking a place on earth that would survive the effects of nuclear war, relying only on an article in Esquire magazine for his list.[145] The real reason for his locations in Brazil, California, Guyana and elsewhere deserve more scrutiny.[146] At one point Jones wanted to set up in Grenada, and he invited then-Prime Minister Sir Eric Gairy to visit the Temple in San Francisco.[147] He invested $200,000 in the Grenada National Bank in 1977 to pave the way, and some $76,000 was still there after the massacre.[148]

His final choice, the Matthew's Bridge section in Guyana, is an interesting one. It was originally the site of a Union Carbide bauxite and manganese mine, and Jones used the dock they left behind.[149] At an earlier point, it had been one of seven possible sites chosen for the relocation of the Jews after World War II.[150] Plans to inhabit the jungles of Guyana's interior with cheap labor date back to 1919.[151] Resources buried there are among the richest in the world, and include manganese, diamonds, gold, bauxite and uranium.[152] Forbes Burnham, the Prime Minister, had participated in a scheme to repatriate Blacks from the UK to work in the area. Like all earlier attempts, it failed.[153]

Once chosen, the site was leased and worked on by a select crew of Temple members in preparation for the arrival of the body of the church. The work was done in cooperation with Burnham and the U.S. Embassy there.[154] But if these were idealists seeking a better life, their arrival in "Utopia" was a strange welcome. Piled into busses in San Francisco, they had driven to Florida. From there, Pan American charter planes delivered them to Guyana.[155] When they arrived at the airport, the Blacks were taken off the plane, bound and gagged.[156] The deception had finally been stripped bare of all pretense. The Blacks were so isolated and controlled that neighbors as close as five miles from the site did not know that Blacks lived at Jonestown. The only public representatives seen in Guyana were White.[157]

According to survivors' reports, they entered a virtual slave labor camp. Worked for 16 to 18 hours daily, they were forced to live in cramped quarters on minimum rations, usually rice, bread and sometimes rancid meat.[158] Kept on a schedule of physical and mental exhaustion, they were also forced to stay awake at night and listen to lectures by Jones. Threats and abuse became more common.[159] The camp medical staff under Dr. Lawrence Schacht was known to perform painful suturing without anesthetic. They administered drugs, and kept daily medical records.[160] Infractions of the rules or disloyalty led to increasingly harsh punishments, including forced drugging, sensory isolation in an underground box, physical torture and public sexual rape and humiliation. Beatings and verbal abuse were commonplace. Only the special guards were treated humanely and fed decently.[161] People with serious injuries were flown out, but few ever returned.[162] Perhaps the motto at Jonestown should have been the same as the one at Auschwitz, developed by Larry Schacht's namesake, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, the Nazi minister of economics, "Arbeit Macht Frei," or "Work Will Make You Free." Guyana even considered setting up an "Auschwitz-like museum" at the site, but abandoned the idea.[163]

By this point, Jones had amassed incredible wealth. Press estimates ranged from $26 million to $2 billion, including bank accounts, foreign investments and real estate. Accounts were set up worldwide by key members often in the personal name of certain people in the Temple.[164] Much of this money, listed publicly after the massacre, disappeared mysteriously. It was a fortune far too large to have come from membership alone. The receivership set up by the government settled on a total of $10 million. Of special interest were the Swiss bank accounts opened in Panama, the money taken from the camp, and the extensive investments in Barclay's Bank.[165] Other sources of income included the German banking family of Lisa Philips Layton, Larry's mother.[166] Also, close to $54,000 a month income was claimed to come from welfare and social security checks for 199 members, sent to the Temple followers and signed over to Jones.[167] In addition, there are indications that Blakey and other members were supplementing the Temple funds with international smuggling of guns and drugs.[168] At one point, Charles Garry noted that Jones and his community were "literally sitting on a gold mine." Mineral distribution maps of Guyana suggest he was right.[169]

To comprehend this well-financed, sinister operation, we must abandon the myth that this was a religious commune and study instead the history that led to its formation. Jonestown was an experiment, part of a 30-year program called MK-ULTRA, the CIA and military intelligence code name for mind control.[170] A close study of Senator's Ervin's 1974 report, "Individual Rights and the Government's Role in Behavior Modification," shows that these agencies had certain "target populations" in mind, for both individual and mass control. Blacks, women, prisoners and elderly, the young, and inmates of psychiatric wards were selected as “potentially violent.”[171] There were plans in California at the time for a Center for the Study and Reduction of Violence, expanding on the horrific work of Dr. Jose Delgado, Drs. Mark and Ervin, and Dr. Jolly West, experts in implantation, psychosurgery, and tranquilizers. The guinea pigs were to be drawn from the ranks of the “target populations,” and taken to an isolated military missile base in California.[172] In that same period, Jones began to move his Temple members to Jonestown. They were the exact population selected for such tests.[173]

The meticulous daily notes and drug records kept by Larry Schacht disappeared, but evidence did not.[174] The history of MK-ULTRA and its sister programs (MK-DELTA, ARTICHOKE, BLUEBIRD, etc.) records a combination of drugs, drug mixtures, electroshock and torture as methods for control. The desired results ranged from temporary and permanent amnesia, uninhibited confessions, and creation of second personalities, to programmed assassins and preconditioned suicidal urges. One goal was the ability to control mass populations, especially for cheap labor.[175] Dr. Delgado told Congress that he hoped for a future where a technology would control workers in the field and troops at war with electronic remote signals. He found it hard to understand why people would complain about electrodes implanted in their brains to make them “both happy and productive.”[176]

On the scene at Jonestown, Guyanese troops discovered a large cache of drugs; enough to drug the entire population of Georgetown, Guyana (well over 200,000) for more than a year.[177] According to survivors, these were being used regularly “to control” a population of only 1,100 people.[178] One footlocker contained 11,000 doses of thorazine, a dangerous tranquilizer. Drugs used in the testing for MK-ULTRA were found in abundance, including sodium pentathol (a truth serum), chloral hydrate (a hypnotic), Demerol, thallium (confuses thinking), and many others.[179] Schacht had supplies of halioparel and largatil, two other major tranquilizers as well.[180] The actual description of life at Jonestown is that of a tightly run concentration camp, complete with medical and psychiatric experimentation. The stresses and isolation of the victims is typical of sophisticated brainwashing techniques. The drugs and special tortures add an additional experimental aspect to the horror.[181] This more clearly explains the medical tags on the bodies and why they had to be removed It also suggests an additional motive for frustrating any chemical autopsies, since these drugs would have been found in the system of the dead.

The story of Jonestown is that of a gruesome experiment, not a religious Utopian society. On the eve of the massacre, Forbes Burnham was reportedly converted to “born again” Christianity by members of the Full Gospel Christian Businessman’s Association, including Lionel Luckhoo, a Temple lawyer in Guyana.[182] This same group, based in California, also reportedly converted Guatemalan dictator Rios Montt prior to his massacres there, and they were in touch with Jim Jones in Ukiah.[183] They conducted White House prayer breakfasts for Mr. Reagan.[184] With Ryan on his way to Jonestown, the seal of secrecy was broken. In a desperate attempt to test their conditioning methods, the Jonestown elite apparently tried to implement a real suicide drill.[185] Clearly, it led to a revolt, and the majority of people fled, unaware that there were people waiting to catch them.

One Too Many Jonestowns

Author Don Freed, an associate of Mark Lane, said that Martin Luther King, “if he could see Jonestown, would recognize it as the next step in his agenda, and he would say, one, two, three, many more Jonestowns.”[186] Strangely enough, almost every map of Guyana in the major press located Jonestown at a different place following the killings. One map even shows a second site in the area called “Johnstown.”[187] Perhaps there were multiple camps and Leo Ryan was only shown the one they hoped he would see. In any case, the Jonestown model survives, and similar camps, and their sinister designs, show up in many places.

Inside Guyana itself, approximately 25 miles to the south of Matthew’s Bridge, is a community called Hilltown, named after religious leader Rabbi Hill. Hill has used the names Abraham Israel and Rabbi Emmanuel Washington. Hilltown, set up about the same time as Jonestown, followed the departure of David Hill, who was known in Cleveland, a fugitive of the U.S. courts. Hill rules with an “iron fist” over some 8,000 Black people from Guyana and America who believe they are the Lost Tribe of Israel and the real Hebrews of Biblical prophecy.[188] Used as strong-arm troops, and “internal mercenaries” to insure Burnham’s election, as were Jonestown members, the Hilltown people were allowed to clear the Jonestown site of shoes and unused weapons, both in short supply in Guyana.[189] Hill says his followers would gladly kill themselves at his command but he would survive, since, unlike Jones, he is “in control.”[190]

Similar camps were reported at the time in the Philippines. Perhaps the best known example is the fascist torture camp in Chile known as Colonia Dignidad. Also a religious cult built around a single individual, this one came from Germany to Chile in 1961. In both cases the camp was their "Agricultural Experiment." Sealed and protected by the dreaded Chilean DINA police, Colonia Dignidad serves as a torture chamber for political dissidents. To the Jonestown monstrosities, they have added dogs specially trained to attack human genitals.[191] The operations there have included the heavy hand of decapitation specialist Michael Townley Welch, an American CIA agent, as well as reported visits by Nazi war criminals Dr. Josef Mengele and Martin Bormann. Currently, another such campsite exists at Pisagua, Chile.[192] Temple member Jeannie Mills, now dead, reported having seen actual films of a Chilean torture camp while at Jonestown. The only source possible at the time was the Chilean fascists themselves.[193]

In the current period, Jonestown is being "repopulated" with 100,000 Laotian Hmong people. Many of them grew opium for CIA money in Southeast Asia. Over 1,000 reside there already under a scheme designed by Billy Graham's nephew Ernest, and members of the Federation of Evangelical Ministries Association in Wheaton, Illinois (World Vision, World Medical Relief, Samaritan's Purse, and Carl McIntyre's International Council of Christian Churches).[194] Similar plans devised by the Peace Corps included moving inner-city Blacks from America to Jamaica and other Third World countries. And World Relief attempted to move the population of the Island of Dominica to Jonestown.[195] It is only a matter of time before another Jonestown will be exposed, perhaps leading again to massive slaughter.

The Links to U.S. Intelligence Agencies

Our story so far has hinted at connections to U.S. intelligence, such as the long-term friendship of Jones and CIA associate Dan Mitrione, but the ties are much more direct when a full picture of the operation is revealed. To start with, the history of Forbes Burnham's rise to power in Guyana is fraught with the clear implication of a CIA coup d'état to oust troublesome independent leader Cheddi Jagan.[196] In addition, the press and other evidence indicated the presence of a CIA agent on the scene at the time of the massacre. This man, Richard Dwyer, was working as Deputy Chief of Mission for the U.S. Embassy in Guyana.[197] Identified in Who's Who in the CIA, he has been involved since 1959, and was last stationed in Martinique.[198] Present at the camp site and the airport strip, his accounts were used by the State Department to confirm the death of Leo Ryan. At the massacre, Jones said, "Get Dwyer out of here" just before the killings began.[199]

Other Embassy personnel, who knew the situation at Jonestown well, were also connected to intelligence work. U.S. Ambassador John Burke, who served in the CIA with Dwyer in Thailand, was an Embassy official described by Philip Agee as working for the CIA since 1963. A Reagan appointee to the CIA, he is still employed by the Agency, usually on State Department assignments.[200] Burke tried to stop Ryan's investigation.[201] Also at the Embassy was Chief consular officer Richard McCoy, described as "close to Jones," who worked for military intelligence and was "on loan" from the Defense Department at the time of the massacre.[202] According to a standard source, "The U.S. Embassy in Georgetown housed the Georgetown CIA station. It now appears that the majority and perhaps all of the embassy officials were CIA officers operating under State Department covers…"[203] Dan Webber, who was sent to the site of the massacre the day after, was also named as CIA.[204] Not only did the State Department conceal all reports of violations at Jonestown from Congressman Leo Ryan, but the Embassy regularly provided Jones with copies of all congressional inquiries under the Freedom of Information Act.[205]

Ryan had challenged the Agency's overseas operations before, as a member of the House Committee responsible for oversight on intelligence. He was an author of the controversial Hughes-Ryan Amendment that would have required CIA disclosure in advance to the congressional committees of all planned covert operations. The Amendment was defeated shortly after his death.[206]

American intelligence agencies have a sordid history of cooperative relations with Nazi war criminals and international terrorism.[207] In light of this, consider the curious ties of the family members of the top lieutenants to Jim Jones. The Layton family is one example. Dr. Lawrence Layton was Chief of Chemical and Ecological Warfare Research at Dugway Proving Grounds in Utah, for many years, and later worked as Director of Missile and Satellite Development at the Navy Propellant Division, Indian Head, Maryland.[208] His wife, Lisa, had come from a rich German family. Her father Hugo, had represented I.G. Farben as a stockbroker.[209] Her stories about hiding her Jewish past from her children for most of her life, and her parents escape from a train heading for a Nazi concentration camp seem shallow, as do Dr. Layton's Quaker religious beliefs. The same family sent money to Jonestown regularly.[210] Their daughter, Debbie, met and married George Philip Blakey in an exclusive private school in England. Blakey's parents have extensive stock holdings in Solvay drugs, a division of the Nazi cartel I.G. Farben.[211] He also contributed financially.[212]

Terri Buford's father, Admiral Charles T. Buford, worked with Navy Intelligence.[213] In addition, Blakey was reportedly running mercenaries from Jonestown to CIA-backed UNITA forces in Angola.[214] Maria Katsaris' father was a minister with the Greek Orthodox Church, a common conduit of CIA funding, and Maria claimed she had proof he was CIA. She was shot in the head, and her death was ruled a suicide, but at one point Charles Beikman was charged with killing her.[215] On their return to the United States, the "official" survivors were represented by attorney Joseph Blatchford, who had been named prior to that time in a scandal involving CIA infiltration of the Peace Corps.[216] Almost everywhere you look at Jonestown, U.S. intelligence and fascism rear their ugly heads.

The connection of intelligence agencies to cults is nothing new. A simple but revealing example is the Unification Church, tied to both the Korean CIA (i.e., American CIA in Korea), and the international fascist network know as the World Anti-Communist League. The Moonies hosted WACL's first international conference.[217] What distinguished Jonestown was both the level of control and the open sinister involvement. It was imperative that they cover their tracks.[218]

Maria Katsaris sent Michael Prokes, Tim Carter, and another guard out at the last minute with $500,000 cash in a suitcase, and instructions for a drop point. Her note inside suggests the funds were destined for the Soviet Union.[219] Prokes later shot himself at a San Francisco press conference, where he claimed to be an FBI informant.[220] Others reported meetings with KGB agents and plans to move to Russia.[221] This disinformation was part of a “red smear” to be used if they had to abandon the operation. The Soviet Union had no interest in the money and even less in Jonestown. The cash was recovered by the Guyanese government.[222]

Their hidden funding may include more intelligence links. A mysterious account in Panama, totaling nearly $5 million in the name of an “Associacion Pro Religiosa do San Pedro, S.A.” was located.[223] This unknown Religious Association of St. Peter was probably one of the 12 phony companies set up by Archbishop Paul Marcinkus to hide the illegal investments of Vatican funds through the scandal-ridden Banco Ambrosiano.[224] A few days after the story broke about the accounts, the President of Panama, and most of the government, resigned. Roberto Calvi of Banco Ambrosiano was murdered, and the Jonestown account disappeared from public scrutiny and court record.[225]

The direct orders to cover up the cause of death came from the top levels of the American government. Zbigniew Brzezinsky delegated to Robert Pastor, and he in turn ordered Lt. Col. Gordon Sumner to strip the bodies of identity.[226] Pastor is now Deputy Director of the CIA.[227] One can only wonder how many others tied to the Jonestown operation were similarly promoted.

The Strange Connection to the Murder of Martin Luther King

One of the persistent problems in researching Jonestown is that it seems to lead to so many other criminal activities, each with its own complex history and cast of characters. Perhaps the most disturbing of these is the connection that appears repeatedly between the characters in the Jonestown story and the key people involved in the murder and investigation of Martin Luther King.

The first clue to this link appeared in the personal histories of the members of the Ryan investigation team who were so selectively and deliberately killed at Port Kaituma. Don Harris, a veteran NBC reporter, had been the only network newsman on the scene to cover Martin Luther King's activity in Memphis at the time of King's assassination. He had interviewed key witnesses at the site. His coverage of the urban riots that followed won him an Emmy award.[228] Gregory Robinson, a "fearless" journalist from the San Francisco Examiner, had photographed the same riots in Washington D.C. When he was approached for copies of the films by Justice Department officials, he threw the negatives into the Potomac River.[229]

The role of Mark Lane, who served as attorney for Jim Jones, is even more clearly intertwined.[230] Lane had co-authored a book with Dick Gregory, claiming FBI complicity in the King murder.[231] He was hired as the attorney for James Earl Ray, accused assassin, when Ray testified before the House Select Committee on Assassinations about King.[232] Prior to this testimony, Ray was involved in an unusual escape plot at Brushy Mountain State Prison.[233] The prisoner who had helped engineer the escape plot was later inexplicably offered an early parole by members of the Tennessee Governor's office. These officials, and Governor Blanton himself, were to come under close public scrutiny and face legal charges in regard to bribes taken to arrange illegal early pardons for prisoners.[234]

One of the people living at Jonestown was ex-FBI agent Wesley Swearingen, who at least publicly condemned the COINTELPRO operations and other abuses, based on stolen classified documents, at the Jonestown site. Lane had reportedly met with him there at least a year before the massacre. Terri Buford said the documents were passed on to Charles Garry. Lane used information from Swearingen in his thesis on the FBI and King's murder. Swearingen served as a key witness in suits against the Justice Department brought by the Socialist Workers Party.[235] When Larry Flynt, the flamboyant publisher of Hustler magazine, offered a $1 million reward leading to the capture and conviction of the John F. Kennedy killers, the long distance number listed to collect information and leads was being answered by Mark Lane and Wesley Swearingen.[236]

With help from officials in Tennessee, Governor Blanton's office, Lane managed to get legal custody of a woman who had been incarcerated in the Tennessee state psychiatric system for nearly eight years.[237] This woman, Grace Walden Stephens, had been a witness in the King murder.[238] She was living at the time in Memphis in a rooming house across from the hotel when Martin Luther King was shot.[239] The official version of events had Ray located in the common bathroom of the rooming house, and claimed he had used a rifle to murder King from that window.[240] Grace Stephens did, indeed, see a man run from the bathroom, past her door and down to the street below.[241] A rifle, later linked circumstantially to James Earl Ray, was found inside a bundle at the base of the rooming house stairs, and identified as the murder weapon.[242] But Grace, who saw the man clearly, refused to identify him as Ray when shown photographs by the FBI.[243] Her testimony was never introduced at the trial. The FBI relied instead, on the word of her common-law husband Charles Stephens, who was drunk and unconscious at the time of the incident.[244] Her persistence in saying that it was not James Earl Ray was used at her mental competency hearings as evidence against her, and she disappeared into the psychiatric system.[245]

Grace Walden Stephens took up residence in Memphis with Lane, her custodian, and Terri Buford, a key Temple member who had returned to the U.S. before the killings to live with Lane.[246] While arranging for her to testify before the Select Committee on Ray's behalf, Lane and Buford were plotting another fate for Grace Stephens. Notes from Buford to Jones found in the aftermath of the killings discussed arrangements with Lane to move Grace Stephens to Jonestown.[247] The problem that remained was lack of a passport, but Buford suggested either getting a passport on the black market, or using the passport of former Temple member Maxine Swaney.[248] Swaney, dead for nearly two and a half years since her departure from the Ukiah camp, was in no position to argue, and Jones apparently kept her passport with him.[249] Whether Grace ever arrived at Jonestown is unclear.

Lane was also forced to leave Ray in the midst of testimony to the Select Committee when he got word that Ryan was planning to visit. Lane had attempted to discourage the trip earlier in a vaguely threatening letter.[250] Now he rushed to be sure he arrived with the group.[251] At the scene, he failed to warn Ryan and others, knowing that the sandwiches and other food might be drugged, but refrained from eating it himself.[252] Later, claiming that he and Charles Garry would write the official history of the "revolutionary suicide," Lane was allowed to leave the pieces of underwear to mark their way back to Georgetown.[253] If true, it seems an unlikely method if they were in any fear of pursuit. They had heard gunfire and screams back at the camp.[254] Lane was reportedly well aware of the forced drugging and suicide drills at Jonestown before Ryan arrived.[255]

Another important figure in the murder of Martin Luther King was his mother, Alberta. A few weeks after the first public announcement by Coretta Scott King that she believed her husband's murder was part of a conspiracy, Mrs. Alberta King was brutally shot to death in Atlanta, while attending church services. Anyone who had seen the physical wounds suffered by King might have been an adverse witness to the official version, since the wound angles did not match the ballistic direction of a shot from the rooming house.[257] Her death also closely coincided with the reopening of the Tennessee state court review of Ray's conviction based on a guilty plea, required by a 6th Circuit decision.[258] The judge in that case reportedly refused to allow witnesses from beyond a 100 mile radius from the courtroom.[259]

The man convicted of shooting King's mother was Marcus Wayne Chenault. His emotional affect following the murder was unusual. Grinning, he asked if he had hit anyone.[260] He had reportedly been dropped off at the church by people he knew in Ohio.[261] While at Ohio State University, he was part of a group known as "the Troop," run by a Black minister and gun collector who used the name Rabbi Emmanuel Israel. This man, described in the press as a "mentor" for Chenault, left the area immediately after the shooting.[262] In the same period, Rabbi Hill traveled from Ohio to Guyana and set up Hilltown, using similar aliases, and preaching the same message of a "Black Hebrew elite."[263] Chenault confided to SCLC leaders that he was one of many killers who were working to assassinate a long list of Black leadership. The names he said were on this list coincided with similar "death lists" distributed by the KKK, and linked to the COINTELPRO operations in the 60s.[264]

The real backgrounds and identities of Marcus Wayne Chenault and Rabbi Hill may never be discovered, but one thing is certain, Martin Luther King would never had countenanced the preachings of Jim Jones, had he lived to hear them.[265]

Aftermath

In the face of such horror, it may seem little compensation to know that a part of the truth has been unearthed. But for the families and some of the survivors, the truth, however painful, is the only path to being relieved of the burden of their doubts. It's hard to believe that President Carter was calling on us at the time not to "overreact." The idea that a large community of Black people would not only stand by and be poisoned at the suggestion of Jim Jones, but would allow their children to be murdered first, is a monstrous lie, and a racist insult.[266] We now know that the most direct description of Jonestown is that it was a Black genocide plan. One Temple director, Joyce Shaw, described the Jonestown massacre as, "some kind of horrible government experiments, or some sort of sick racial thing, a plan like that of the Germans to exterminate Blacks."[267] If we refuse to look further into this nightmarish event, there will be more Jonestowns to come. They will move from Guyana to our own backyard.

The cast of characters is neither dead nor inactive. Key members of the armed guard were ordered to be on board the Temple ship, Cudjoe — at the hour of the massacre they were on a supply run to Trinidad. George Phillip Blakey phoned his father-in-law, Dr. Lawrence Layton, from Panama after the event.[268] At least ten members of the Temple remained on the boat, and set up a new community in Trinidad while Nigel Slinger, a Grenada businessman and insurance broker for Jonestown, repaired the 400-ton shipping vessel. Then Charles Touchette, Paul McCann, Stephan Jones, and George Blakey set up an "open house" in Grenada with the others. McCann spoke about starting a shipping company to "finance the continued work of the original Temple."[269]

That “work” may have included the mysterious operations of the mental hospital in Grenada that eluded government security by promising free medical care.[270] The hospital was operated by Sir Geoffrey Bourne, Chancellor of the St. George’s University Medical School, also staffed by his son Dr. Peter Bourne.[271] His son’s history includes work with psychological experiments and USAID in Vietnam, the methadone clinics in the U.S., and a drug scandal in the Carter White House.[272] The mental hospital was the only structure bombed during the U.S. invasion of Grenada in 1983. This was part of a plan to put Sir Eric Gairy back in power.[273] Were additional experiments going on at the site?[274]

In addition, the killers of Leo Ryan and others at Port Kaituma were never accounted for fully. The trial of Larry Layton was mishandled by the Guyanese courts, and the U.S. system as well.[275] No adequate evidentiary hearings have occurred either at the trial or in state and Congressional reviews. The Jonestown killers, trained assassins and mercenaries, are not on trial. They might be working in Africa or Central America. Their participation in Jonestown can be used as an “explanation” for their involvement in later murders here, such as the case of the attack on school children in Los Angeles.[276] They should be named and located.

The money behind Jonestown was never fully examined or recovered. The court receivership only collected a fraction, the bulk went to pay back military operations and burial costs. Families of the dead were awarded only minimal amounts.[277] Some filed suit, unsuccessfully, to learn more about the circumstances of the deaths, and who was responsible. Joe Holsinger, Leo Ryan’s close friend and assistant, studied the case for two years and reached the same unnerving conclusions — these people were murdered, there was evidence of a mass mind-control experiment, and the top levels of civilian and military intelligence were involved.[278] He worked with Ryan’s family members to prove the corruption and injustice but they could barely afford the immense court costs and case preparation. Their suit, as well as a similar one brought by ex-members and families of the victims, had to be dropped for lack of funds.[279] was on his way to a Guatemalan water project run by the organization on the day his son shot at President Reagan.[280] A mysterious "double" of Hinckley, Jr., a man named Richardson, followed Hinckley's path from Colorado to Connecticut, and even wrote love letters to Jodi Foster. Richardson was a follower of Carl McIntyre's International Council of Christian Churches, and attended their Bible School in Florida. He was arrested shortly after the assassination attempt in New York's Port Authority with a weapon, and claimed he intended to kill Reagan.[281]

The international operations of World Vision and the related evangelical groups continue unabashed. World Vision official John W. Hinckley, Sr.

Another World Vision employee, Mark David Chapman, worked at their Haitian refugee camp in Ft. Chaffee, Arkansas. He was later to gain infamy as the assassin of John Lennon in New York City.[282] World Vision works with refugees worldwide. At the Honduran border, they are present in camps used by American CIA to recruit mercenaries against Nicaragua. They were at Sabra and Shatilla, camps in Lebanon where fascist Phalange massacred the Palestinians.[283] Their representatives in the Cuban refugee camps on the east coast included members of the Bay of Pigs operation, CIA-financed mercenaries from Omega 7 and Alpha 66.[284] Are they being used as a worldwide cover for the recruitment and training of these killers? They are, as mentioned earlier, working to repopulate Jonestown with Laotians who served as mercenaries for our CIA.[285]

Silence in the face of these murders is the worst possible response. The telling sign above the Jonestown dead read, "Those who do not remember the past are condemned to repeat it."[286] The genocide will come home to America. How many spent time studying the rash of child murders in Atlanta's Black community or asked the necessary questions about the discrepancies in the conviction of Wayne Williams?[287] Would we recognize a planned genocide if it occurred under similar subterfuge?

Leo Ryan's daughter, Shannon, lives among the disciples of another cult today, at the new city of Rajneeshpuram in Arizona. She was quoted in the press, during the recent controversy over a nationwide recruiting drive to bring urban homeless people to the commune, saying she did not believe it could end like Jonestown, since the leader would not ask them to commit suicide. "If he did ask me, I would do it," she said.[288] Homeless recruits, who had left since then, are suing in court because of suspicious and unnecessary injections given them by the commune's doctor, and a liquid they were served daily in unmarked jars that many believe was not simply "beer." One man in the suit claims he was drugged and disoriented for days after his first injection.[289]

The ultimate victims of mind control at Jonestown are the American people. If we fail to look beyond the constructed images given us by the television and the press, then our consciousness is manipulated, just as well as the Jonestown victims' was. Facing nuclear annihilation, many see the militarism of the Reagan policies, and military training itself, as the real "mass suicide cult." If the discrepancy between the truth of Jonestown and the official version can be so great, what other lies have we been told about major events?[290]

History is precious. In a democracy, knowledge must be accessible for informed consent to function. Hiding or distorting history behind "national security" leaves the public as the final enemy of the government. Democratic process cannot operate on "need to know." Otherwise, we live in the 1984 envisioned by Orwell's projections, and we must heed his warning that those who control the past control the future.[291]

The real tragedy of Jonestown is not only that it occurred, but that so few chose to ask themselves why or how, so few sought to find out the facts behind the bizarre tale used to explain away the death of more than 900 people, and that so many will continue to be blind to the grim reality of our intelligence agencies. In the long run, the truth will come out. Only our complicity in the deception continues to dishonor the dead.

Behold, A Pale Horse

A Draft of Danny Casolaro's Octopus Manuscript Proposal

Kenn Thomas

Danny Casolaro died in the process of investigating something called the Octopus, a power cabal that had its tentacles in a variety of notorious contemporary events. The list of those events is long: the 1980 October Surprise pay-off that cost Jimmy Carter the presidency; Contra War weapons development; bizarre murders among the Cabazon Indians in Indio, California; the privatization of CIA dirty tricks in the form of the Wackenhut security firm; the Meese Justice Department's attempt to steal software from a company known as Inslaw, and much more. What follows is a draft of Casolaro's original proposal for his book, Behold, A Pale Horse: A True Crime Narrative. Later drafts retitled it simply The Octopus.

Among researchers, the verdict has not yet been returned on whether or not Casolaro was murdered or committed suicide in the bathtub of his West Virginia hotel room on August 10, 1992. Stories have circulated about Casolaro's despondency over publisher rejection of the Octopus manuscript and his fear about the recent discovery that he had multiple sclerosis. However, Casolaro died just after meeting an informant who may have provided him with the last piece of evidence he needed to prove the existence of his Octopus cabal. The gashes in his wrists were too deep to be self-inflicted. The suicide note was unconvincing.

Suspicions continue to mount. The assistant housekeeper of the hotel tells of the presence of bloody towels under a sink at the crime scene, possibly used to wipe it clean before Casolaro's body was found. Casolaro's body was embalmed without consulting his family. Just as the veil on the secret life of Lee Harvey Oswald is only now being lifted, what really happened to Danny Casolaro will only be revealed in time. It seems a safe bet, however, that he died in part to suppress research he had amassed for the book proposed in the following document. The proposal, Behold, A Pale Horse, completed in 1990, appears in the files of Danny Casolaro, which were turned over to ABC News' Nightline after Casolaro's death and were eventually transferred to a small office at the University of Missouri.

This proposal covers many of the facts that have become well-known parts of the Casolaro tale and includes heretofore unreported details, such as the role of the gas explosive developed on the Cabazon reservation in the deaths of over 300 American and French military personnel after the October 23, 1983 blast at a compound in Beirut. (Interestingly, after the bombing of New York's World Trade Center on February 26, 1993, many in the media were quick to draw comparisons to the Beirut tragedy, and some early reports mentioned the smell of gas-fuel at the Trade Center bomb site.) The biggest gap in this account is its obliquely hidden mention of the Promis software, a central and notorious part of the Casolaro saga. Promis was developed by Inslaw, a company owned by William and Nancy Sullivan of St. Louis, Missouri, to track criminal cases through various prosecutors' offices. Although it was developed with government money, when the Reagan White House cut the program funding the development, the Hamiltons continued its development under the auspices of a private corporation, Inslaw. Modifications to Promis made it do extraordinary things, including the extrapolation of Soviet submarine launches, and it eventually came to be regarded as an indispensible police tool. It functioned well in tracking criminals and, some have said, in keeping track of political dissidents.

In 1982, Inslaw contracted to become the sole supplier of Promis to the offices of U.S. attorneys, but the Justice Department failed to deliver on the $10 million contract. While Inslaw struggled through the courts to get its due, Meese crony Earl Brian unsuccessfully attempted a hostile takeover of the company. Copies of the modified software began turning up at police agencies throughout the world. Although Brian denies it, the Hamiltons came to believe that he had sold it on the international market in violation of the Inslaw contract. Enraged, the Hamiltons put investigator Casolaro in touch with Michael Riconoscuito, who claimed not only to have made many of the Promis modifications, but also to have developed fuel-air explosives for the Contra war on the ostensibly sovereign Cabazon reservation. Riconoscuito asserted that Brian had been given Promis as a reward for paying off the Ayatollah Khomeini, who successfully delayed the release of Iranian-held American hostages until the defeat of Jimmy Carter in 1980.

Riconoscuito's confessions include tales of intelligence agency infighting that may have contributed to George Bush's defeat. He also claims connection to Park-On-Meter, an Arkansas company that helped develop Contra chemical weapons and flew them out on an airstrip in Mena, Arkansas, in an operation apparently covered up by then-Governor Bill Clinton. Riconoscuito also led Danny Casolaro to Area 51 in the Nevada desert, where UFO stories mix with rumors of secret, advanced military craft. Casolaro's files, from which the following was taken, are replete with notes about "Majority 12," the secret government task force working deals with the space aliens.

Casolaro has been slighted for not being able to discern the trustworthiness of various sources, and for being so reluctant to separate the wheat from the chaff in his research that he instead fictionalized his account of the Octopus. Nevertheless, if he was killed, it was not because he wrote bad spy fiction, it was no doubt due more to the pathways he opened to the secret and suppressed details of recent history some of which can be found on the following pages.

Behold, A Pale Horse A True Crime Narrative

by Daniel Casolaro

Behold, a pale horse and its rider's name was death and Hades followed him, and they were given power over a fourth of the earth, to kill with sword and with famine and with pestilence and by wild beasts of the earth.

— Revelation 6: 7-8

An international cabal whose freelance services cover parochial political intrigue, espionage, sophisticated weapon technologies that include biotoxins, drug trafficking, money laundering and murder-for-hire has emerged from an isolated desert Indian reservation just north of Mexicali.

While this cabal continues today, its origins were spawned 30 years ago in the shadow of the Cold War. In recent months, however, some of its members have emerged from the trenches like scarecrows to take gratuitous credit for their roles in delaying the release of the hostages in Iran until after the 1980 presidential election, scuttling and resettling the dope and dirty money schemes of the notorious, Australian-based Nugan Hand Bank, assisting Super Gun maker Gerald Bull who was assassinated last spring in Brussels, and for the development and distribution of the Fuel Air Explosive which can pack the power of a nuclear weapon in a shoebox.

I propose a series of articles and a book, a true crime narrative, that unravels this web of thugs and thieves who roam the earth with their weapons and their murders, trading dope and dirty money for the secrets of the temple.

Behold, A Pale Horse will be a haunting odyssey that depicts a manifesto of deceit, decisions of conscience, good and evil, intrigue and betrayal.

John Philip Nichols found his promised land just north of Mexicali on the wild grasses above the Salton Sea.

He was 60 years old then and the Cabazon Indian Reservation on the edge of Sonora was an ideal place for him to nurse his secret self. This is the vast desert emptiness where the yucca reaches nearly 40 feet high, where the Mormons saw it as a symbol pointing to the promised land and they called it the Joshua Tree. But the Joshua Tree is an ugly, asymmetrical lily with burly arms crooked at the elbow and it points everywhere, not unlike John Philip Nichols, as if asking itself, “What shall I do next?”

There is a point on the ridge of the Little San Bernardino mountains known as Salton View where you are more than 5,000 feet above the desert and where, to the north, you can see the great escarpment of Mount San Jacinto and, to the south, the man-made Salton Sea, the orchards of the Coachella Valley and, on a clear day, Mexico.

It is always clear in Indio and with the clarity of the warbler in the cottonwood grove, John Philip Nichols knew that he could bring his box office charity and all his earthly possessions into the reservation of the Cabazon Band of Mission Indians.

With no more than two dozen Indians and nearly 2,000 acres of desert solitaire, cactus and cotton grove, the Cabazon Reservation was a suitable home for gambling, dope, dirty money and gun running and all the fugitive visions that line the edge of oppression.

John Philip Nichols didn't howl under 12 full moons before the gambling was underway and, in the desert night, people flocked from all over to Indio Bingo and the poker casino at the fork of Highway 10 and Highway 86.

Under a major corporation's umbrella subsidiary, later to be named Cabazon Arms, the gun runners and the money traders soon arrived, the weapon makers and the generals from Babylon, Contra resuppliers, cover operatives from both the East and West and, in what one source calls "a marriage of necessity," the dope dealers, the mobsters and the murderers.

Whatever John Philip Nichols saw in the dark cathedral of those desert nights in silence and certainty cracked and became unglued. After a number of still unresolved execution-style murders and a solicitation-for-murder charge for which he was jailed, the dark vision of John Philip Nichols eroded. Although he's been released from a short stint in prison, he's a one-eyed Jack now since only Indio Bingo gambling — managed by his sons, the Las Vegas-managed poker casino, the Indians and the most formidable creatures of the desert remain.

Several of the Cabazon Arms associates during the 1980s are coming out of the shadows to take top billing for the actual participation in the multi-million dollar laundered payment to the Iranians to delay the release of the hostages, in shutting down the dope and dirty money schemes of Nugan Hand and resurfacing its activities, in assisting Gerald Bull in the refinements and distribution of his weapons arsenal including his Super Gun, and in the development of the Fuel Air Explosive technologies — thought to be responsible for the Beirut bomb which killed 241 U.S. servicemen.

While rumors of the hostage release delay circulated for years after the election of Ronald Reagan, it wasn't until 1988 that testimony was offered by two covert operatives in two different courts regarding their knowledge and participation in a hostage-release stall managed by then Reagan campaign chief William Casey. But now, two more covert operatives have emerged from that desert reservation in the journey of this story effort to confirm that previous testimony and provide richer details regarding the laundered payment by the Saudis and other particularities in order to prevent what Casey feared the most, a surprise release of the hostages before the election, almost guaranteeing windfall votes for President Jimmy Carter. The alleged reward to another Reagan insider for that mission to Iran in the summer of 1980 has been almost wholly responsible for the leaks leading to this odyssey. For it was in that reward in the form of a multi-million dollar government contract that technologies were found to have been stolen by the government from another company. In that other company's recovery from bankruptcy, its CEO has been the real life star and gumshoe in this drama that continues to unfold each day.

In 1982, the body of 30-year-old Paul Morasca was found hog-tied and fatally strangled in his condominium on San Francisco's Telegraph Hill. Morasca, who had been working among the Cabazon Arms confidantes, reportedly had the access codes for offshore accounts containing hundreds of millions of dollars in drug money ostensibly for covert operations. Morasca's partner, who is one of the key sources for this story, claims to have scuttled Nugan Hand's operations and assumed control over all the funds. Two years earlier, about 90 miles from Sydney, Frank Nugan's body was found slumped over in his Mercedes sedan. His partner, Michael Hand, has been missing since the investigation widened several months after Nugan's death. Two sources in this story report knowledge of Michael Hand's whereabouts.

The drug trafficking, the contract murders, the spies and the investment frauds revealed in the Nugan Hand inquiries bear sinister, mirror-like qualities to the gang on that isolated desert reservation in Southern California.

A little more than six months ago, on a quiet spring evening in Brussels, a guns-to-Babylon mission splintered into pieces which were later found in the UK's Teesport and in Turkey. Gerald Vincent Bull ambled down the hallway leading to his apartment when an assassin fired two 7.6 millimeter rounds at point blank range into the back of his skull. The shadowy movements of his Super Gun dream took hold and gathered momentum in the Indio desert.

Six years ago on a balmy Sunday morning in Beirut, a Lebanese boy later nicknamed "Smiling Death" raced a Mercedes truck toward a building full of sleeping US soldiers. A few seconds later, 241 Americans and 56 Frenchmen were dead in what the FBI called the largest man-made non-nuclear explosion since World War II. Nicknamed "Smiling Death" because of the chilling expression that the sentry recalled on the suicide driver's face, the bomb and the driver were traced to a Lebanese Shia Muslim extremist group, the Islamic Jihad, and to the most dangerous terrorist at large today, Imad Mugniyah. Mugniyah's followers had used what investigators called a "trademark," using gas to enhance a powerful explosive. Investigators determined that the device was equivalent to nine tons of dynamite, made of sophisticated explosive enhanced by gas, and only the size of an unfolded card table. Its name: The Fuel Air Explosive.

Possession of a secret is no guarantee of its truth, and while these allegations by a handful of people are indeed remarkable, they are also wrought with undocumentable details — at least thus far, and veils of deniability masking the necessary spine for a traditional journalistic effort. It is for this reason that Behold, A Pale Horse is subtitled A True Crime Narrative.

The first three chapters of the manuscript should be finished within three months of an initial advance and each subsequent chapter will be delivered every month. the completed book should be ready for publication by the summer of 1991.

Joseph D. Casolaro, 44, journalist and novelist

Funeral services for Joseph Daniel Casolaro, the Washington-based writer who died in West Virginia while working on an investigative story, will be at 10 a.m. today at St. Ann's Church in Arlington.

Mr. Casolaro, a 44-year-old Fairfax County resident, was investigating the Bank of Credit and Commerce International when he was found with his arms slashed Saturday in a bathtub in a Martinsburg, W.Va., hotel. A police investigation is continuing.

A lifetime resident of Northern Virginia, he was a veteran journalist and author of several published fiction works. His most recent novel, "The Ice King," was published by St. Martin's Press in 1985.

Before his 18-month free-lance investigation of various banking and government scandals that he believed were intertwined, Mr. Casolaro was a writer and editor at Computer Age Publications, a newsletter group based in Springfield. He had worked for other publications covering the criminal justice system and had been a correspondent and columnist for newspapers and magazines based on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Casolaro began his reporting. career with Globe Newspapers, a string of weeklies serving Northern Virginia. He attended St. Leo's College and Providence College, and he spent a year in Paris at the Sorbonne.

He is survived by two sons from a previous marriage, Joseph Casolaro III of Leadville, Colo., and Colby Henson of Herndon; his mother, Frances Casolaro of Falls Church; a brother, Dr. M. Anthony Casolaro of Dunn Loring; and two sisters, Mari-Ellen Slakey of McLean and Linda Oels of Toms River, N. J.

The 7 Seals Revealed to David Koresh

WHY WACO?

Ken Fawcett

The Branch Davidian conflagration, in which nearly a hundred so-called “cult members” burned to death, seemed to temporarily satisfy the TV audience’s post-Gulf War adrenaline fix, and signal an escalation in the New World Order’s taste for “shoot now, explain later” mini-wars within domestic borders. If the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms wanted to arrest David Koresh they had ample opportunity on his frequent trips to downtown Waco prior to the initial siege. As Ken Fawcett’s following affidavit confirms, the first assault on the Mount Carmel complex was done for the benefit of news cameras, probably to justify the ATF budget, which expanded ten-fold during the 1980s. Independent reseachers have revealed that two of four ATF officers killed in the initial “surprise raid” were most likely killed by friendly fire and concussion grenades hurled by fellow storm troopers. In addition, Mr. Fawcett claims the official time of the first raid was misstated by two hours to allow the ATF to edit the tapes for official use by the news media. In June, 1993, recordings released by Waco-area 911 lines, amply demonstrate the sect’s desire for cease-fire during the initial raid.

The cover-up tones of the Waco conflagration was confirmed by use of FBI subcontractors as so-called “independent arson investigators” and the hiring of Mark Richard as a top advisor to Attorney General Janet Reno. According to Daniel Sheehan of the Christic Institute, “When the investigation of the [Edwin] Wilson affair [selling arms to the Libyans] started to lead into revealing information showing that the criminal activities were being directly authorized by CIA leadership under George Bush, it was Mark Richard who moved in out of the Justice Department to shut down that entire investigation. They allowed Tom Cline and Richard Secord … to enter a simple plea; [they] ended up paying just a few thousand dollars fine in being released from any further criminal investigation. It’s what’s known in the business as a ‘fix.’ That fix was put in by Mark Richard.”

Waco also afforded police agencies the opportunity try out sophisticated microwave weaponry (see “Remote Mind Control Technology” by Anna Keeler) and fool around with interesting new psych-war devices including incredibly bright spotlights and incessant ear-splitting recordings of whining, taunting voices, dentist drills, and rabbits being slaughtered, among other aural monstrosities.

The “mild” tear gas that was pumped inside the Branch Davidian compound for eight hours was of the CS variety, a physically disabling poison which is usually mixed with kerosene for transmittal, is highly flammable. CS gas killed many children during the Vietnam War. It has now been confirmed that the Waco Fire Department was deliberately held back from responding to the fire, and, contrary to the federal position, the Texas coroner has maintained that none of the Waco inferno victims had been shot. [Introduction by Adam Parfrey.]

I am the individual who started the communication process to the besieged individuals inside Mt. Carmel [the Branch Davidian complex]. With help from Ron Engleman of radio station KGBS, we employed a method involving the use of a satellite dish on top of the Mt. Carmel Complex, i.e., moving it back and forth to signify an affirmative answer to on-air questions. Integral to the process is my personal satellite downlink equipment (three TURO dishes, 2 C-band, and 1 combination C and Ku band (12.7-12.9 Ghz.) The Ku band system is still somewhat new to the civilian and non-media public and are relatively rare (about 5,000 nationwide.)

I became involved in the situation last Monday after observing numerous contradictions between what was actually occurring on the scene and what was being reported by the off-air media. In addition, beginning Tuesday evening I began monitoring and taping both domestic and foreign correspondent satellite Ku band uplinks or transmissions from the “media checkpoint.” On Wednesday, March 3, after already removing the media twice for “safety concerns,” the FBI imposed restrictions upon the television media as to the use of more than 200x telephoto lenses on live shots, and upon the use of ambient light sensing “night vision” equipment. Bear in mind this type of ambient light equipment cannot in any way interfere with that being used by ATF or FBI. The restriction was as follows: night vision can only be used by the networks on a one-hour delay and restricted to two hours per night. Foreign correspondents, fearing for the safety of the citizens within the complex, maintained all-night vigils, using night vision as well as 400x lenses. Monitoring these foreign transmissions, I was able to observe and videotape the following atrocities.

On March 2, 1993, at approximately 11 pm, while monitoring live Ku band transmissions from the Waco media set-up, I was surprised to view what was certainly an almost unedited video “refeed” of the assault. Having monitored news feeds in the past I knew from experience that the tape would be run twice. I proceeded to tape the second feed … this tape has been duplicated and distributed for my protection.

Over the ensuing weeks the tape was studied carefully by myself as well as by several men with military and law enforcement backgrounds. The conclusions reached are as follows:

1. BATF officers, either through mishandling, improper preparation, and/or defective equipment, suffered a minimum of two accidental weapon discharges. The first of which involved the Heckler-Koch MP5 assault rifle, and resulted in the death of Special Agent Stephen Willis and the injuring of another officer, as yet unidentified.

The second discharge occurred on an aluminum ladder, involving a Sig-Sauer P228 semi-automatic handgun, which, according to John C. Killorin, Chief of Public Affairs, ATF, has no safety. The weapon discharged in the holster of Agent Conway C. LeBleu, resulting in a flesh wound to his right leg. Agent LeBleu was able to ascend the ladder but met with death after entering a second-story window.

2. The attack plan failed to take into account the unusual architecture of the compound and thereby subjected officers crossing the roof from South to North to crossfire from agents seen firing from behind vehicles located on the west or front side of the compound.

3. The plan overestimated and/or was misinformed as to the construction of exterior and interior walls. This caused helicopter-based gunfire to pass completely through the building at angles endangering friendly forces on the ground.

4. The plan relied too heavily upon radio communication. When those communications were compromised, there was confusion as to the location of various forces, enemy as well as friendly. This too was a factor in the accidental tossing of a fragmentation device into the second story room, further identified as a 10’ × 10’ room adjoining David Koresh’s living quarters, which led to the death of agents Robert J. Williams, Todd McKeehan and Conway LeBleu.

5. Despite public statements to the contrary, agents are seen firing blindly into walls and windows without properly acquiring a target. This practice is known as “spray and pray” in law enforcement circles, and is unacceptable while executing an arrest warrant on one man, and one man only, where more than 100 innocent women, children and men are residing.

6. If after-the-fact statements by AFT spokespersons are true, and these affiants actually possessed and/or were suspected to possess weapons in the type and amount necessary to warrant the enforcement manpower at hand, then it is clear that management personnel failed miserably in prearranging ambulance and medical services for wounded or traumatized personnel, as evidenced by agents seen and heard well into the firefight telling TV cameramen to “call for an ambulance.”

7. ATF spokesmen Dan Conroy, Jack Killorin, Steven Higgins and David Troy have repeatedly stated that the “element of surprise” was paramount to the success of the “mission,” yet videotape reveals that two reporters are actually sitting clearly visible in a tree in front of the compound, and channel 10 crews were actually invited to “follow the ATF horse trailers in,” per conversation with Mr. Virgil L. Teter, KWTX, Waco.

8. Despite insistence that National Guard helicopters were requisitioned only to search for “hot spots” in the compound, their approach is clearly too low and off to the right and left to provide such a function.

9. Despite public statements that the three helicopters used in the raid sustained fire they are seen being examined in subsequent videotape, and no damage is visible.

10. An unidentified Davidian is seen and heard from a lower story doorway repeatedly calling for “peace” each time he is met with a hail of gunfire.

11. Agents are taped being assisted by Branch Davidians in the stabilization and evacuation of wounded officers; this behavior is inconsistent with persons having murderous intent.

12. The time of the Feb. 28th raid was deliberately misstated by two hours to allow editing of the video news tape before being released to the public.

13. There were no less than three tv station news crews waiting at the gate to follow the BATF into the complex.

14. The press was moved back three times in the first two days of the so-called stand-off to obscure from view federal agents “cleaning up” the bodies of two unarmed Branch Davidians killed by ATF snipers several hours after the “raid” had ended.

15. Even though it’s been widely reported that the final conflagration fire scene was too hot for investigators and medical examiners to enter for two days (because of “one million” rounds of “live” ammo) I have videotape footage of FBI agent Bob Ricks, ATF agent Swenson and others walking around in the ashes less than two hours after the fire was brought under control, wearing no protective clothing or eyegear whatsoever.

THE DISINFORMATIONAL PLAGUE

"We SHELL not EXXON erate Saddam until an AMOCO ble solution is reached."

An Invitation to War

Eight days before the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi troops on August 2, 1990, President Saddam Hussein met with United States Ambassador April Glaspie at his presidential palace. The following transcript of that meeting, is an obvious indication of the duplicitous intentions of the New World Order to stir up a war in which hundreds of thousands were killed.

Ambassador Glaspie: I have direct instructions from President Bush to improve our relations with Iraq. We have considerable sympathy for your quest for higher oil prices, the immediate cause of your confrontation with Kuwait. As you know, I have lived here for years and admire your extraordinary efforts to rebuild your country. We know you need funds. We understand that, and our opinion is that you should have the opportunity to rebuild your country. We can see that you have deployed massive numbers of troops in the south. Normally that would be none of our business, but when this happens in the context of your other threats against Kuwait, then it would be reasonable for us to be concerned. For this reason, I have received an instruction to ask you, in the spirit of friendship — not confrontation — regarding your intentions: Why are your troops massed so very close to Kuwait's borders?

Saddam Hussein: As you know, for years now I have made every effort to reach a settlement on our dispute with Kuwait. There is to be a meeting in two days; I am prepared to give negotiations only this one more brief chance. When we [the Iraqis] meet [with the Kuwaitis] and we see there is hope, then nothing will happen. But if we are unable to find a solution, then it will be natural that Iraq will not accept death.

Ambassador Glaspie: What solutions would be acceptable?

Saddam Hussein: If we could keep the whole of the Shatt al Arab — our strategic goal in our war with Iran — we will make concessions [to the Kuwaitis]. But, if we are forced to choose between keeping half of the Shatt and the whole of Iraq [including Kuwait, in Saddam's view] then we will give up all of the Shatt to defend our claims on Kuwait to keep the whole of Iraq in the shape we wish it to be. [Pause, then Glaspie speaks carefully:]

Ambassador Glaspie: We have no opinion on your Arab-Arab conflicts, such as your dispute with Kuwait. Secretary [of State James] Baker has directed me to emphasize the instruction, first given to Iraq in the 1960s, that the Kuwait issue is not associated with America. [Saddam smiles.]

After obtaining the tape and transcript of the Saddam-Glaspie meeting of July 29,1990, British journalists confronted Ms. Glaspie while leaving the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad on September 2, 1990:

Journalist 1: Are the transcripts [holding them up] correct, Madame Ambassador? [Glaspie does not respond]

Journalist 2: You knew Saddam was going to invade [Kuwait], but you didn't warn him not to. You didn't tell him America would defend Kuwait. You told him the oppose— that America was not associated with Kuwait.

Journalist 1: You encouraged this aggression — his invasion. What were you thinking?

Ambassador Glaspie: Obviously, I didn't think, and nobody else did, that the Iraqis were going to take ALL of Kuwait.

Journalist 1: You thought he was just going to take SOME of it? But, how could you? Saddam told you that, if negotiations failed, he would give up his Iran [Shatt al Arab waterway] goal for the "whole of Iraq, in the shape we wish it to be." You know that includes Kuwait, which the Iraqis have always viewed as an historic part of their country! [Glaspie says nothing, pushing past the journalists]

Journalist 1: America green-lighted the invasion. At a minimum you admit signaling Saddam that some agression was okay — that the U.S.

would not oppose a grab of the al-Rumeilah oil field, the disputed border strip and the Gulf Islands — territories claimed by Iraq?

[Again, Ambassador Glaspie says nothing as the limousine door closes behind her.]

INSIDE THE IRISH REPUBLICAN ARMY

Scott Smith

Journalist Scott Smith spoke with a representative for the Irish Republican Army's governing Army Council, in this first (and last) interview ever granted to an American journalist.

Q: How many members of the IRA are active now? [Estimates range from 250 to 1000.]

A: That is best left unsaid for security reasons but we can state that we have as many as we need and are turning away applicants. About 25% of our volunteers, including support personnel for the Active Service Units, are women. Most members of the Oglaigh na Heireann are from the six occupied counties.

Q: How many IRA have been killed since the beginning of this phase of the struggle in 1969?

A: Somewhat less than 300, about a third of them due to explosions while they were preparing bombs, mostly in the early years.

Q: In The Provisional IRA by Maille and Bishop they say the IRA is guilty of most of the civilian deaths. True?

A: They claim there have been 2,500 civilians killed, when that is the total number of deaths since 1969, which shows you how reliable they are. The IRA explains the reasons for each individual execution. Occasionally there are mistakes but we are very careful to avoid harming innocent people — collaborators, however, are not innocent.

We call off numerous operations when there is any danger to those not targeted — and our Volunteers prefer to operate in daylight to be able to see whether anyone is unintentionally endangered. The percentage of civilians killed by loyalists and Crown forces is much higher and they are intentionally less discriminate as part of their policy of terror to intimidate the nationalist community.

One measure of how accurate Britain's propaganda image of the IRA is can be found in Fr. Raymond Murray's generally accepted statistics about the war: in 18 years less than 150 civilians have been killed in the North by all nationalist bombs, including those of the INLA, officials, etc. Those due to the IRA have been accidents — we do not wish to harm innocent people, which is why we give bomb warnings.

Q: What about infamous bombings like La Mon Hotel, Harrod's Department Store and the Birmingham pubs?

A: First of all, it should be noted that the IRA takes responsibility for all actions of its Volunteers, even when unauthorized and when the publicity is damaging to us, in order to maintain credibility with our people. La Mon was tragic but unintended — the warning was inadequate for the speed with which the flames spread. Harrod's was not approved by command — the IRA was on the way to another target but were forced to abandon the car with the bomb. A 40 minute specific warning was given, and the police chose not to alarm the Christmas shoppers while they tried to find the bomb. Birmingham was the result of delays in delivering the warning due to non-working public phones.

Q: The Birmingham Six appear to be innocent so why not bring forward the guilty to serve in their place?

A: The six are in prison because of British injustice and should be released. If Britain were not in Ireland things like this would never occur. The British are not going to turn over their terrorists to us and we discipline our own soldiers.

Q: What about compensating the families of those killed and injured?

A: We wish we could but we do not have the funds. Help would likely be rejected anyway. Again, Britain ultimately bears responsibility: as long as it occupies our country there will be war and casualties.

Q: James Adams' The Financing of Terror claims the IRA takes in $7 million a year, mostly from protection rackets, extortion of contractors, band and post office robberies, the Belfast black taxis, drinking clubs, the former co-op, etc. He says the real beneficiaries are the "rich godfathers."

A: Anyone familiar with British black propaganda and knowledgeable about the situation here knows this is utter fabrication. We have challenged those making such assertions to provide any evidence — most recently a British TV program investigated and found nothing to corroborate these fantasies. Even our Volunteers are unpaid at the moment. The irony is that our critics are the ones who are well-off.

The co-op was run by former prisoners, as are the taxis and clubs; the IRA is not involved. There are no protection rackets run by us — any member caught trying to exploit people for personal gain is subject to very severe discipline. There have been no postal robberies in four years or banks in six. Most of our funding comes from individual donations from outside Ireland— and we do not accept donations with any strings attached.

Q: What about Adams' claim that you work territorial deals with the Ulster Defense Association so that you don't get accused of exploiting your own people?

A: Utter rubbish. We have no arrangements of any kind with loyalist paramilitaries.

Q*. What about charges that since the hunger strikes a criminal element has entered the IRA?*

A: In any organization, especially an underground one, you get some people who do not live up to its ideals. We want to be informed of anyone not conforming to Army discipline. Today, however, we are more selective than ever, so problems are minor.

Q: One Irish American newspaper carried a column about the people of Rostrevor, Co. Down being turned against the IRA by the execution of a local boy it claimed was an informer, an assertion the community rejects. How careful is the IRA in passing sentences?

A: Very careful, despite the conditions we have to operate in. We require documentation or admission and our intelligence is very good. Executions take place only when we are certain. In the Rostrevor case he was, in fact, an informer and therefore endangering the lives of our Volunteers. Communities and families are naturally shocked by the facts and find them hard to accept. Informers know the risk they take for personal gain. We have also offered amnesty to those pressured by the Royal Ulster Constabulary into doing informing and dozens of people have come forward. We can arrange relocation and protection if needed.

Q: The accusation was made that Special Air Services Captain Nairac was tortured for information. Has the IRA ever used torture?

A: Never. Aside from ethical reasons we know from Britain's use on us how unreliable information gained this way is. In the Nairac case the torture charge was based on blood found in the car in which he was taken, but this was due to resistance.

Q: The British say that abuse of prisoners is no longer employed and that cameras installed in interrogation rooms prevent this.

A: They have always denied the use of torture and beatings. Now, cameras are just turned off and beatings take place on the way to interrogation. Medical testimony confirms this continues. Many of those abused have no connection to the IRA, of course, and would have no reason to lie. The British judges simply dismiss evidence of torture.

Q: How many "prisoners of war" are there?

A: There are around 650 in prison for "scheduled offenses" meaning charges connected with the political situation here. The British incredibly pretend there is no war, only a massive outbreak of crime, so they do not recognize these formally as political prisoners or prisoners of war, though they receive special treatment separate from those they regard as ordinary criminals.

It is worth mentioning that only the Republican Movement provides aid to prisoners' dependents, regardless of whether the prisoner had any connection with the IRA.

Many of the prisoners and certainly their families are innocent, railroaded by the non-jury, Diplock court system which requires no evidence to convict. The Social Democratic and Labour Party does nothing to alleviate the suffering of these families.

Q: The SDLP claims IRA supporters have attacked its meetings and election workers.

A: Individuals have spontaneously reacted to SDLP hypocrisy and lies but we don't approve such harassment and say so. The SDLP has never protested British or Irish government harassment and repression of Sinn Fein. During recent elections they have been quite willing to try to benefit from such repression.

Q: While in Belfast I read a story about the former quartermaster for Belfast, one of the local IRA's top ten people, having been an informer, responsible for six deaths and 20 arrests, now spirited into hiding by the RUC. The article said this was the highest the RUC had ever been able to place an informer.

A: The individual in question was low-ranking and did little damage. The story was a British intelligence plant to try to stir suspicions among our Volunteers about each other.

Q: What about Loughgall and the apparent use of an informer which led to the ambush killing of eight IRA earlier this year?

A: Crown forces routinely stake out barracks they think might be vulnerable or likely to be attacked based on patterns. It was bound to result in a "success" eventually. So few people knew of the plans for Loughgall that we are satisfied there was no informer. It would have been too risky for an informer to give out such information knowing only a handful knew of this.

Q: On my arrival in Belfast the news was ablaze with claims that the IRA's latest victim, Nathaniel Cush, had already resigned from the Ulster Defence Regiment and was working for the post office. Allegedly the bomb which killed him narrowly missed harming a woman with a baby.

A: We used a remote control detonator so there was never any danger to any civilians. We have warned those who resign from Crown forces to notify the Republican Movement for their own safety but our information was that he was still a member and the fact he was given a full dress military funeral supports this. Cush, incidentally, was a former member of the infamous Parachute Regiment.

Q: Another recent incident involved the driver of a school bus who was shot in the leg and the papers claimed this endangered the children.

A: The bus was halted when this incident took place.

Q: There was a lot of negative reaction to the IRA's 1986 announcement that it would regard as legitimate targets civilians doing work for the British Army.

A: Without such support the Crown forces could not remain in Ireland easily and this strategy of warning those profiteering from the British presence was used during the War of Independence in the 1920s.

We were very specific about the kinds of people who are guilty — those programming computers for British intelligence for example, not some secretary for a contractor building barracks for the British Army. To those who say helping the Crown is an ethical way to make a living we would ask if they would have supported building ovens for the Nazis. Let contractors build the housing the people need.

Q: One priest asked why you don't give part of your earnings toward job creation.

A: We do not have the money to spare. The best way to create jobs would be for Britain to leave so the healing process for the economy can begin, bringing an end to employment discrimination, allowing business and tourism to flourish, with interim help of international aid for the rebuilding process.

Q: The same individual asked why the IRA took 300 jobs out to West Beast by killing the manager of an audio manufacturer in 1976.

A. That was part of an effort to cause disinvestment that is no longer pursued. We continue some commercial bombings when the businesses serve Crown forces and outside the poverty-stricken areas where there are no jobs anyway, where we intend to disrupt Britain's effort to pretend everything is normalizing.

Q: Another controversial assassination was of Leslie Jarvis, claimed to be a civilian at Magilligan Prison.

A: He was a full time part of the administration and knew the risk in being part of the British system of oppression. We have not targeted part-time workers.

Q: English director Nicholas Meyer claims he was threatened by the IRA while filming "Johnny Loves Suzy," based on the anti-IRA novel Fields of Blood in Belfast.

A: Totally untrue. If he was threatened, it was not by us. We would know.

Q: The assassination of Lord Mountbatten caused a greater negative public reaction than any other single IRA killing. Was he really a proper target?

A: As a former leader of the British military and cousin to the Queen who lived on land confiscated from the Irish people, he was a symbol of the ruling class which supports the occupation of our country. His execution was a warning that if they insist on keeping troops here they will never be safe.

Q: Letter bombs were recently sent to current and former government officials in England. Aren't they likely to harm civilians?

A: Those who associate with the ruling class know there is risk but the innocent have rarely been harmed. We have to use what weapons we can, and these have been effective. If Britain fears them it should get out. Government officials who retire, incidentally, often remain senior advisors and are not necessarily off the target list.

Q: Isn't killing RUC and UDR members perceived as sectarian, alienating loyalists even further?

A: If we had wanted to attack Protestants per se the civilian casualties would have been much higher. "Ulsterization" was Britain's effort to push the local people to the front line and make the public in Britain less aware of casualties across the sea.

We have to take our targets as they present themselves and the brutality of the RUC and UDR is well known. It is the loyalists who have killed Catholics at random by the hundreds. We do not consider religion, only whether someone is a collaborator.

Loyalists began this conflict without IRA provocation and they intensified their sectarian killings when the IRA was observing truces. If we stopped the war of national liberation tomorrow they would not be any less anti-Irish or anti-Catholic.

The argument that our freedom struggle is "counter-productive" is heard from the same elements who opposed the 1916 Rising and the IRA in the 1920s — the media, some clergy and so-called constitutional nationalists who give mere lip service to reunification. Their position ignores the history of British colonialism and reforms have come about as a result of the armed struggle to try to appease nationalists.

Q: There have been well-publicized arms seizures over the years. Is the IRA experiencing supply problems?

A: We are getting what we need and our technology and techniques are more sophisticated than ever.

Q: The news often reports the inability of the IRA to effectively use the RPG rocket grenade. Why does it fail?

A: This was due to assembly problems and mislabeling of live and practice ammunition. The RPG has a tendency to deflect, which could endanger civilians. We have designed our own launcher which is more effective and safer.

Q: Are there ties between the IRA and groups like the PLO, Red Army Faction, etc.?

A: There are none and the James Adams book you cited points this out. The right wing tried to link us to what it fantasized was an "international terrorism network." The once secret British military Glover Report acknowledged that we are independent.

We do, however, support the rights of the Palestinians, Basques, and others. To put things in perspective, the PLO has killed about 300 Israeli civilians since 1969 while the Israeli Army killed 10,000 to 20,000 civilians during its invasion of Lebanon alone. Colonel Khaddafy of Libya is alleged to be responsible for 50 assassinations over the years. We accept no responsibility for what others have done. It should be noted that the British are the ones who armed and trained Khaddafy.

Q: But hasn't the IRA accepted donations from him?

A: We have no links with organizations and none with any country or government. We never answer specific questions as to sources of funding. Why should we help the British and bother those sources? We take money wherever we can get it without strings attached.

Q: The British and Irish governments have claimed that the IRA wants to establish a "Marxist dictatorship."

A: They know perfectly well this is false and use this as propaganda to alienate supporters. First of all, the IRA allows a diversity of political opinion. There are a few Marxists but the tendency for those leaning that way is to join the Irish National Liberation Army or other doctrinaire Marxist groups.

The "democratic socialism" espoused by Sinn Fein has been constantly redefined over the years and is adapted to the situation in Ireland where we feel tremendous poverty requires some nationalization and cooperation. Anyone labeling this Marxism is either uninformed or trying to manipulate public opinion.

In any event, we do not have the power to impose our view and have repeatedly stated our support for the right of the Irish people as a whole to decide what political system they want. We can only educate on the issues and the British and Irish governments fear that and resort to censorship. The British have repeatedly rejected the will of the Irish people expressed at the ballot box.

Q: The Sinn Fein decision to end the policy of abstention and to take seats to which elected at the Dail caused a split in the Republican Movement. Those who left Sinn Fein said it was a sell-out that would result in a running down of the war.

A: This is nonsense. The IRA supported that decision when we held the first General Army convention since 1969 a few weeks prior to the Sinn Fein Ard Fheis. Incidentally, the media report that we used the cover of an Irish language conference in Meath in August was completely wrong — which shows how good our security is.

Representatives from all ASUs and command structures attended and recognized that the Republican Movement was being isolated by Dublin and must adapt to survive. We must be involved with the people and relevant to their daily lives, avoiding the elitism advocated by our critics, who are oblivious to political reality.

Abstentionism failed and while our analysis of the 26 county Free State remains unchanged the vast majority of its residents consider the institutions of the state legitimate and theirs — with that support they will not disappear.

Those who walked away from the Movement walked away from the armed struggle and they have spent most of their energy denigrating their former comrades rather than fighting Britain. The struggle has intensified and we have lost more Volunteers this year than anytime since 1976. Loughgall was the single largest loss since the 1920s.

Our loyal supporters in the U.S. are the real Republicans and do not place political conditions on those doing the fighting. They know that we will never drive the British out of Ireland from an armchair and if we remain aloof from the people.

Q: At the Army convention a new Council was elected. How many does it consist of?

A: Seven, each with specific tasks — the Chief of Staff carries out our policies, another is in charge of intelligence, another procurement, I speak for the Council, and so forth.

Q: The constitutional nationalists say reunification can only be achieved peacefully.

A: This is at best wishful thinking and often merely an exploitation of the understandable war-weariness of our people, for political gain. We cannot wait for some miraculous change of heart by loyalists a century from now. Anyone who thinks there will be peace in Ireland while British soldiers remain does not know the history of Irish Republicanism. Britain invented the loyalist veto and can repeal it in the interests of everyone. Loyalists need to be pushed into the 20th century and only when Britain withdraws will they be forced to accept their Irishness and the vision of the Protestant founder of Republicanism, Theobald Wolfe Tone, the only way to peace, prosperity, justice and freedom.

Recipes For Nonsurvival The Anarchist Cookbook

Esperanze Godot

The Anarchist Cookbook by William Powell has been called “a manual of terror” by Max Geltman, writing in the National Review (July 22, 1971). I find this phrase aptly descriptive, but not in the same sense that Mr. Geltman would have us believe.

This “cookbook” consists of three basic parts: an introduction by Professor Bergman entitled “Anarchism Today”; and two much longer sections by William Powell on drug and explosive manufacturing.

If ever there were an example of Orwellian doublespeak, this is it! “Anarchism Today” is basically an interpretation of the philosophic roots of anarchism, awkwardly coupled with sketchy references to current events. Almost all of the intellectuals discussed are from the nineteenth century; and there is virtually no mention of writings from 1930 to present. This may be expected from someone who appears to have briefly studied the topic while at college during the 1920s, and thereafter relied only on superficial newspaper accounts. Bergman should have been aware of Albert Jay Nock for example, and anarchists today are certainly aware of Murray Rothbard, Karl Hess, etc.

Bergman considers Nihilism to be a form of Anarchism, and Anarchism a form of radical revolutionism. He interprets Marxism in an anarchistic light, and correctly suggests that Communist governments today are feudal/reactionary. However, his emphasis on the Marxist element in anarchist intellectual tradition is clearly one-sided. A more thorough and fair analysis can be found in Native American Anarchism (1932) by Eunice Minette Schuster.

Bergman's emphasis on the Nihilistic and destructive aspects of Anarchism I find disturbing. This emphasis seems to arrive from the axiom that the State is all, so to oppose the State is to oppose everything. Anarchists do not have to propose a concrete alternative because that would be authoritarian.

The rest of this book consists mainly of drug and explosive recipes relayed to us by William Powell. His motivation for doing so is supposedly to allow the "silent majority" access to information which he claims only the radical groups now possess. The idea of a "silent majority" comes from classical Greek literature and in that context referred to the dead who are the real majority. If you follow the steps outlined in these recipes, you may soon join them! The Library Journal (March 15, 1971) puts it this way:

"Much of it is so sketchy as to be harmless, but there are a number of booby traps still for the nitwit who wishes to try them. There are drug making recipes… that may make one very ill… There are also a number of stunts which could backfire on the idiot who tries them."

Let's get down to specifics:

Ed Rosenthal told me that he had spent a lot of time trying to track down rumors of pot growing in New York sewers. Well, I just may have stumbled on the origin of the "New York White" rumors. Despite what Powell may think, plants are not as adaptable as alligators and need light to grow. Another choice quote: "…strangely enough, insects ignore marijuana and do no harm." Strange indeed.

The DEA has a Precursor Control Program watch list. This means that if you buy large quantities of the common precursors to illegal chemicals, the Federal government may take an interest in your activities. Several of the chemicals on this list are used in Mr. Powell's LSD recipe, such as Acetonitrile, Trifluoroacetic Anhydride, Dimethylformamide, and Diethylamine. Benzene is also on the list, and may also arouse the interest of the EPA because it is known cancer causing agent.

Much the same can be said of many of his other recipes, and in some cases the precursors are as hard to get as the final product. For instance, his recipe for DMT starts out with indole, which is quite hard to get. Much better methods using L. Tryptophane (available in health food stores) are covered in Synthesis (1973 — present).

Powell suggests ground-up nutmeg for a psychedelic experience. Nutmeg has a poor dose/toxicity ration! However, the oil extract of nutmeg, containing myristicin, can be used in the synthesis of MMDA — a better and mellower high than MDA. See Journal of Psychedelic Drugs (Vol. 8 #4, Oct.-Dec. 1976).

On page 58 of Powell's cookbook, Nalline is described as "…a freak — a drug someone forgot to make illegal." Perhaps they forgot because Nalorphine is a powerful narcotic antagonist, which tends to produce violent convulsive reactions in morphine addicts. (See the Merck Index).

For more information on drugs see "The Clandestine Drug Laboratory Situation in the U.S.", Journal of Forensic Sciences (Jan. 1983 pp.18-31). This article, obligingly written by the DEA chief, reports that none of the 17 labs busted the previous year were successful in producing what was intended to be produced. The busted chemists were relying on recipes from popular "underground" drug manufacturing books. It was noted that such books contain errors which prevent the manufacture of the desired chemicals, while at the same time drawing the attention of government authorities because of the precursors recommended.

Let's now examine his recommendations for manufacturing explosives:

His methods for producing Mercury Fulminate is incomplete and dangerous. Between steps 2 and 3, the solution should be cooled. Do not breathe the fumes. See A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry by Sir Edward Thorpe.

Powell's recipe entitled "How to Make TNT" is also quite dangerous and incomplete. In step 1, mixing sulfuric acid and nitric acid will likely result in fulmination and red toxic fumes. Also the crude method he describes does not cover the removal of the Ortho Dinitro groups. If this were not done, the TNT would be extremely unstable. However, they can be removed with great ease by heating the crude material with aqueous sodium sulfite. See “Chemistry of Explosives” by George Wright, University of Toronto, in Organic Chemistry (p. 974).

The description of Picric acid does not sufficiently emphasize its unstable nature. For example, storing it in a cracked glass container may cause it to explode. See Thorpe’s. However, on page 120 he describes two relatively safer and easily obtainable chemicals (Potassium bichromate and potassium permanganate) as very sensitive, unstable, and too hazardous to work with.

He does have a couple of pages on general safety precautions, but the language suggests that they have been lifted from a military manual. Also, he uses the German spelling for some chemicals. If you attempt to order chemicals from an American company using German spelling, your order would likely be looked at with suspicion.

The Anarchist Cookbook was originally published in 1971; the review by the Library Journal, which exposed these dangerous errors, came shortly thereafter. I wonder why it has gone through 28 printings without these errors being corrected. My theory is that Mr. Powell is not an anarchist, but in reality is spreading disinformation to potential enemies of the government. At the time of original publication, Mr. Powell was an unknown 21 year old college freshman. Where did he get access to this “information”? He says, from radical friends on both left and right.

The Minuteman Manual is listed in the bibliography. The original Minutemen were colonial American revolutionaries. In the 60’s the radical right-wing sect called the Minutemen have since been disbanded by the FBI. It is not likely that the 1960’s Minutemen would have handed out their manual to a long haired 21 year old college freshman. Also, the Minutemen are opposed to the United Nations, and Powell’s father was a powerful bureaucrat in the UN propaganda ministry (see Newsweek, April 12, 1971). Things are getting curiouser and curiouser!

This same William Powell has also written a book entitled Saudi Arabia and its Royal Family (1982). It consists of interviews with members of the Saudi Royal family and other observations gathered while teaching at the University of Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. It does not seem likely that the Saudi Royal family would give such generous treatment to a real anarchist. Reading the Saudi book, I came across some interesting quotes (p. 17):

"Were something or someone to cut the flow of oil from the Arabian Gulf, the result would be truly apocalyptic for the United States, Western Europe, Japan, and much of the developing world. … In a worst-case scenario, all gasoline available would go to essential services such as the military, the police and fire departments, and the transport of foodstuffs. Most nonessential businesses and industries would close. Unemployment would skyrocket.

"All major cities would, in all probability, have to be placed under martial law. Curfews would be enforced at gunpoint. … Inflation would metamorphose… into a lethal epidemic. We would enter a wheelbarrow economy like that of Germany prior to Hitler's rise to power…"

I could go on, but I think you get the idea. While his pessimistic analysis does not take full account of the market's ability to conserve and switch to alternate fuels, I think a more important point is that Powell seems to believe that government is as essential as the transportation of foodstuffs, and that it can help solve the fuel crisis through the draconian methods he describes. If governments were to run out of gas tomorrow, anarchists would be dancing in celebration. (Mr. Powell's talk of martial law is not fantasy. Executive Order #11490, signed by Richard Nixon in October 1969, allows the president to assume dictatorial powers after declaring a "national emergency".)

It just doesn't add up, unless an alternative theory is developed to explain these anomalies. My attempts to get the other side of the story from the publisher were met with a stone wall of silence. My suggestion is that much of Powell's disinformation and influence may have come from the Trilateral Commission and/or the CIA. A U.S. Air Force combat controllers group studying guerrilla warfare has arrived at a similar conclusion. This theory would seem to dovetail with the National Review article which presented The Anarchist Cookbook at face value and even included a patronizing reference to "the boys at Harvard". It is well known that William F.

Buckley, the National Review editor, is a Yale graduate and once served the CIA in Mexico. (E. Howard Hunt, of Watergate fame, was CIA paymaster in Mexico City at the same time Buckley served).

I would like to quote Mr. Powell from the April 12, 1971 issue of Newsweek: "My book places power in the hands of the individual, where it belongs. The right calls it communist, the leftists call it profiteering, the liberals call it Neo-Nazi."

And this reviewer calls it bullshit!

Hand of Glory—Invisibility

THE ELITE CONTROLLERS

SILENT WEAPONS FOR QUIET WARS

This article, edited for length, seems to be “reverse disinformation” aimed at educating the public about what the author supposes the plans of the controlling elite to be. In this it shares its broad intent with other possible hoax documents such as The Protocols of the Elders of Zion and The Wicca Papers, although going about its revelations in a highly original manner. It claims to be a handbook of strategy circulated among the secret technicians of “social automation.” Ostensibly dated May, 1979, it was supposedly discovered in an IBM copier at a surplus sale. Regardless of its origins the document is insightful, perhaps providing a real breakthrough in the understanding of elitist human control.

This publication marks the 25th anniversary of the Third World War, called the “Quiet War,” being conducted using subjective biological warfare, fought with “silent weapons.” This book contains an introductory description of this war, its strategies, and its weaponry. It is patently impossible to discuss social engineering or the automation of a society, i.e., the engineering of social automation systems (silent weapons) on a national or a worldwide scale without implying extensive objectives of social control and destruction of human life, i.e. slavery and genocide. This manual is in itself an analog declaration of intent. Such a writing must be secured from public scrutiny. Otherwise, it might be recognized as a technically formal declaration of domestic war. Furthermore, whenever any person or group of persons in a position of great power and without full knowledge and consent of the public, uses such knowledge and methodology for economic conquest — it must be understood that a state of domestic warfare exists between said person or group of persons and the public.

The solution of today’s problems requires an approach which is ruthlessly candid, with no agonizing over religious, moral or cultural values. You have qualified for this project because of your ability to look at human society with cold objectivity, and yet analyze and discuss your observations and conclusions with others of similar intellectual capacity without a loss of discretion or humility. Such virtues are exercised in your own best interest. Do not deviate from them.

Historical Introduction

Silent weapon technology has evolved from Operations Research (O.R.), a strategic and tactical methodology developed under the military management (Eisenhower) in England during World War II. The original purpose of Operations Research was to study the strategic and tactical problems of air and land defense with the objective of effective use of limited military resources against foreign enemies (i.e., logistics). It was soon recognized by those in positions of power that the same methods might be useful for totally controlling a society. But better tools were necessary. Social engineering (the analysis and automation of a society) requires the correlation of great amounts of constantly changing economic information (data), so a high-speed computerized data-processing system was necessary which could race ahead of the society and predict when society would arrive for capitulation. Relay computers were too slow, but the electronic computer, invented in 1946 by J. Presper Eckert and John W. Mauchly, filled the bill.

The next breakthrough was the development of the simplex method of linear programming in 1947 by the mathematician George B. Dantzig. Then in 1948, the transistor, invented by J. Bardeen, W.H. Brattain, and W. Shockley, promised great expansion of the computer field by reducing space and power requirements. With these three inventions under their direction, those in positions of power strongly suspected that it was possible for them to control the whole world with the push of a button. Immediately, the Rockefeller Foundation got in on the ground floor by making a four-year grant to Harvard College, funding the Harvard Economic Research Project for the study of the structure of the American economy. One year later, in 1949, the United States Air Force joined in. In 1952 the original grant period terminated, and a high-level meeting of the elite was held to determine the next phase of social operations research. The Harvard project had been very fruitful, as is borne out by the publication of some of its results in 1953 suggesting the feasibility of economic (social) engineering. (Studies in the Structure of the American Economy — copyright 1953 by Wassily Leontief, International Sciences Press Inc., White Plains, New York.)

Engineered in the last half of the decade of the 1940s, the new Quiet War machine stood, so to speak, in sparkling gold-plated hardware on the showroom floor by 1954. With the creation of the maser in 1954, the promise of unlocking unlimited sources of fusion atomic energy from the heavy hydrogen in sea water and the consequent availability of unlimited social power was a possibility only decades away. The combination was irresistible. The Quiet War was quietly declared by the international elite at a meeting held in 1954. Although the silent weapons system was nearly exposed 13 years later, the evolution of the new weapon-system has never suffered any major setbacks. This volume marks the 25th anniversary of the beginning of the Quiet War. Already this domestic war has had many victories on many fronts throughout the world.

In 1954 it was well recognized by those in positions of authority that it was only a matter of time, only a few decades, before the general public would be able to grasp and upset the cradle of power, for the very elements of the new silent-weapon technology were as accessible for a public Utopia as they were for providing a private Utopia. The issue of primary concern, that of dominance, revolved around the subject of the energy sciences.

Energy

Energy is recognized as the key to all activity on earth. Natural science is the study of the sources and control of natural energy, and social science, theoretically expressed as economics, is the study of the sources and control of social energy. Both are bookkeeping systems. Mathematics is the primary energy science. And the bookkeeper can be king if the public can be kept ignorant of the methodology of the bookkeeping. All science is merely a means to an end. The means is knowledge. The end is control. Beyond this remains only one issue: Who will be the beneficiary?

In 1954 this was the issue of primary concern. Although the so-called “moral issues” were raised, in view of the law of natural selection it was agreed that a nation or world of people who will not use their intelligence are no better than animals who do not have intelligence. Consequently, in the interest of future world order, peace, and tranquility, it was decided to privately wage a quiet war against the American public with an ultimate objective of permanently shifting the natural and social energy (wealth) of the undisciplined and irresponsible many into the hands of the self-disciplined, responsible, and worthy few. In order to implement this objective, it was necessary to create, secure, and apply new weapons which, as it turned out, were a class of weapons so subtle and sophisticated in their principle of operation and public appearance as to earn for themselves the name “silent weapons.” In conclusion, the objective of economic research, as conducted by the magnates of capital (banking) and the industries of commodities (goods) and services, is the establishment of an economy which is totally predictable and manipulatable.

In order to achieve a totally predictable economy, the low-class elements of society must be brought under total control, i.e. must be housebroken, trained, and assigned a yoke and long-term social duties from a very early age, before they have the opportunity to question the propriety of the matter. In order to achieve such conformity, the lower-class family unit must be disintegrated by a process of increasing preoccupation of the parents and the establishment of government-operated day-care centers for the occupationally orphaned children. The quality of education given to the lower class must be of the poorest sort, so that the moat of ignorance isolating the inferior class from the superior class is and remains incomprehensible to the inferior class. With such an initial handicap, even bright lower class individuals have little if any hope of extricating themselves from their assigned lot in life. This form of slavery is essential to maintaining some measure of social order, peace, and tranquility for the ruling upper class.

Descriptive Introduction of the Silent Weapon

Everything that is expected from an ordinary weapon is expected from a silent weapon by its creators, but only in its own manner of junctioning. It shoots situations, instead of bullets; propelled by data processing instead of a chemical reaction (explosion); originating from bits of data, instead of grains of gunpowder; from a computer, instead of a gun; operated by a computer programmer, instead of a marksman; under the orders of a banking magnate, instead of a military general. It makes no obvious explosive noises, causes no obvious physical or mental injuries, and does not obviously interfere with anyone's daily social life. Yet it makes an unmistakable "noise," causes unmistakable physical and mental damage, and unmistakably interferes with daily social life, i.e., unmistakable to a trained observer, one who knows what to look for.

The public cannot comprehend this weapon, and therefore cannot believe that they are being attacked and subdued by a weapon. The public might instinctively feel that something is wrong, but because of the technical nature of the silent weapon, they cannot express their feeling in a rational way, or handle the problem with intelligence. Therefore, they do not know how to cry for help, and do not know how to associate with others to defend themselves against it. When a silent weapon is applied gradually, the public adjusts/adapts to its presence and learns to tolerate its encroachment on their lives until the pressure (psychological via economic) becomes too great and they crack up. Therefore, the silent weapon is a type of biological warfare. It attacks the vitality, options, and mobility of the individuals of a society by knowing, understanding, manipulating, and attacking their sources of natural and social energy, and their physical, mental, and emotional strengths and weaknesses.

Theoretical Introduction

"Give me control over a nation's currency, and I care not who makes its laws." — Mayer Amschel Rothschild (1743-1812). Today's silent weapons technology is an outgrowth of a simple idea discovered, succinctly expressed, and effectively applied by the quoted Mr. Mayer Amschel Rothschild. Mr. Rothschild discovered the missing passive component of economic theory known as economic inductance. He, of course, did not think of his discovery in these 20th-century terms, and, to be sure, mathematical analysis had to wait for the Second Industrial Revolution, the rise of the theory of mechanics and electronics, and finally, the invention of the electronic computer before it could be effectively applied in the control of the world economy.

What Mr. Rothschild had discovered was the basic principle of power, influence, and control over people as applied to economics. That principle is “when you assume the appearance of power, people soon give it to you.” Mr. Rothschild had discovered that currency or deposit loan accounts had the required appearance of power that could be used to induce people (inductance, with people corresponding to a magnetic field) into surrendering their real wealth in exchange for a promise of greater wealth (instead of real compensation). They would put up real collateral in exchange for a loan of promissory notes. Mr. Rothschild found that he could issue more notes than he had backing for, so long as he had someone’s stock of gold as a persuader to show his customers. Mr. Rothschild loaned his promissory notes to individuals and to governments. These would create overconfidence. Then he would make money scarce, tighten control of the system, and collect the collateral through the obligation of the contracts. The cycle was then repeated. These pressures could be used to ignite a war. Then he would control the availability of currency to determine who would win the war. That government which agreed to give him control of its economic system got his support. Collection of debts was guaranteed by economic aid to the enemy of the debtor. The profit derived from this economic methodology made Mr. Rothschild all the more able to extend his wealth. He found that the public greed would allow currency to be printed by government order beyond the limits (inflation) of backing in precious metal or the production of goods and services (gross national product, GNP).

Apparent Capital as Paper Inductor

In this structure, credit, presented as a pure element called “currency,” has the appearance of capital, but is, in fact, negative capital. Hence, it has the appearance of service, but is, in fact, indebtedness or debt. It is therefore an economic inductance instead of an economic capacitance, and if balanced in no other way, will be balanced by the negation of population (war, genocide). The total goods and services represent real capital called the gross national product, and currency may be printed up to this level and still represent economic capacitance; but currency printed beyond this level is subtractive, represents the introduction of economic inductance, and constitutes notes of indebtedness.

War is therefore the balancing of the system by killing the true creditors (the public, which we have taught to exchange true value for inflated currency) and falling back on whatever is left of the resources of nature and regeneration of those resources. Mr. Rothschild had discovered that currency gave him the power to rearrange the economic structure to his own advantage, to shift economic inductance to those economic positions which would encourage the greatest economic instability and oscillation. The final key to economic control had to wait until there was sufficient data and high-speed computing equipment to keep close watch on the economic oscillations created by price shocking and excess paper energy credits — paper inductance/inflation.

The Economic Model

The Harvard Economic Research Project (1948-) was an extension of World War II Operations Research. Its purpose was to discover the science of controlling an economy; at first the American economy, and then the world economy. It was felt that with sufficient mathematical foundation and data, it would be nearly as easy to predict and control the trend of an economy as to predict and control the trajectory of a projectile. Such has proven to be the case. Moreover, the economy has been transformed into a guided missile on target. The immediate aim of the Harvard project was to discover the economic structure, what forces change that structure, how the behavior of the structure can be predicted, and how it can be manipulated.

What was needed was a well-organized knowledge of the mathematical structures and interrelationships of investment, production, distribution, and consumption.

To make a short story of it all, it was discovered that an economy obeyed the same laws as electricity and that all of the mathematical theory and practical and computer know-how developed for the electronic field could be directly applied in the study of economics. This discovery was not openly declared, and its more subtle implications were and are kept a closely guarded secret, for example that in an economic model, human life is measured in dollars, and that the electric spark generated when opening a switch connected to an active inductor is mathematically analogous to the initiation of a war.

The greatest hurdle which theoretical economists faced was the accurate description of the household as an industry. This is a challenge because consumer purchases are a matter of choice which in turn is influenced by income, price, and other economic factors. This hurdle was cleared in an indirect and statistically approximate way by an application of shock testing to determine the current characteristics, called current technical coefficients, of a household industry. Finally, because problems in theoretical economics can be translated very easily into problems in theoretical electronics, and the solution translated back again, it follows that only a book of language translation and concept definition needed to be written for economics. The remainder could be gotten from standard works on mathematics and electronics. This makes the publication of books on advanced economics unnecessary, and greatly simplifies project security.

Time Flow Relationship and Self-Destructive Oscillations

An ideal industry may be symbolized electronically in various ways. The simplest way is to represent a demand by a voltage and a supply by a current. When this is done, the relationship between the two becomes what is called an admittance, which can result from three economic factors: (1) hindsight flow, (2) present flow, and (3) foresight flow.

Foresight flow is the result of that property of living entities to cause energy (food) to be stored for a period of low energy (e.g., a winter season). It consists of demands made upon an economic system for that period of low energy (winter season). In a production industry it takes several forms, one of which is known as production stock or inventory. In electronic symbology this specific industry demand (a pure capital industry) is represented by capacitance and the stock or resource is represented by capacitance and the stock or resource is represented by a stored charge. Satisfaction of an industry demand suffers a lag because of the loading effect of inventory priorities. Present flow ideally involves no delays. It is, so to speak, input today for output today, a “hand to mouth” flow. In electronic symbology, this specific industry demand (a pure use industry) is represented by a conductance which is then a simple economic valve (a dissipative element).

Hindsight flow is known as habit or inertia. In electronics this phenomenon is the characteristic of an inductor (economic analog = a pure service industry) in which a current flow (economic analog = flow of money) creates a magnetic field (economic analog = active human population) which, if the current (money flow) begins to diminish, collapse (war) to maintain the current (flow of money — energy). Other alternatives to war as economic inductors or economic flywheels are an open-ended social welfare program, or an enormous (but fruitful) open-ended space program.

The problem with stabilizing the economic system is that there is too much demand on account of (1) too much greed and (2) too much population. This creates excessive economic inductance which can only be balanced with economic capacitance (true resources or value — e.g., in goods or services). The social welfare program is nothing more than an open-ended credit balance system which creates a false capital industry to give nonproductive people a roof over their heads and food in their stomachs. This can be useful, however, because the recipients become state property in return for the “gift,” a standing army for the elite. For he who pays the piper picks the tune. Those who get hooked on the economic drug, must go to the elite for a fix. In this, the method of introducing large amounts of stabilizing capacitance is by borrowing on the future “credit” of the world. This is a fourth law of motion — onset, and consists of performing an action and leaving the system before the reflected reaction returns to the point of action — a delayed reaction. The means of surviving the reaction is by changing the system before the reaction can return. By this means, politicians become popular in their own time and the public pays for it later. In fact, the measures of such a politician is the delay time.

The same thing is achieved by a government by printing money beyond the limit of the gross national product, an economic process called inflation. This puts a large quantity of money into the hands of the public and maintains a balance against their greed, creates a false self-confidence in them and, for awhile, stays the wolf from the door. They must eventually resort to war to balance the account, because war ultimately is merely the act of destroying the creditor, and the politicians are the publicly-hired hit men that justify the act to keep the responsibility and blood off the public conscience.

If the people really cared about their fellow man, they would control their appetites (greed, procreation, etc.) so that they would not have to operate on a credit or welfare social system which steals from the worker to satisfy the bum. Since most of the general public will not exercise restraint, there are only two alternatives to reduce the economic inductance of the system. (1) Let the populace bludgeon each other to death in war, which will only result in a total destruction of the living earth. (2) Take control of the world by the use of economic “silent weapons” in a form of “quiet warfare” and reduce the economic inductance of the world to a safe level by a process of benevolent slavery and genocide.

The latter option has been taken as the obviously better option. At this point it should be crystal clear to the reader why absolute secrecy about the silent weapons is necessary. The general public refuses to improve its own mentality and its faith in its fellow man. It has become a herd of proliferating barbarians, and, so to speak, a blight upon the face of the earth. They do not care enough about economic science to learn why they have not been able to avoid war despite religious morality, and their religious or self-gratifying refusal to deal with earthly problems renders the solution of the earthly problem unreachable by them. It is left to those few who are truly willing to think and survive as the fittest to survive, to solve the problem for themselves as the few who really care. Otherwise, exposure of the silent weapon would destroy our only hope of preserving the seed of future true humanity.

The industries of finance (banking), manufacturing, and government, real counterparts of the pure industries of capital, goods, and services, are easily defined because they are generally logically structured. Because of this their processes can be described mathematically and their technical coefficients can be easily deduced. This, however, is not the case with the service industry known as the household industry.

In recent times, the application of Operations Research to the study of the public economy has been obvious for anyone who understands the principles of shock testing. In the shock testing of an aircraft airframe, the recoil impulse of firing a gun mounted on that airframe causes shock waves in that structure which tell aviation engineers the conditions under which parts of the airplane or the whole airplane or its wings will start to vibrate or flutter like a guitar string, a flute reed, or a tuning fork, and disintegrate or fall apart in flight. Economic engineers achieve the same result in studying the behavior of the economy and the consumer public by carefully selecting a staple commodity such as beef, coffee, gasoline, or sugar, and then causing a sudden change or shock in its price or availability, thus kicking everybody’s budget and buying habits out of shape. They then observe the shock waves which result by monitoring the changes in advertising, prices, and sales of that and other commodities.

The objective of such studies is to acquire the know-how to set the public economy into a predictable state of motion or change, even a controlled self-destructive state of motion which will convince the public that certain “expert” people should take control of the money system and re-establish security (rather than liberty and justice) for all. When the subject citizens are rendered unable to control their financial affairs, they, of course, become totally enslaved, a source of cheap labor. Not only the prices of commodities, but also the availability of labor can be used as the means of shock testing. Labor strikes deliver excellent test shocks to an economy, especially in the critical service areas of trucking (transportation), communication, public utilities (energy, water, garbage collection), etc. By shock testing, it is found that there is a direct relationship between the availability of money flowing in an economy and the psychological outlook and response of masses of people dependent upon that availability. For example, there is a measurable quantitive relationship between the price of gasoline and the probability that a person would experience a headache, feel a need to watch a violent movie, smoke a cigarette, or go to a tavern for a mug of beer. It is most interesting that, by observing and measuring the economic modes by which the public tries to run from their problems and escape from reality, and by applying the mathematical theory of Operations Research, it is possible to program computers to predict the most probable combination of created events (shocks) which will bring about a complete control and subjugation of the public through a subversion of the public economy (by shaking the plum tree).

Diversion, the Primary Strategy

Experience has proven that the simplest method of securing a silent weapon and gaining control of the public is to keep the public undisciplined and ignorant of basic systems principles on the one hand, while keeping them confused, disorganized, and distracted with matters of no real importance on the other hand. This is achieved by: (1) disengaging their minds; sabotaging their mental activities; providing a low-quality program of public education in mathematics, logic, systems design and economics; and discouraging technical creativity. (2) engaging their emotions, increasing their self-indulgence and their indulgence in emotional and physical activities, by; (a) unrelenting emotional affrontations and attacks (mental and emotional rape) by way of a constant barrage of sex, violence, and wars in the media — especially the T.V. and the newspapers. (b) giving them what they desire — in excess — “junk food for thought” — depriving them of what they really need. (3) rewriting history and law and subjecting the public to the deviant creation, thus being able to shift their thinking from personal needs to highly fabricated outside priorities. These preclude their interest in and discovery of the silent weapons of social automation technology. The general rule is that there is profit in confusion; the more confusion, the more profit. Therefore, the best approach is to create problems and then offer the solutions.

A silent weapon system operates upon data obtained from a docile public by legal (but not always lawful) force. Much information is made available to silent weapon systems programmers through the Internal Revenue Service. This information consists of the enforced delivery of well-organized data contained in federal and state tax forms collected, assembled, and submitted by slave labor provided by taxpayers and employers. Furthermore, the number of such forms submitted to the I.R.S. is a useful indicator of public consent, an important factor in strategic decision making. Other data sources are given in the Short List of Inputs. Consent Coefficients — numerical feedback indicating victory status. Psychological basis: When the government is able to collect tax and seize private property without just compensation, it is an indication that the public is ripe for surrender and is consenting to enslavement and legal encroachment. A good and easily quantified indicator of harvest time is the number of public citizens who pay income tax despite an obvious lack of reciprocal or honest service from the government.

From the time a person leaves its mother’s womb, its every effort is directed toward building, maintaining, and withdrawing into artificial wombs, various sorts of substitute protective devices or shells. The objective of these artificial wombs is to provide a stable environment for both stable and unstable activity; to provide a shelter for the evolutionary processes of growth and maturity — i.e. survival; to provide security for freedom and to provide defensive protection for offensive activity. This is equally true of both the general public and the elite. However, there is a definite difference in the way each of these classes go about the solution of problems.

The primary reason why the individual citizens of a country create a political structure is a subconscious wish or desire to perpetuate their own dependency relationship of childhood. Simply put, they want a human god to eliminate all risk from their life, pat them on their head, kiss their bruises, put a chicken on every dinner table, clothe their bodies, tuck them into bed at night, and tell them that everything will be alright when they wake up in the morning. This public demand is incredible, so the human god, the politician, meets incredibility with incredibility by promising the world and delivering nothing. So who is the bigger liar? The public? or the “godfather”? This public behavior is surrender born of fear, laziness, and expediency. It is the basis of the welfare state as a strategic weapon, useful against a disgusting public.

Most people want to be able to subdue and/or kill other human beings which disturb their daily lives, but they do not want to have to cope with the moral and religious issues which such an overt act on their part might raise. Therefore, they assign the dirty work to others (including their own children) so as to keep the blood off their own hands. They rave about the humane treatment of animals and then sit down to a delicious hamburger from a whitewashed slaughterhouse down the street and out of sight. But even more hypocritical, they pay taxes to finance a professional association of hit men collectively called politicians, and then complain about corruption in government.

The people hire the politicians so that the people can: (1) obtain security without managing it. (2) obtain action without thinking about it. (3) inflict theft, injury, death upon others without having to contemplate either life or death. (4) avoid responsibility for their own intentions. (5) obtain the benefits of reality and science without exerting themselves in the discipline of facing or learning either of these things. They give the politicians the power to create and manage a war machine to: (1) provide for the survival of the nation/womb. (2) prevent encroachment of anything upon the nation/womb. (3) destroy the enemy who threatens the nation/womb. (4) destroy those citizens of their own country who do not conform for the sake of stability of the nation/womb. Politicians hold many quasi-military jobs, the lowest being the police, which are soldiers, the attorneys and the C.P.A.s next, who are spies and saboteurs (licensed), and the judges who shout the orders and run the closed union military shop for whatever the market will bear. The generals are industrialists. The “presidential” level of commander-in-chief is shared by the international bankers. The people know that they have created this farce and financed it with their own taxes (consent), but they would rather knuckle under than be the hypocrite. Thus, a nation becomes divided into two very distinct parts, a docile sub-nation and a political sub-nation. The political sub-nation remains attached to the docile sub-nation, tolerates it, and leaches its substance until it grows strong enough to detach itself and then devour its parent.

In order to make meaningful computerized economic decisions about war, the primary economic flywheel, it is necessary to assign concrete logistical values to each element of the war structure — personnel and material alike. This process begins with a clear and candid description of the subsystems of such a structure.

Few efforts of human behavior modification are more remarkable or more effective than that of the socio-military institution known as the draft. A primary purpose of a draft or other such institution is to instill, by intimidation, in the young males of a society the uncritical conviction that the government is omnipotent. He is soon taught that a prayer is slow to reverse what a bullet can do in an instant. Thus, a man trained in a religious environment for eighteen years of his life can, by this instrument of the government, be broken down, purged of his fantasies and delusions in a matter of mere months. Once that conviction is instilled, all else becomes easy to instill. Even more interesting is the process by which a young man's parents, who purportedly love him, can be induced to send him off to war to his death. Although the scope of this work will not allow this matter to be expanded in full detail, nevertheless, a course overview will be possible and can serve to reveal those factors which must be included in some numerical form in a computer analysis of social and war systems.

Human beings are machines, levers which may be grasped and turned, and there is little real difference between automating a society and automating a shoe factory. These values are given in true measure rather than U.S. dollars, since the latter is unstable, being presently inflated beyond the production of national goods and services so as to give the economy a false kinetic energy ("paper" inductance). The silver value is stable, it being possible to buy the same amount with a gram of silver today as could be bought in 1920. Human value measured in silver units changes slightly due to changes in production technology.

As in every social system approach, stability is achieved only by understanding and accounting for human nature (action/reaction patterns).

A failure to do so can be, and usually is, disastrous. As in other human social schemes, one form or another of intimidation (or incentive) is essential to the success of the draft. Physical principles of action and reaction must be applied to both internal and external subsystems. To secure the draft, individual brainwashing/programming and both the family unit and the peer group must be engaged and brought under control.

The man of the household must be housebroken to ensure that junior will grow up with the right social training and attitudes. The advertising media, etc., are engaged to see to it that father-to-be is pussy-whipped before or by the time he is married. He is taught that he either conforms to the social notch cut out for him or his sex life will be hobbled and his tender companionship will be zero. He is made to see that women demand security more than logical, principled, or honorable behavior. By the time his son must go to war, father (with jelly for a backbone) will slam a gun into junior's hand before father will risk the censure of his peers, or make a hypocrite of himself by crossing the investment he has in his own personal opinion or self-esteem. Junior will go to war or father will be embarrassed. So junior will go to war, the true purpose not withstanding.

The female element of human society is ruled by emotion first and logic second. In the battle between logic and imagination, imagination always wins, fantasy prevails, maternal instinct dominates so that the child comes first and the future comes second. A woman with a newborn baby is too starry-eyed to see a wealthy man's cannon fodder or a cheap source of slave labor. A woman must, however, be conditioned to accept the transition to "reality" when it comes, or sooner. As the transition becomes more difficult to manage, the family unit must be carefully disintegrated, and state-controlled public education and state-operated child-care centers must become more common and legally enforced so as to begin the detachment of the child from the mother and father at an earlier age. Inoculation of behavioral drugs can speed the transition for the child (mandatory). Caution: A woman's impulsive anger can override her fear. An irate woman's power must never be underestimated, and her power over a pussy-whipped husband must likewise never be underestimated. It got women the vote in 1920.

The emotional pressure for self-preservation during time of war and the self-serving attitude of the common herd that have an option to avoid the battlefield — if junior can be persuaded to go — is all of the pressure finally necessary to propel Johnny off to war. Their quiet blackmailing of him are the threats: “No sacrifice, no friends; no glory, no girlfriends.”

And what about junior’s sister? She is given all the good things of life by her father, and taught to expect the same from her future husband regardless of the price.

Those who will not use their brains are no better off than those who have no brains, and so this mindless school of jellyfish, father, mother, son, and daughter, become useful beasts of burden or trainers of the same.

Secrets From the Vatican Library

The following document was anonymously sent to me during this book's preparation. It purports to be a secret history of Western civilization gleaned from secret documents in the Vatican library by a member of the Franciscan order. The inked imprint of a Vatican library entrance chit affixed to the original document and duplicated at the end of the article is a strong indication that the author does have access to Vatican sources, although his conclusions are indicative of a highly right-wing slant that pegs the piece as possible disinformation — from what quarter, I cannot speculate. This document is included herein because of its unusual origin, and as an example of one very suspect sidepath in the tangle of competing conspiracy worldviews.

JMJ Ille nos benedicat qui sine fine vivit et regnat.

Dear Mr. Keith, I have been made aware that you seek information regarding what you suppose to be the takeover of the Vatican by Royal Arch Masons; would that such, a small thing, really, were the case. May it please you and inform you, somewhat, I shall endeavor to lay before you such facts as are known to me. I must first offer this disclaimer: while the facts of which I shall give report are in large part verifiable, there remains the possibility that, in certain instances where more than one possible interpretation thereof exists, I may well have chosen an incorrect one. Be that as it may, interpretation is not an issue, the facts do speak, most loquaciously, on their own behalf.

To begin; I believe that the establishment of my credentials would be in order. I cannot, and do not, claim to be of high rank in the Church of Rome; a common Lector am I, formerly a student of Heresiology attached for a time to the American School at the Vatican, and possessed as such of an entry-chit, permitting me access to those sub-basements and annexae of the Vatican Library Complex as were deemed fruitful to my ongoing research. It was in this capacity, and under these circumstances, that I first became aware, from various documents, of the general tone of the information I shall here present. After having ascertained that indeed something was awry, and after having been transferred back to the United States (where I was until not too long ago employed as secretary under a succession of priests, of various orders), I appointed unto myself the task of collecting such information as I might, with a mind to either confirm or deny that which I had learned; among other things, I discovered that I am hardly alone in this knowledge — I thank Almighty God that such pillars of determination and strength, such — yes, I shall say it — such saints, are still in evidence even in these most trying, most frightening of times. We all of us owe to them a debt which can only be repaid by assimilating the information which they have bequeathed to me, and now I to you, and in using this information wisely. I reveal this information as my duty both to God and to my fellow-pilgrims on this Earth, in submission to His command; Hoc est praeceptum meum ut diligatus invicem sicut dilexi vos.

I value not position within the Church, nor status in the eyes of men; I seek only to oppose a most foul circumstance, a confederacy of tyrants, who pervert the use of the Ecclesiastical Authority to their own most ignoble ends; my most fervent desire is to once and for all time set straight the record, help to clear away the mountain of debris — I believe you term it disinformation — that all might clearly see the menace before us, naked and unadorned, revealed in the Light of Truth. With your kind permission, I begin.

It must first be understood that the present troubles are the fault, not of some bepaunched oligarchy seated by the fire at their Men’s Club — though said troubles are most certainly perpetuated under much this very scenario — but are rather the result of protracted struggle between several “elite” factions, “cliques” if you will, who have battled under various guises for supremacy from the days following the fall of the Roman Empire to the present.

In order to fully understand the present times, one must rightly understand the past; hence I shall offer the sum total of my knowledge of the full course of this struggle, from the earlier years of the seventh century of the common era, as well as the identity and makeup of each of the factions thereby engaged. We live, truly, in the Dark Ages; since the collapse of the old Roman Empire and the subsequent rise of the Church as the real power in the West, various factions — the European tribal confederacies, for the most part — have fought among themselves for control of the territory of the Chair of St. Peter, and indeed for control of the Vatican itself. Realizing, as they did, that the Church could not be vanquished by fire or by the sword — a lesson learnt, and learnt right hard, by the decaying Empire, Pretiosa in conspectu Domini mors sanctorum Eius — the pagan tribes of Europe split into several factions, some accepting the Church as at least their titular head (that is, submitting to the disciplines of Christianity and incorporating the Faith into the Mythos of their tribes), some choosing to oppose the church under any means fair and foul, and some vacillating between the two poles, though even these did ultimately choose one tack or the other. To simplify, the southern tribes formed a generally pro-Church clique, which expanded to include the Franks (though this primarily due to rivalry with their fellow Germanics to the north, who led the opposing camp); and those who opposed, whether by outright force or subterfuge, the Church — and hoped to either destroy or assimilate the power wielded by Rome. The tribes of modern England were of the third type, but their neighbors the Gaels and Celts of Eire were among the most steadfast supporters of the Church, even after the forcible dissolution of their own unique and beautiful Celtic Communion by the English, in AD 664, who imposed a more Roman variety, more in accordance with the Rite as practiced in England. The message of the Gospel — in its true rendition, one of love and tolerance — was well-suited to the tribes of Eire and of Southern Europe, their characters being marked by a practiced indolence bordering on Sloth, deep passions that flair quickly and are just as quickly quelled, and an underlying affection that finds expression in their every breath; it was these who took to the Church, whatever their reasons to begin, and held fast to the Church to the present day.

The northern tribes, however — the Teutons, the Norse, the Saxons, et. al. — these are typified by a seething cold, a hardness that is not in keeping with their physical beauty, an autocratic indifference to others. While each, north and south, are capable of horrible cruelty, the southern peoples could be as quick to forgive as to blame, and though emotional can be swayed by logic to withdraw their anger; the northerners seem to delight in atrocity, and their lack of apparent passion hides an outlook best typified by the old Arab adage, “Revenge is a dish best served cold.” So long as the Church remained in southern hands, all continued reasonably close to the original plan of the Apostles — as late as AD 692, Sergius I, Bishop of Rome, joined in the proclamation of the Patriarch of Constantinople that their respective Patriarchates, their Episcopal Sees, were of equal rank before our Lord. It pains me to say that never again did the Bishop of Rome behave in so Apostolic a manner, besieged from that time on by worldly concerns which ultimately redirected the Church from Spiritual paths. Due to the apportionment of power in those times, the various northern tribes found it expedient to accept a veneer of Faith, and to nurture their plots under cover of obedience.

The first overt action taken by the northern clique was alignment with certain Muslims expelled from Omayyid Spain, in AD 826; these were settled at Crete, where they established a pirate base, from which they would hector the southern coastal countries. The Roman/Etruscan clique, in reaction to this, used their influence with the Church to establish the Venetian Order of St. Marc, which received full Papal recognition just five years after the establishment of the base at Crete. Skirmishes at sea would continue through the Crusades, to the early sixteenth century. Around the year 850, a new group of players entered the picture: Jews began settling in Germany, under the direction of a very secretive Zionist Elite, who forged ties with the Germanic clique, especially the Prussians and Bavarians. While racially different, they had in common a form of religion; the Zionists and the north Germans both practiced ritual sacrifice of humans. It must be understood that the Jewish Elite never expressed the actual practices or beliefs of the Jewish commoners under them; they were an Elite, who considered their own people far beneath them, and fit only for use as fodder, which autocratic mode appealed to the north Germans, being but a minor variation of their own most ancient practices.

In league with the Zionists, with the odd band of Muslim adventurers to use as shock troops, and the rank-and-file masses of commoner Jews to use for sacrificial purposes, the northern cliques began to upscale their opposition, still mostly covert, to southern/Roman authority. Seeing these developments, it fell to the secular Roman aristocracy — the Old Nobles — to do something, and that quickly. Being as the Bishop of Rome — at that time, John VIII — was disinclined to secularize the Church to the extent proposed by the Roman Nobles, the clique had him murdered in AD 882, beginning the first takeover of the Vatican authority. Subsequent Popes were made well aware of their vicarious position, and only a rare few dared oppose the Roman clique, who now were pre-eminent among the southern tribal clique. Even at that, the complete secular takeover of the Papal authority was not complete until Otto I, as Holy Roman Emperor, forcibly replaced an unaccomodating John XII with a more compliant Leo VIII, in AD 963. From that time on, Papal elections and the College of Cardinals have been a pawn of the ruling faction of the southern clique.

The northern clique, of course, made certain to have their own people in place in Rome, attached in whatever fashion to the Papal retinue. It was by the efforts of one of these agents that the northern clique acquired knowledge of the continents to the west, the Americas, which had been known to the upper echelons of the Church hierarchy since the last quarter of the First Century of the common era, that knowledge delivered, to the best of my knowledge, to blessed St. John the Divine in a vision, and recorded in an Epistle to the Corinthian Church by his holiness Clement, by grace of God the Bishop of Rome, in AD 96. With this information in hand, the northern clique entreated one Leif Ericsson, son of Eric the Red (a trusted Norse associate of the north European clique), to sail westward along a northern route, to ascertain the feasibility of taking these lands for themselves and using their wealth in an outright battle against the southern hegemony. It is fortunate that the natives — called “Skraelings” by Leif and his crew — proved to be displeased by the presence of the Norsemen, and had expelled them, lock, stock, and barrel, by AD 1006. When news of this expedition had filtered back to the southern clique, it caused more than a little consternation. Since the move had been covert, and the southerners desired to keep their own friends in place among the northern elite, plans were quietly laid to facilitate a successful southern effort in the event of overt action; stores were replenished, training of mercenaries upgraded, and to culminate, the Order of Knights Hospitallers of St. John — an order of warrior—monks/provisioners — was founded, in AD 1070.

The northern clique being engaged, since earlier in that same century, in one of their many in—fights for superiority, the southern clique had breath space to consolidate their own lines until about AD 1080, at which time the first full-scale small war took place between the two cliques, ending any possibility of willful merger between the two elites. That it was Gregory VII, in establishing (at the behest of the southern clique) the most sweeping of Papal temporal powers, that initiated this attack by the north, is immaterial; the southern clique had known for some time that the Muslim mercenaries who sacked their coasts were in the employ of the north, which by AD 1100 was being more and more dominated by the Prussian/Bavarian/Zionist clique. Nonetheless, a concordat of sorts was reached when Muslims not in European employ began taking advantage of the factional in-fighting, and it was to a relatively united Europe that Urban II promoted the First Crusade. It was at this time that the Order of Knights Templars was founded, much a duplication of the Order of Hospitallers, but less concerned with provisioning as with actual warfare.

That both orders served as bankers to much of the European elite, both northern and southern cliques, led to struggles between the two groups, which were to have dire consequences at a later date. There were, as yet, some factions of the southern clique still true at heart to the precepts of the Faith, rather than the power thereof, and these factions saw their opportunity in the power struggle between the Welf Family and the Hohenstauffens, also called the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, respectively, beginning in AD 1125. With the victory of the northern-sympathizing Hohenstauffen clan, the balance of power began a slow but inexorable shift to the northern clique, becoming ever more heavily dominated by the North German/Zionist faction. The shift, however, was not immediately apparent to the southern clique, who found themselves receiving a rather rude awakening in AD 1154, when a northern candidate, one Nicholas Breakspear, became Pope Adrian IV; almost immediately he gave Ireland as a gift to his mentor, Henry II of England, which has resulted in nearly a millennium of domination of the only northern ally of the southern clique.

The threat of a pincer movement set aside, the northern clique proceeded to reinaugurate their original policy of covert whittling at the power of the south, now invested very heavily in the Roman and Frankish aristocratic factions. Regular sacrifice of Jewish commoners, under the direction of the Zionist elite, was instituted to propitiate the deities still covertly worshiped by the elite of the northern clique, now merged into the Zionist deity (which had never been the same God worshiped by the Jewish commoners, as examination of coins and other artifacts of the Third Temple Period will clearly show). These regular sacrifices date to approximately 1190, and following quick on the heels of this, comes the escalation of northern preparations for outright struggle against the south; the Order of Teutonic Knights and the Livonian Brothers of the Sword, precursors to the later Prussian Orders, date to the period AD 1190— 1210. With the Hospitallers and Knights Templars engaged in a war of attrition that killed nearly as many of their number as their battles against the Muslims, and the Dominicans fully engaged, from AD 1208, in pitched battle with nonconformist southern sub-cliques and covert actions in England, the Teutonic Knights and their cohorts had a clear field to engage as they would; upon absorbing the Livonian Brothers of the Sword in 1237, they were nearly unstoppable. Their early success they attributed to a massive propitiative sacrifice of European children, in AD 1212. This affair, which began with the promotion of what was called the “Children’s Crusade”, drained an untold number of Europe’s youngest into the clutches of the Teutons; a massive number were indeed slaughtered in ritual sacrifice, and perhaps twice that number were sold into slavery to the Muslims. Once again, the ‘prayers’ of the Teutonic/Zionist clique appeared to have been answered, as with their defeat at the hands of the Mongols in AD 1256, survivors of the Order of Assassins, the Ishmaelis, of Hasan I Sabah, began trickling into Europe, seeking sanctuary among the similarly-inclined Teutonic/Zionist clique. With the addition of these well-trained and fearless — nay, nearly suicidal — Assassins, the Teutonic/Zionist Clique achieved the force necessary to assume complete control of the northern clique, as well as a special force to supplement the actions of their still-active Muslim shocktroops.

Edward I of England, upon learning the full extent of the practices of the Teutons/Zionists, was so sickened that he expelled all Jews from England in 1290, rather than allow what he considered an abomination to occur on his soil. Indeed, as knowledge of the practice crept through the subcliques of the south, one by one they either expelled the Jews (as did France in AD 1306) or else forced their conversion to Christianity, in the mistaken belief that this made them unacceptable for the sacrificial rite. A word or two, I believe, regarding the sacrificial rite of the Zionists, as well as the similar rite of the Teutons, is in order: I must warn you that the rites as I know them are distasteful in the extreme, and that I would not recommend the following as good reading for the squeamish. It must be remembered, throughout this description, that modern Jewry is, for the most part, ignorant of the rites of the Zionists, who posit that they alone (as proper Zionist Jews) are true Jewry, and all others who claim Judaism are wrong. Indeed, to investigate the history of this religion (done so admirably by Benjamin Freedman in his tome, “Facts Are Facts”) is to discover that modern rank-and-file Jewry has no real connexion to historical Judaism, but are in fact pawns in a much larger and more vicious game than they realize. To begin, then: the rite of consecration of the Kohen (ritual/sacrificial priest) and that of normative ritual sacrifice are very nearly identical. The Kohen-elect is made to enter a pit beneath the grating that is beside the altar of sacrifice, also called the altar of holocaust (shoah, in the Hebrew), which is described at chapter 27 of Exodus, in the first part. The altar grating is placed over the pit (actually more an encircling trench), and the sacrificial victim is brought to the altar. The preferred victim is a young boy of Jewish blood; young girls are useable, especially when supply is high, but boys are the preferred victim. Most ‘Jewish’ parents during the Templar periods (the times during which a properly-consecrated temple stood at Jerusalem) were required to redeem their children with an offering (see chapter 12 of Leviticus); at these time, the children of the destitute (who could not offer the prescribed ransom) were used — in modern times, any so-called ‘Jewish’ child may be kidnapped & used for the sacrifice, or for the ordination, though for the sin offering a Gentile child may be used. The child, preferably an infant or toddler (but any child up to the age of thirteen being acceptable, if virginal), is stood upon the grating over the head of the Kohen—elect, nude, facing northward; the child’s head is grasped firmly by the officiating priest (or by him and his assistant, should the child be older & put up a fight), and the child’s throat is then slit to open the jugular vein. Some of the blood is made to splatter against the eastern face of the altar itself, while the rest spatters through the grating to bathe the Kohen-elect, who drinks a mouthful of the blood as it pours over him. The officiating Kohen then wets his fingers with the screaming innocent’s blood and, walking counter-clockwise around the altar, traces certain arcane sigils upon the altar's horns with the blood; then, arriving back at the child's position, he takes a mouthful of the spurting blood. The Kohen-elect is helped out from under the grating & joins the assisting Kohens at the child's side, and all are liberally mouth-sprayed with the child's blood by the officiating Kohen, thus sealing the new Kohen as a member of the priesthood.

The child, weak from loss of blood but still very much alive, is butchered; the internal fatty tissue, the liver, and the kidneys are set aside to be burnt, and the Kohens feast on what they want of the rest, burning the unused portions before sunset, according to Levitical law. This is also the basic procedure for the regular ritual sacrifice, with the exceptions being that in regular sacrifice, the blood spills uninterrupted through the grating, to renew the consecration of the sill on which the temple or killing-floor rests, and that the mouth-spraying of the child's blood is omitted. Similarities between the Jewish and Teutonic rituals are close; the parallels suggest, perhaps, a common origin for certain practices, perhaps deriving from central Asia via the Khazars. In the Teutonic rite, the altar is generally an unhewn dolmen, and the pit and its attendant grating are absent. The priest to be consecrated in this rite merely lies, nude, on the ground at the eastern face of the stone altar (the eastern face of the altar being sacred to both the Zionists and the Teutons), and the victim — a child of either gender between the ages of seven and twelve, virginal — is brought to him. The child is forced down upon the priest—elect in a kneeling position, straddling the elect's hips, at which time sexual penetration (notably absent in the Zionist rite) is achieved, anally for a young boy, vaginally for a young girl. The child's head is faced east, as in the Zionist rite, and the jugular is opened, showering the priest-elect with blood, some of which is ingested. The child is then penetrated sexually by the attending priests until such time as death occurs. In both rites, the bathing in and ingestion of the blood of the child is required for proper consecration, and in the Teutonic rite (as in the Zionist), the body of the child is eaten. In the everyday ritual of sacrifice in the Teutonic rite, no priest-elect lies before the dolmen; instead, the child is penetrated by each of the priests in turn, according to rank or seniority (depending on which of two rites is being followed; I am unclear as to the exact distinction between the two, other than this particular difference of practice).

The Order of Knights Templars — who operated extensively in the north — had been influenced heavily by the Teutonic/Zionist cult. The northern houses of the Templars had indeed adopted several practices from the northern clique, including the Zionist practice of consulting preserved oracular heads for augury. The southern houses of the Templars in combination with the Hospitallers, approached French king Philippe IV with a list of charges, substantiated by eyewitness testimony of a number of the southern Templars, and acting on this information Philippe issued an order of arrest in September of 1307. The order was finally suppressed through all Europe (except Scotland), and the Grand Master, Jacques DeMolay, was burned at the stake in 1314. Those Templars remaining in the south were absorbed into the order of Hospitallers, while those in hiding in Scotland became the nucleus of the Priory of Zion, turning their considerable talents and remaining wealth over to the service of the Teutonic/Zionist clique. The southern clique, now dominated by an uneasy alliance of the French and Roman aristocracies, began exhibiting signs of paranoia very early in this stage of the crisis. Boniface VIII, in an attempt to bring the clique back in line with the original division of power (subservient to, rather than masters of, the Church), issued a Papal Bull, “Unam Sanctam,” claiming Papal authority over temporal rulers, in 1302. He was poisoned in 1303, and succeeded by Benedict XI — who attempted to follow in Boniface’s footsteps and was poisoned himself in 1304. Philippe IV of France, engaged in his war with the Templars as early as 1307, finally offered Pope Clement V sanctuary in France, and the Papal court moved in that year to Avignon, a coup for the French faction over the Romans. So paranoid did the Papal court become that, in 1316 (while the remnants of the Templars were strengthening the northern clique), John XXII sent a squad of heavily-armed Dominicans south to Ethiopia to chase down a reported Patriarch with valid Roman Apostolic succession, recorded in history as “Prester John.”

In 1326, the Teutonic Knights made a foray into Poland; prisoners were taken by the Poles, and several talked, divulging not only the brief bits they knew of general policy, but also their knowledge of the sacrifices of Jewish commoners — these reports sickened the Poles, who, upon repelling the Teutons in 1333-34, extended a general sanctuary to all European Jewry. As news spread through the sub-elites of the southern clique, outrage was the order of the day. While the southern clique was capable of sustained violence, and the torture of captive enemies, the thought of a program of ritual human sacrifice appalled them, causing them to begin pulling somewhat closer together, at least to discuss this aspect of the northern threat. Though several of the aristocratic sub-cliques had learnt of this practice as long back as 1190, it had been regarded as something between a rumor and an aberration; now, however, with proof wrested from Teutonic Knights by the Poles, it took on an immediacy. The northern clique, of course, knew very quickly that their practices were known by the southerners, but were more upset by what they considered the southerners' pretensions. In order to break the south, now when all seemed going their way, the northern clique (with the especial help of England's Edward III) caused the collapse of the Bardi Financier clique in Rome, who had been, after the Hospitallers, the bankers of Europe. Edward, of course, benefitted by not being required to pay any of the sizable loans he'd received from the Bardis; the northern clique could now attempt to wrest control of finance from the south. By this time, the midpoint of the fourteenth century, it was becoming something of a race; since the initial expedition to the North American continent, neither side of the conflict had been in a position to exploit the virgin lands. The north, while having the advantage of unity under autocratic rule, had not the requisite wealth to exploit the Americas; the southern clique, for whom wealth was no problem, had not the unity to mount a proper expedition. Both cliques realized that control of the vast wealth of the western continents would ensure lasting victory. While the northern houses of the Templars had brought with them a cache of gold, it had been scant — Philippe IV had systematically confiscated the available wealth of the order during the seven years of his program against them, and most of this had been disbursed to the Templars-cum-Hospitallers thereafter, remaining under southern clique control.

The northern clique, growing desperate, authorized their Assassins to introduce into southern Europe the bubonic plague, known as the "Black Death," in 1348. Ultimately, the plague would kill perhaps one-quarter of the European & Asian population, as much as one-third of Europe alone, and scattered outbreaks would continue well into the present century, somewhat backfiring on the northern clique. Nonetheless, it had much the desired effect, in its own way, weakening the south sufficiently to allow the north to reinstate its program of large-scale sacrifice of Jewish commoners, forcing large numbers of Jews to seek the asylum of Poland, beginning one year after introduction of the plague, in 1349. The south learned of the north's complicity even as the plague ravaged the population, forever altering the balance of power and social structure of the continent. A force of Dominicans pushed south into deep Africa in an attempt to settle a safe base, free from the contagion of Europe; they had begun construction of stone fortifications at Great Zimbabwe when they were attacked and slaughtered by a force of Teutonic Knights, who took over the construction with the use of slave labor, culled from among the indigenous population; hopelessly outnumbered and operating far from any hope of relief, the Teutons were in turn slaughtered by an uprising of the native slaves, and the abandoned fortifications stand to this day. Thus, in AD 1375, any hopes of using the African continent to sway the balance of power were shelved, and the cliques began to concentrate as best they could on the race to exploit the Americas.

In addition to the aforementioned poverty of the north and disunity of the south, both cliques were now saddled with a massive upheaval of their socioeconomic norms caused by the plague, which led to a period of reapportionment and in-fighting in both camps. One of the major results of the plague was a loss of faith; the commoners (and more importantly, the elite) saw presbyter and prelate falling side-by-side with the peasant. It was likely this, more than anything else, that inspired the 'war of words' that was soon to follow. The northern clique, who never had actually accepted the Gospel, set about discrediting the Writ. In AD 1376, northern-backed theologian John Wycliff published a treatise, "Civil Dominion," attacking the Church (and therefore the power of the southern clique); seeing, somewhat, the coming storm, the southern clique quietly began a shakeup in their power structure. The nature of the uneasy alliance between the various aristocracies was such that the pro forma obedience to the Church scarce provided the stability required to bring the clique, or actually the two major factions of the clique (the French and Roman-oriented factions) through a complete revitalization as was attempted at that time; hence relations between the two groups were strained to the point of near-dissolution; this is the root cause behind the “Great Schism” of 1378.

The Papacy & Papal courts having already been under French domination from 1309, the situation was ripe for schism; when Urban VI elected to return the Papal Court to Rome, more than a dozen Cardinals of the French faction elected Clement VII as Antipope, and reopened the Avignon Vatican. By 1409, three rival claimants were hailed as Pope, representing the French faction, the old Roman (west-central Italian) faction, and the upstart faction from Pisa (north-central Italian). This state of disunity only began to settle when the Medici family, financiers, began their bid to take over the Papacy in 1414, and the schism wasn’t totally ended until three years after. The Pope elected as compromise to the three factions Martin V, who immediately set about to reaffirm the mastery of the south over the north, but the troops sent forth to do this were defeated by Bohemian Hussite forces in AD 1431.

The legendary rivalry of the various Italian families and factions, including the sad tale of the Borgia Popes, is well recounted elsewhere, hence I mention them only in passing, as these conflicts greatly hampered the southern clique’s attempts to regain superiority over the north, and nearly single-handed guaranteed the north’s ascendancy over the course of the next several centuries. Away from the main centers of action, the Teutonic Knights once again attempted to snatch back the sacrificial Jews living in asylum in Poland. The Poles, however, are nothing if not fearless fighters. This foray of the Teutons ended with the Poles gaining west Prussia, exacerbating already strained relations with the Germanics, who decried the Poles even then as üntermenschen. Northern infiltration of the southern power centers had been slow and unsteady; with the victory of the Poles in 1454, a drive was attempted to sieze Spain, which, while secondary in power to the Italian and French factions, was a rising star.

Informed of the attempt by vigilant sentinels in the ranks, but unable to do without the aid rendered by the northern agents, Isabella and Ferdinand expelled the Jews resident there, and quietly shuffled their staff until the most trusted few held the positions closest to their throne. A young adventurer, confidant of the esoteric scholars at Rome, one Cristoforo

Colombo, had visited the Spanish monarchs in 1486 to request their assistance in an adventure to the western continents, and had been rejected. Returning to them in 1492, bearing letters of introduction from the scholars even as the royals were expelling the Jews, it fell to Isabella — acting with Ferdinand's approval, but in secret, that the plans not leak out — to finance the explorer's quest. Due to the problems with the northern clique, and allowing for the possibility of the team being waylaid by northern-backed pirates, Cristoforo (known to the esoteric scholars as Xpo Ferens) was outfitted with three ships only, no escort, and a crew of convicted felons who were considered expendable. Even with these handicaps, the attempt succeeded.

So frightened were the northerners that in 1517, the Teutonic/Zionist faction goaded an emotionally-disturbed monk, one Martin Luther, to instigate a "Reformation" of the Church, in the hope that the resultant turmoil would destroy the now once-again-waxing power of the southern clique. The ongoing troubles between the English and French factions kept interference by other channels to a minimum, however, and the southern clique made serious advances in the southern continent of the Americas. Leo X, then holding the Papacy on behalf of his family, the Medici faction, granted special favors to English King Henry VIII, then excommunicated Martin Luther. The northerners, seeing the disruptive nature of these actions (discrediting them, and swaying England back toward the southern clique), had Leo assassinated, using their influence in one final push to have elected to the Papal office one Adrian Boeyens, of the Netherlands, who (as Adrian VI) would be the last northern choice (indeed, last non-Italian) Pope, for some years to come. Adrian held office only through parts of AD 1522-23, then was poisoned and replaced by Clement VII, another Medici. The southern clique, badly shaken by events and with a care about their as-yet long-distance control of the western continents, began forming more military/religious orders, such as the infamous Knights of Malta (formerly the Knights of St. John) in AD 1530, and the Jesuits in 1534 (though the date of their official recognition, AD 1540, is that found in most histories of the time). The Jesuits' primary function, that of rooting out infiltrators, they performed admirably well — so well, indeed, that by 1543, they were able to present sufficient evidence to Paul III to force him to inaugurate the Inquisition.

Due to the victory of the northern clique, most histories of the Inquisition are hopelessly distorted, but extant Vatican records report that the primary target of the ecclesiastical courts were northern-backed infiltrators, and that these, once found guilty, were handed over to the secular courts for punishment — which was all-too-often carried out in a most un-Christian manner. Admittedly, the power of the Inquisitor's office was rather horribly abused — most especially by rivals of the Italian faction in Spain — and so engrossed was the southern clique in the minutiae of uncovering northern conspirators that it came as a near-total surprise when, in AD 1554, the north seized control of the apparatus of the Holy Roman Empire, then under the direction of H.R.E. Karl V, born a Spaniard but by now firmly in the pocket of the northern interests.

The founding of the Royal Exchange in AD 1566 instigated an attempted invasion of England by a force of undercover Dominicans in 1574; betrayed to the English nobility by supposed allies, they were killed within weeks of their arrival. Attempts at diplomacy by the southern clique failed, and in AD 1581 regular executions of Catholics were instituted in an attempt to destroy all internal opposition from hidden southern agents. Muslims, their numbers padded by a force of native blacks, massed in West Africa, by the river Niger, for an invasion of the southern countries, but were apprehended by a force of Spanish and Portuguese mercenaries and wiped out. In that same year, within scant months, a large Spanish fleet — attempting a secret invasion of England — lost the element of surprise when a lone ship captained by the pirate Sir Richard Grenville engaged them enroute, allowing a tender to return to port with the news. In retaliation, two Popes — Innocent IX and Gregory XIV — are poisoned within a two-month period. This coming directly on the heels of three previous deaths, Gregory XIII in AD 1585 under mysterious circumstances, then Sixtus V and Urban VII within two weeks of each other in AD 1590, prompted retaliation in kind by the southern clique.

Awakening one morning late in 1592 to find the heads of five of his bastard sons nestled against him in his bed (their bodies neatly laid out on the floor), French king Henri IV, who had facilitated the English schemes against the last several Popes, publicly renounced Protestantism and sent envoys to the Italian faction in an attempt to appease them. This had been a second warning to the French, as Henri III, because of disagreements with the Roman aristocracy, had been executed by a warrior-monk in AD 1589. A letter, left on the pillow of Elizabeth I of England, to the effect that continued opposition to Rome would result in the death of any child she might bear, is credited with having persuaded Elizabeth never to marry. Nonetheless, anti-Catholic laws remained in force in England, and northern infiltrators were beginning to make their presence felt even in the ranks of the elite Jesuits, having enough power to block a reunification of the Roman and Orthodox Communions in AD 1595. Fighting between the two cliques was rivaled, in this period, only by in-fighting between the various factions. England narrowly averted total invasion by the Spanish when an Armada, sent out to attack in tandem with a Spanish-supported uprising of the Irish, was decimated in a massive storm. The French and Spanish factions, engaged for some time in open hostilities, are persuaded to lay down arms by the Roman faction; in 1600. Lord Mountjoy begins starving the rebel Irish into submission, even as Spanish reinforcements were reinforcing the defenses at Kinsale. Mountjoy would later — in AD 1602 — defeat the emaciated combined forces, quashing the rebellion.

In AD 1603, Elizabeth I dies and is succeeded by James I, who is unafraid of the southern clique. Even the release, by Portuguese mercenaries, of the plague in London does not sway him. The English had been sending covert teams to the Americas, mostly the East Coast of North America, since AD 1562, and established their first overt settlement, Jamestown, in 1607; English colonists and a force of slaves had held Virginia since 1619, marginally-patriotic religious zealots of unacceptable cults had been transported since 1620, and finally in AD 1630, an English force of 1000 was sent to reinforce covert bases in the Massachusetts territory, founding what would become Boston. With the infiltration of the Jesuits basically completed by AD 1640, the establishment of a southern clique-oriented colony, Maryland, in AD 1632, was at best a palliative measure; northern clique control of North America was essentially assured. Indeed, with the founding of Quaker-controlled Pennsylvania in AD 1682, only two of the original thirteen colonies permitted the practice of Catholicism or the Quaker faith. With the passage of formal laws making Catholicism a crime in AD 1691, and the beginning of the infamous Salem witch trials that same year, any members of religions other than those permitted by the North American branch of the northern clique — most notably Catholics and Quakers — were an endangered species.

Freemasonry was a growing fad among the second and third level echelon of the northern clique, and the Masons saw in the new land an opportunity to set themselves up as a faction in their own right. While French and Native American mercenaries carried on a war of attrition against the northern clique invaders between AD 1702-55, the Freemasons — or rather, jealous lower-echelon members of the northern clique united in Masonic Lodges — continued to accrue power in the new territories. By 1738, they posed such a threat that infiltration of southern aristocratic ranks was deemed imminent, and Clement XII issued the Papal Bull “In Eminenti” in that year, excommunicating any Catholic who was found to be a member of the Masonic Lodges. The French faction, having nominal control of the midsection of North America, were the only force with a real chance of driving the northern clique out. The French faction, however, were tired of the Roman yoke, and, fearing open north-south warfare on their soil, expelled the heavily-infiltrated Jesuits in 1762, then began covertly planning to remove the Roman-allied royalty, who had ceased to be of use to them. The French faction was, by this time, content with a behind-the-scenes stance, in the so-called lower nobility; the Royals — intended as an human shield — were costing more and more to support in the style to which they’d become accustomed.

In AD 1773, the North American faction felt confident in their strength, and, provoking commoners to engage in the ‘Boston Tea Party,’ began overt hostilities against the North European clique. War followed two years later. As the colonists dumped English tea into Boston Harbor, Clement XIV dissolved the now northern-rife Jesuits in a belated attempt to halt the erosion of southern clique power. Come 1777, a leader emerged among the new North American clique; George Wessington (later Washington) agreed to figurehead the fledgling group, and his (Wessington) family coat-of-arms, a field of stars and alternating stripes, was adopted as the new clique’s standard and the new nation’s flag.

The now heavily northern-influenced faction controlling France, seeing the growing power and considerable natural wealth of the upstarts, aligned with the Wessington clique the following year. Along with the actual heads of the new North American faction, Jefferson, Franklin, and Adams, Washington (as he came to be called) led the commoners' forces to victory, and the European cliques of France, Spain, and England formally recognized the new faction in 1783. The upstarts entered into agreement with the now nearly-deified Prussian (Teutonic/Zionist) faction in 1785, and the Teutons began shifting the center of power to include their North American allies. The Constitution, written in such a way as to ensure that the Church-oriented southern clique could never sieze power, was ratified, and seeing the changing tides of fortune, the French faction — totally dissatisfied with the southern clique — incited the French Revolution, toppling the southern-oriented royals and driving the Roman/Vatican faction representatives from the country. Deciding to take up the northern clique's practices, the French faction formally invites Jews to return in 1790; five years later, in order to win back some necessary financial backing, the French faction opens tenuous relations with certain elements of the Roman financial crowd. A problem becoming all-too-apparent to the northern clique was the growing numbers of commoners, who — with victories in North America and France leaving them very full of themselves — were beginning to realize their power.

The world's population reached 500 million around AD 1650, and was increasing dramatically. In AD 1798, Thomas Robert Malthus set down, in his book "Essay On The Principle Of Population," the fledgling ideology of the northern clique on the problem of "what to do about all those commoners." The North American clique split, by the early 1820's, into two factions, the northern and the southern. The southern faction was relatively liberal, preferring to use imported Africans as slaves and allowing the commoners a certain degree of liberty; the northern faction, heavily influenced by the thinking of the Teutonic/Zionist clique, saw the growing masses as potential slaves, regardless of race. Standard histories claim that the southern clique ceded from the northern to protect their property rights, but in fact the northern clique sought to extend slavery to all commoners, not merely the negroes. Importation of Africans had ceased in 1808, beginning a captive breeding program in the south and an extension-of-slavery program in the north; indeed, as early as 1786, an attempt at self-government in New England, referred to as "Shay's Rebellion," had been put down with force, making lie of the illusion of liberty for which the commoners had fought and died. The two factions went to war, with the northerners emerging victorious in 1865. In 1866, the 14th amendment was added to the North American clique's constitution, allowing for enslavement of anyone, so long as the "due process of law" was followed; fearing the possibility of someone from outside their number actually achieving high office, in 1867 the "Tenure of Office" act was passed, limiting the scope of power allowed to elected figureheads. These were among the last acts of the "old-line" North American aristocracy; in 1870, with the founding of the Standard Oil Company, John D. Rockefeller, a member of the new breed of American Teuton/Zionist confederation, inaugurated the "new-line" American elite.

Occult societies, based along the lines established by the Teutons and Zionists, began taking root in North America; Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, owner of businesses in Philadelphia, established her Theosophical Society — allied with the Thule Society, the Vril Society, and Aleister Crowley's Golden Dawn — in New York City in 1875, the same year as Mary Baker Eddy founded her Christian Science movement in Massachusetts. In this, they followed the lead of Freemason Joseph Smith, who founded the Mormon Church (Latter-Day Saints) as a rival form of Freemasonry in 1830, and Charles Taze Russell, who established the Jehovah's Witnesses in 1871. The following decade saw the publication of Nietzsche's Alse Sprach Zarathustra and James Frazer's The Golden Bough. After the ritual sacrifice of several prostitutes in Whitechapel, London (which in itself solved a sticky problem for the Royal Family there), the northern European clique, in a final putsch, seized control of the Italian government, thereby surrounding the heavily-infiltrated, but as yet not submissive, Vatican power structure. That the Vatican had lost much of its glamour was true; but the power of the Papacy still extended to a sizable population of Catholics worldwide, posing a very real threat to northern clique interests. In AD 1897, the Teutonic/Zionist clique held a full meeting at Basel, Switzerland, and laid the groundwork for their plans for domination of those territories not yet directly under their control. Included in these discussions were plans for an Holocaust, a massive extermination-sacrifice of European Jewry and others. The US faction, powerful but not yet as powerful as they would become, opposed the plan, seeing no reason for such conquest — during this and the ensuing period, the US faction pursued a policy of relative isolationism, caring little for what happened outside their immediate sphere of influence. In 1906, back in Northern Germany, the Teutonic/Zionist clique began designing their new and revamped military machine. In order to effect the Holocaust, all of Europe would have to be brought under one totalitarian government, and in 1914, the T/Z clique began “The World War” in order to subjugate Europe, expecting an easy victory, with the US clique remaining isolated and uninvolved. 1917 was an eventful year; the US clique entered the war, ensuring victory for the factions fighting the T/Z clique, the British Fascists announced their support for a Jewish homeland in Palestine (in order to thwart the T/Z clique’s plans for mass sacrifice), and a new band of upstarts, backing the Bolsheviks, overthrew the T/Z aligned Tsarist clique in Russia.

The following year saw the defeat of the T/Z clique and the end of the war. Resentment ran high; British Fascists were angered by US clique intervention in what they saw as an European situation; for the first time in many years, all the sub-factions of the T/Z clique — from the various societies (Thule, Vril, etc.) to the unaligned but thoroughly-Teutonic bourgeoisie — were united in their determination to enact “The Final Solution,” the mass sacrifice of “useless” races to their deities, in order to ensure absolute world dominion. In 1919, the Thule society, pre-eminent among the Teutonic orders, founded the National Socialist (Nazi) party, in order to drum up popular support for another war; they also sought useful allies elsewhere. The British Fascists, tied closely to Thule via other related orders (Golden Dawn, Theosophical Society, and the British Israelite movement, among others) offered their support covertly: White Russian Fascists, enraged at their treatment at the hands of the Bolsheviks, vowed their support as well. In 1922, the northern clique, acting in a unity never before seen, backed an Italian Fascist, Benito Mussolini, in a takeover bid that brought Italy into line with the T/Z clique’s designs. That same year, Josef Stalin, an emotionally unstable but seemingly sympathetic dictator, took power in Russia. By 1929, the Italian Fascists were able to say that the Fascist takeover of the Vatican hierarchy was complete, and the Lateran Treaty, making the Vatican a sovereign state, was signed. By careful manipulation, the T/Z clique was able to topple the US clique’s national economy in 1929; the following year saw the Nazi party begin its meteoric rise to power in Germany, and by 1933, regular ritual sacrifice of Jews had been reinstated, growing steadily (albeit slowly) each year for the rest of that decade, to be stepped up dramatically after 1940.

The British Fascists, playing both sides of the coming conflict, retained good relations on both sides of the Atlantic; while the US clique was temporarily unable to strike back at the T/Z clique for destroying their economy, they could, and did, cause the Teutonic/Zionists to lose face, somewhat, by destroying the pride of Germany, the airship Hindenburg, on US soil. The Spanish Fascists, under Francisco Franco, quashed an attempted takeover by commoners and anarchists in 1939, rendering the majority of Europe Fascist-controlled.

The T/Z clique, feeling that the time was ripe, began the Second World War. Unbeknownst to the forces that prepared to oppose them, two T/Z physicists, Otto Hahn and Fritz Strassman, achieved nuclear fission, the first step toward modern nuclear weapons, that same year (1939). It appeared that the T/Z clique would emerge from the rubble victorious; they had not, however, considered the possibility of a “wild card” in their own ranks. The US clique had long been borderline Fascists themselves, and had maintained a network of infiltrators in the ranks of the various secret societies of the T/Z network. One of these, the highly-ranked Rudolph Hess — who had, indeed, been a most trusted member of Thule — gathered all the extant paperwork on Hahn and Strassman’s work in nuclear fission, and flew to England in May of 1941, trading the clique’s atomic secrets for immunity and a new identity. The Teutonic/Zionist clique suddenly found themselves betrayed in the worst way; not only was their hope of using the new technology dashed, but due to poor communications, the Japanese — acting on a plan arranged in 1933 — forced the US clique to enter the war directly in December of that year. Though messages were sent to call off the plan, they were never received — or, if received, ignored; Japan had been promised dominion over the western two-thirds of the North American landmass, from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. That this arrangement was known to the US clique is a possibility, and would explain the internment of Japanese in the US; I cannot say, though, as I have not found any proof, one way or the other.

With the loss of the secrecy surrounding their nuclear weapons research, and facing the possibility that the US clique would win the race to perfect the new technology, the Teutonic/Zionist clique stepped up their efforts at propitiating their gods. Sacrifices of Gypsies, Slavs, the ill and infirm, Jewish commoners, and Catholics was stepped up dramatically; the clique still believed, at this point, that victory could be assured if only the requisite amount of blood sacrifice were performed. Hess, however, was not the only sympathizer within the ranks of the Teutons to see the US clique's rising star. The list of highly-ranked members of the Nazi front to make deals with the more Fascist elements of the US clique — including Goring, Bormann, the aforementioned Hess, Himmler, Shaub, Gehlen, and numerous others — agrees in great detail with a list of those who, after the war, held positions of trust in what came to be called the "Intelligence Community," the business-financial community, and the social elite, or "Cafe Society." The fact — as I myself have seen in the archives, as well as having seen in my travels — that contrary to the popular deception, the Teutonic/Zionist hierarchy, the real power of the old Prussian clique, was not defeated, but rather was absorbed by the worst elements of the US clique, with the help of the English clique and the subverted Vatican hierarchy. It had been this same action of the US clique that had initially inspired many of the practices of the more "scientifically-minded" Teutonic scientists; practices against the mentally ill and against the native American tribes in the latter part of the nineteenth and early part of the twentieth centuries had inspired the infamous "medical experiments" of the concentration camps. Indeed, one of the conditions of absorption into the US clique, binding upon both the Teutonic and Japanese factions (these three who went on to form the Trilateral Commission) was that the documentation of the results of their experiments be given, fully and freely, to their new masters.

While the Japanese experiments in sonic disruption of living tissue are not yet fully utilized, the biological and genetic findings of the Teutons have borne much fruit, as I shall relate. The Zionist faction, glad to share power but desiring their own base, were given Palestine. The Teutonic clique, with its intricate ties to the other old aristocracies, shifted the actual center of power to the United States. All would have gone their way, were it not for further wild cards in the deck. Indeed, the reshuffling left new cliques arising: the new Russian clique, distrustful of their neighbors to the west; the Muslim clique, resentful, and possessed of an important commodity beneath their shifting sands; and the Anarchists, present for nearly a century but now gaining in popular support; as well as minor factions — all told, while the greater part of the new order favored the heirs of the old aristocracy and the still-rising US clique, total control was not theirs. In 1949, the new Russian clique detonated their first nuclear weapon; the Vatican issues a Papal Bull decreeing excommunication for any Roman Catholic who either practices or preaches Communism, and Senator Joseph McCarthy inaugurates a new witch-hunt, aimed at Communist infiltrators in the lower ranks of the apparatus that served the US/Teutonic/Zionist elite. Recent events show that the Russian clique may well be seeking entry into the ranks of the elite, threatened as they are by the Anarchists, and nearly totally dependent on the West; however, it is too soon to tell. That the order worships vengeful deities, demanding the ritual sacrifice of innocent victims, may be among the most unbelievable of my assertions. It must be realized that the heirs of the clique's power are as well the heirs of their practices and superstitions. If it seems odd to us, raised accepting Christianity (in one form or another) as the operative mode of understanding, that there would be those, seemingly as civilized as ourselves, who would practice such blasphemous rites, let it be understood that to these the worship and propitiation of other gods is the norm; whether by coincidence and circumstance, or by actual intervention of demonic influence, the majority of these sacrifices seem to them, to have worked.

The elite are an insular, clannish clique, given to raging idiosyncrasies and immense deposits of superstition. Their insulation from the rest of us, and from the world which we inhabit, has rendered them emotionally undeveloped, incapable of loving, of caring, of giving — to them, the sacrifice of an innocent is no more noteworthy than the swatting of an annoying fly, and eminently more useful. In the United States alone, more than thirty thousand people — including a growing number of young children, always a preferred victim — disappear each year, without a trace. This must be taken in context; there are of course a fair number of individuals who, for whatever reason, choose to disappear — but these would form, at the very most, perhaps a third (though likely much less) of the total number. What of the others? From documentation I have seen, and conversations with my ecclesiastical superiors, it is said that the majority of these disappearances can be traced directly to such functioning cults as that operated by [name deleted] who, when not operating his cult during off-hours, practices as warrior-priest for the Presidio military bases' own congregation, presiding, in the grottos beneath the base, over ritual sexual abuse of, and quite often ritual sacrifice of, children and young adults. While the names used to identify the one underlying cult change from locale to locale, and while a bewildering array of deities — seemingly representing every pre-Christian cult ever to exist — are invoked, it is ultimately the Teutonic/Zionist pantheon, the Zionist YHWH in conjunction with the Germanic gods, (though there are scattered references to the Zionist elite worshipping only their own god) that are the ultimate object of the clique's worship. Yet, for all their power, their empire stands on a less-than-firm foundation. Internal rifts are common; while united in theory, various factions pursue different policies. Intertribal antagonism is common. Even the agenda of the factions within the clique differ.

The identities of the Teutonic/Zionist clique are well-guarded; even their higher servants are protected by the anonymity of immense wealth and the power attendant upon it. We speak here of individuals of such status that their kith and kin are referred to as an 'house,' not a 'family.' Among these are the House of Windsor, absolute masters until very recently of the worlds trade in narcotics; the House of Rhodes and the House of Rothschild, with their immense holdings in land and in gold; also included, albeit grudgingly, in the elite are the upstart Houses of Onassis and Ibn Saud, who vie for position alongside the established Houses — the Williamsons, the Lodges, the Cabots, and Bierces; the Carnegies, the relative newcomers Rockefeller, the Buchanans, Browns, and Raleighs; the capitalist "johnny-come-latelys" — a class that includes the aforementioned Rockefellers — is represented by Fords and Hearsts as well as the Bradfords, Bryans, and those underlings among the managerial elite who would marry among them. Due to the phenomenon of "dynastic marriage," it may be rightly said that there are not 100 families, not 25 families, but one family, a tribe unto themselves, who hold the reigns of power, control the destinies of multitudes, eat the wealth of nations, and drink the profane chalice of horror — for the hereditary priestcraft of the Teutonic/Zionist elite is the exclusive venue, in its purest form, of the elite-by-blood. Whether the demon being worshiped is Yahweh the Zionist Solar God, or Angra Mainyu Agni of the syncretic Teutonic cult, the primary requirement for correct worship is blood connexion, lineal descent if at all possible, in the priestly line.

“Secret societies” — such as the Freemasons, the Priory of Zion, and the post-Vatican Templars — serve as sub-sects to the main body of the T/Z clique’s religion. For the Zionists, the lines of demarcation are much tighter; “Old Money” is the only money, and Kohens are still trained in proper ritual for sacrifice — admittedly in lieu of a consecrated temple — in a special shul for Kohens, located in Jerusalem. There can be no question that the Zionist state of Israel shall, one day, with Teutonic/US backing, drive the Moslems from the Temple Mount and destroy the (to them) blasphemous Dome of the Rock. In this respect, the Teutons are more fortunate, in that unholy slaughter of children can take place at the hand of an [name deleted], in the grotto beneath the Presidio, and carry full validity.

Current policies of the elite regarding the general estate of the commoners, as I myself have seen and read, is telling. While a policy of division, factionalism and antagonism is the order of the day (particularly in the United States, where what must be the most diversified population on Earth is kept in a state of turmoil by divisive legislation intended to provoke interracial strife and social stratification), there are two primary schools of thought regarding the actual use to which the subjects are to be put.

While there is general agreement across the board with the notion that the commoners must be downbred, in order to reduce their intelligence and make them less apt to rise up in rebellion, a large faction — who appear to be holding sway — counsel a massive slaughter of the majority of the “useless eaters.” I say that they seem to be holding sway, as documents I have seen tell of the introduction of an engineered virus, Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome (AIDS) into the population by the World Health Organization smallpox vaccination program in Africa, and simultaneously by medical experiments on promiscuous male homosexuals in New York City. Current thought seems to be that only “Third World” ethnicities were targeted, but in fact the plan appears to be to reduce the world population overall to more manageable numbers; these survivors may then be limited as to reproduction, numbers maintained at just the level necessary to insure a force of slaves.

The reason behind this reduction is among the most frightening revelations I feel I shall make: according to the best estimates of clique-employed climatologists, the world — contrary to the current “greenhouse effect” story — is drawing inexorably toward another glaciation. The “Ice Ages” are always spoken of in the past tense, always treated as occurrences in prehistory, never to be repeated; however, glaciation has been the norm for this world since roughly two million years ago; alternating cycles of glaciation and warm interstadial, following an approximate one-hundred-thousand year cycle (ninety thousand years of glaciation, followed by ten thousand of interstadial, plus or minus as much as two thousand years) are the normal climate of our Earth, since the end of the Pliocene era (or perhaps slightly earlier). When the icesheets once again advance, it is the plan of the elite to move the trappings of civilization south, a forced march of laden slaves to the southern hemisphere (the glaciers cover only the northern portion climes), and to this end, “house-cleaning” has already begun. AIDS ravages primarily (though not exclusively) third-world populations, hence the southern lands will be defenseless; massive tracts are already being cleared and prepared for construction in South America, and North America — expected to be covered, by the middle of the twenty-second century, with a two-mile-thick blanket of ice — is being treated as a garbage bin, industrial effluvia of the most noxious varieties being poured out all over the land; it will cease to be of use to the elite, ergo it must be rendered useless to anyone else. Even the most dangerous of the industrial wastes will break down and be reassimilated by the soil in ninety thousand years, hence, when the ice clears, a trek back to the North will be possible, if desired. In the interim, the commoners are kept palliated, entertained, too busy to investigate the world around them — and reduced, by slow attrition of incurable disease, to a desired size. I wish that I could say that there is some sustained, organized resistance within the lower ranks of the Church. Indeed, there is not. I wish I could say that some faction among the elite held more humane views; I cannot. Briefly, there was hope. John Fitzgerald Kennedy, a drunkard and a boor, perhaps the best of a very bad lot (the Kennedy clan) had some pretensions to fulfilling his baptismal vows, if only in the breach. He had some desire to treat the slaves humanely. He was used to set an example to any others who might attempt to defy the higher-ups, to over-reach the boundaries set up by the various factions of the elite. So much for political help. John Paul I attempted to wrest control of the Vatican away from the Marcinkus clique; an example was made of him, also. Far from discouraging, however, is the fact that such occurrences could be at all — such is a sign of the internal disunity of the elite.

This, however, is all the hope that I can offer: that a concerted effort could well be all that is needed to topple these insular few from their lofty perch. To what end? Overthrow will not solve, in and of itself, the terrible troubles of our age, hunger, disenfranchisement, disease — but it will end the onslaught of troubles from higher echelons. Overpopulation is as much a problem to the slaves as to the masters, disease must and will run its course, hunger will be ended only in the way it has always ended, by reducing the population to levels which can be supported by the Earth; nonetheless, I for one would infinitely prefer to be culled by the natural forces empowered by the Almighty, Divinum auxilium maneat semper nobiscum, than by the designs of an elite who choose to play at being gods. Sint lumbi vestri praecincti et lucernae ardentes in manibus vestris; ad societatem civium supernorum perducat nos Rex Angelorum. I am hardly the first to speak of a conspiracy; I have read and enjoyed fictitious works which embodied various aspects of the stratification of power within their storylines, and know that theories regarding this or that "secret society" holding sway over the courser of events are a popular form of speculation. I realize that mine is but one more voice added to the cacaphony, perhaps to be lost in the tumult; indeed, the very documents that I have seen include ideas, plans, for the sort of "disinformation" lamented by many, produced for the purpose of misleading those rare few who spend not all of their time pacified by popular amusements. How are you to know that I speak the truth? You cannot. You can verify for yourself the historical facts which I have presented, which form the gist of my own notes, copied laboriously from the original papers at the Vatican archives and supplemented by information gleaned from other clerics and servants of God, but this, I understand, cannot be taken as a guarantee of veracity. I have divulged what I know; I must ask to remain forever anonymous. I am not a young man, strong-willed and inspired; nor yet an old man, who may plead his years: I am but a weak man, seemingly alone, and very much afraid, mea maxima culpa. Though I cannot offer verification beyond what the diligent scholar might find in a careful examination of historical texts, and must admit that this my recounting of the facts as known to me is, of necessity, but a skeleton of the whole story, concentrating on only the most important (to my mind) aspects of the history of the struggle, I offer it in the hope that at least some might be moved to action. If my sharing of what I know saves, or even merely betters, one life, then I have in some small way striven to fulfill my vow of service to my fellow-children of God. Maiorem caritatem nemo habet ut animam suam ponat quis pro amicis suis; would that I had such strength. Such is the gist of my knowledge of the situation; I hope that this casts some light on your interest in the takeover of the Vatican. I have endeavored to keep this recounting to manageable length; I could have told somewhat more, but it would only add detail to the overall picture presented here, and I believe that the total situation is best and most accurately depicted in broad, bold strokes. I offer you only those proofs of my sincerity as cannot be traced to me, for obvious reasons; nunc dimittis servum tuum. Absterget Deus omnem lacrimam ab oculis sanctorum, a servant of servants…

AIDS
ACT OF GOD OR THE PENTAGON?

G.J. Krupey

AIDS still retains its controversial mien even if the initial hysteria, whipped up by media sensation-mongering and hate-mongering by the religious right, has been tempered somewhat as the feared “gay plague” failed to materialize as a “Black Death” style pandemic sweeping away all life in its path worldwide.

But hysteria is still bubbling under the surface along with the concomitant threat of reactionary panic that always accompanies public freak-outs. Recent demands from some quarters, that AIDS-stricken health care workers must submit to mandatory AIDS testing and be potentially liable for criminal prosecution, is just one more proof of that.

Confusion still reigns in the public forum on the AIDS question, and bigotry still dominates the discourse. AIDS is a many-faceted subject that taxes the patience and often the credulity of even the most “objective” non-partisan investigator. It is a mystery that seems to become only more mysterious the more one studies it; where one Hydra head is chopped off, two more reappear. Certainly the most important question to those already suffering from AIDS is how to cure it, how to prevent it. At this point, the question as to what causes AIDS is secondary, and there is a host of contradictory theories as to what the source or sources of AIDS may be.

It is not my purpose here to summarize or debate those theories. Instead I will focus on the theory, once quite popular in some circles but seems to have fallen by the wayside: that AIDS was the result, deliberate or accidental, of chemical-biological warfare research by the US military.

On June 9, 1969 there appeared before the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Department of Defense Appropriations for 1970 one Dr. Donald M. MacArthur, Deputy Director for the DOD's Research and Technology and a former manager for the Chemistry and Life Sciences Research Center of Melpar. At Melpar, Dr. MacArthur "was responsible for the management and direction of a large number of defense and space programs representing a broad spectrum of disciplines from instrumentation engineering to biology. These programs represented applied research in the physical and life sciences…"[1] Dr. MacArthur was one of five witnesses, three scientists and two military officers, appearing before the subcommittee to testify on the progress of US military Chemical-Biological Warfare programs and to see appropriations for more money to develop the programs even further.[2] Dr. MacArthur spoke on the subject of "Synthetic Biological Agents". He said:

"Molecular biology is a field that is advancing very rapidly, and eminent biologists believe that within a period of five to ten years it would be possible to produce a synthetic biological agent that does not naturally exist and for which no natural immunity could have been acquired."[3]

To the question of Florida Representative Robert L.F. Sikes as to whether the US was then currently engaged in such research, MacArthur answered in the negative. When Sikes, either a naif or a laconic wit, asked "Why not? Lack of money or lack of interest?", MacArthur bluntly replied, "Certainly not lack of interest."

Sikes then asked MacArthur to provide the subcommittee with information on the requirements, advantages, time and costs of such a program. MacArthur provided an outline of observations from "a small group of experts" who had considered the matter. In summary, he noted that:

1. — All presently known biological agents representing "naturally occurring disease," are known to scientists worldwide, and "are easily available to qualified scientists for research, either for offensive or defensive purposes."

2. — “Within the next 5 to 10 years, it would probably be possible to make a new infective micro-organism which could differ in certain important aspects from any known disease-causing organisms. Most important of these is that it might be refractory to the immunological and therapeutic processes upon which we depend to maintain our relative freedom from infectious disease.”

3. — “A research program to explore the feasibility of this could be completed in approximately five years at a total cost of ten million dollars.”

4. — Such a program would be difficult to establish due to the relative newness of the molecular biology field. The field has few “highly competent scientists” and most are in private university laboratories and “adequately supported from sources other than DOD.” MacArthur did believe it possible “to initiate an adequate program through the National Academy of Sciences – National Research Council.

“The matter was discussed with the NAS-NRC in such a controversial endeavor have led us to postpone it for the past 2 years.”

MacArthur concluded by saying:

“It is a highly controversial issue, and there are many who believe such research should not be undertaken lest it lead to yet another method of massive killing of large populations. On the other hand, without the sure scientific knowledge that such a weapon is possible, and an understanding of the ways it could be done, there is little that can be done to devise defensive measures.

“Should an enemy develop it there is little doubt that this is an important area of potential military technological inferiority in which there is no adequate research program.”[4]

It could be merely coincidence, but the theoretical disease that Dr. MacArthur refers to in his testimony (see #2 above), which would be “refractory” (that is, resistant to the immunological and therapeutic processes upon which we depend to maintain our relative freedom from infectious disease), in other words, a germ that would resist the body’s own natural system of protecting and healing itself from the ravages of infectious diseases, sounds like Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome, AIDS.

After all, what better way to “acquire” an immune deficiency than if somebody put it there? It is interesting to note how, in concluding his pitch for research into the theoretical immuno-suppressive synthetic microbe, Dr. MacArthur raised the ethical objections only to dismiss them, in typical and time-tested Cold War fashion, with the dread raised by the spectre of the “enemy.”

MacArthur pleaded for superiority in the Chemical-Biological Warfare race, a “germ gap,” so to speak. Earlier in his testimony, he even claimed that “we have to believe [the Soviets] are probably working in the same area.”[5] The funds were awarded, and one can only speculate what would have happened if they hadn’t been disbursed. But recent revelations about the Pentagon’s “Black Budget,” the official unaccounted-for billions it receives for whatever purposes it deems fit, make one wonder if such public displays of hat-in-hand begging for military appropriations are shadow plays for the purpose of convincing civilians that the military-industrial establishment still defers to civilian control. MacArthur’s testimony shows that considerable study and planning were given beforehand to the idea of “defensive measures” against synthetic biological agents and the program to pursue such research; is it not possible that the research was already being conducted prior to the 6/9/69 hearings, that the whole procedure was merely rubberstamping after the facts?

Perhaps as a result of that “growing criticism of the CB program” in the same year as these hearings, President Nixon declared that the US would no longer produce or use biological warfare agents. Chemical warfare agents were conspicuous by their absence (this was, after all, the era of napalm and Agent Orange in Vietnam).

In 1972 an international treaty banning the use of bio-warfare agents was signed by the US, but Senate ratification did not occur until 1975, leaving three years for R&D to produce some sort of malevolent fruit. But the treaty provided for “defensive” biological warfare research, the same sort of research that Dr. MacArthur assured Congress would be exclusively pursued.

However, the difference between “defensive” and “offensive” biological warfare research is moot if not meaningless, leaving a large enough loophole to render the treaty a figleaf and a charade.

The AIDS epidemic first surfaced in 1981 when reports of the first cases were documented and classified (originally as GRID — Gay Related Immune Deficiency) In retrospect, previously inexplicable cases of deaths due to mysterious factors that fit the AIDS model were found as far back as early 1979. Some researchers have claimed to have found even earlier cases, perhaps as far back as 1976.[6]

Those first cases were found in two groups of gay men in Los Angeles and New York City. The Los Angeles fatalities were due to pneumocistis carinii pneumonia (PCP), a previously rare pneumonia, while the New York deaths resulted from Kaposi’s Sarcoma, a slow-developing cancer that begins with skin lesions and works its way into the internal organs. Also previously rare, it was mainly found in elderly men of Mediterranean ethnic origins. Other than the fact that the victims in both scenarios were gay men with weakened immune systems that allowed rare and opportunistic infections to kill them, there was no other evidence to link the cases. But as the numbers of victims skyrocketed, and symptoms that had appeared separately in the New York and Los Angeles cases appeared nationwide, the media began sounding the alarm over the menace of “gay AIDS.” AIDS could not have come at a worse time for the gay liberation movement. In the early 1980s, its struggle against bigotry, always an uphill battle, was dealt severe setbacks by the hate campaign orchestrated by the religious right in the late 1970s. While homophobia alone cannot explain Reagan’s election to the White House, it didn’t hinder it. In effect, the gay community was already suffering from political AIDS when pathological AIDS hit it.

And it didn’t take the religious right long to swarm to the attack. It wasn’t long before hysterical talk about tattooing AIDS patients for identification, or rounding them all up for quarantine became common, not only among the lunatic fringers of the right, but from mainstream conservatives like William F. Buckley, Jr. and R. Emmett Tyrell, Jr. To the right, AIDS was both symbol and proof of the folly of granting perverts license to wallow in their depravity, maybe even to exist. They well understood the potential the disease contained for swaying the general public away from a grudging acceptance of gay rights back to a position of fear and loathing.

There was certainly good reason for everyone to be concerned with the looming spread of a disease that incapacitated the immune system to the point where catching a common cold or developing an infection from a simple cut could turn into a possible death sentence. And as the disease spread to include such diverse at-risk groups as IV drug users, hemophiliacs, and Haitians, panic and confusion spread with the news. What was going on here, anyway? What was the missing link between the four at-risk groups? Elaborate and often illogical theories were offered to explain that link, as well as the origins of the disease. Among the more ludicrous origin theories, all the more so since it was taken entirely seriously for quite some time, was the African Green Monkey theory. It postulated that the transmission of AIDS began when a human being in Africa was bitten by an AIDS-carrying monkey, or the monkey was eaten by the human, or the human had sex with the monkey. This black African monkey-biter or monkey-fucker eventually transmitted it to a white American homosexual, who infected other gays, etc. The inability to find any natural analog to the AIDS virus in primates hasn’t deterred this theory from still finding credence in certain circles or from slipping into urban legend.

Some other culprits considered as the source of AIDS were dioxin, arboviruses (spread by flying insects, like mosquitoes) such as maguari and dengue, Swine Fever Virus, radiation from electrical fields, nutritional deficiencies, inhalation of amyl nitrate “poppers” by gay men (used to enhance and prolong orgasm), and a new strain of syphilis misdiagnosed as a new disease. Proponents of all theories were able to marshal enough facts to make their theory as believable as the next, especially those who could point to AIDS and AIDS-like symptoms in people not fitting the profile of any at-risk group. But it was more difficult to reconcile the various theories to explain the by now (mid ‘80s) worldwide AIDS pandemic. Brazil was second only to the US in reported cases, and the disease was devastating central Africa, where it was primarily a heterosexual phenomenon.

Was there more than one type of AIDS? It certainly seemed so at times. How else could its far-flung empire of diverse subjects be accounted for? And why now, all at once? Certainly a handful of faggots couldn't be responsible for all this, could they? Gradually the prominence of the "gay plague" began to diminish in importance for all but the most rabid homophobes, who believed AIDS was God's punishment on homosexuals and its spread to non-gays as His wrath at tolerance of them.

There was one other theory on the origin of AIDS: that it was man-made, genetically engineered in some laboratory and released, either accidentally or deliberately, on a world unprepared for it. It was a claim that cut across political and sexual lines, and caused a war of words between the two belligerent superpowers, then at the height of renewed cold war tensions.

On July 4, 1984, the New Delhi, India, newspaper, The Patriot, published an article making the first detailed charges of AIDS being a CBW agent. An anonymous American anthropologist was quoted claiming that AIDS was genetically engineered at the US Army's Biological Warfare Laboratory at Fort Derrick, near Frederick, Maryland. To prove its point, articles from the Army's own official magazine Army Research, Development and Acquisition were cited. The authors of one cited article were Lt. Col. Karl Pedersen, Jr. and Col. John Albertson, the (then) director of the Institute of Infectious Diseases and Director of the Medical Engineering Laboratory, respectively. The article cited dealt with "natural and artificial influences on the human immune system."[7] The Patriot article also claimed that "Fort Derrick scientists, with the help of the Centers for Disease Control, and under Pentagon contract, travelled to Zaire and Nigeria, and then to Latin America, to collect information on a 'powerful virus that could not be found in Europe or Asia."[8]

But it wasn't until the Soviet journal Literaturnya Gazeta repeated the charges made by the Indian newspaper on October 30, 1985, that the accusation became an international controversy. The story was picked up worldwide, but American newspapers, predictably, ignored the story until the US government officially denounced the Soviet article as anti-American disinformation, and leaving it at that.

But the Soviets continued to cover the story, quoting two physicians, John Seale, a London venereologist, and Nathanial Lehrman, an American psychiatrist, to back their claims. This gained an official protest from the US ambassador to the Soviet Union.[9] But in 1986, a pair of East German scientists, Jakob and Lilli Segal, issued a 52 page pamphlet, "AIDS: USA Home Made Evil; Not Imported from Africa," which they distributed in English-speaking African countries. Just more commie agitprop?

The Segals were visited by two American embassy officials in East Berlin on October 10, 1986. "The officials claimed to be a historian and political counsel, respectively. But Segal said, 'I am positive they were from the CIA — and that they were deeply concerned that the cover-up over the origin of AIDS was going to be exposed.' The officials questioned Segal about `what he knows, what he thinks, where he got his information from, and what he intends doing with the report.' The State Department acknowledged sending officials to the Segal home, but said it was merely `to point out the fallacies of the report.'"[10]

This account was found in the London Sunday Express of October 26, 1986. This tabloid interviewed Segal (stressing that, although resident of a communist country, he held no particular political views), Seale, and an American, Dr. Robert Strecker, another proponent of the AIDS as bio-warfare agent theory. The Express story alarmed the State Department more than any other incident prior to it because it was the first time the charge had been made in a Western paper, and a conservative one at that. On April Fools Day in 1987 the State department accused the New Delhi Patriot as being a communist front for publicizing the AIDS as bio-warfare story. (Was this timing merely a coincidence, or does someone in the State Department possess a sophisticated sense of humor?)

Ignored by both sides was the fact that speculations about the possible deliberate deployment of AIDS had circulated throughout the alternative and gay press for years before the Patriot story. As an example, a gay newspaper, New York Native, ran a letter from an anonymous source who claimed to have worked at Fort Detrick's Biological Warfare Lab, and that it had deliberately released AIDS with the intention to infect gay men as part of a program called "Operation Firm Hand."[11]

In 1969, after Richard Nixon's supposed ban on the production of CBW agents, part of the grounds at Fort Detrick's Biological Warfare Laboratory were renamed the Frederick Cancer Research Facility and given to the National Cancer Institute for "civilian medical research" The military's grounds were also renamed as US Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases, dedicated exclusively, in conformity with Nixon's great humanitarian crusade, to "defensive" research into CBW. But, "within two years of its foundation, the Institute's staff and budget had trebled."[12]

Even one who does not accept the AIDS as military conspiracy theory must wonder exactly what use the National Cancer Institute and the Army's Bio-Warfare Lab would have for each other. Odder still was the fact that the NCI's AIDS Task Force, directed by Dr. Robert Gallo, anounced in 1984 that it had discovered the cause of AIDS, a virus dubbed HIV — Human Immunosuppressive Virus; and this only a year after the search was begun — in conjunction with the Frederick Cancer Research Facility. At first glance this would seem to deny the possibility of Fort Detrick being the birthplace of AIDS. After all, if the military were engaged in a clandestine program to kill off homosexuals or other minorities by disease, why would they let the civilian researchers discover the means by which they did it and threaten to blow their cover?

The government often has its own reasons for leaking otherwise "sensitive information," often highly selective, to certain individuals at special times. If the army accidentally released into the civilian population a bio-warfare experiment that became known as AIDS, and felt compelled to find a cure for it, they might find it more expedient to invite civilians, on various "need-to-know" bases, to do the dirty work of cleaning up their mess, possibly even manipulating them into thinking they "discovered" the culprit all by themselves. Remember, Dr. MacArthur was seeking funding for a study of a CBW micro-organism that would be resistant to immunological processes, a disease with no known cure. It isn't likely that army scientists, considering the business they're in, would first think of its cure.
